ABASIDES, ă-bas'-se-des, the name of a family of sovereigns, derived from Abbas ben Abd-al-Motalleb, paternal uncle of the Arabian prophet Mahomet.

ABASSIA, ă-bash'-e-a, the modern name of a kingdom in Ethiopia proper. It is large, mountainous, and comprehends the provinces of Bagmeder, Gojam, Waleka, Shewa, &c.

ABASSON, ă-bās'-son, an impostor, who pretended to be the grandson of Abas the Great, king of Persia. Beheaded at Constantinople, in the 17th century.

ABATE, Andrea, ă'-bat, a painter of fruit and still life; employed by the king of Spain. B. at Naples. D. 1732.

ABATI, Niccolo, a-ba-te', a fresco painter of Modena, who assisted in decorating the palace of Fontainebleau. His finest easel-piece in oil is in the Dresden Gallery, representing the martyrdom of St. Peter and St. Paul. B. 1512; D. 1571.—There are several other painters of his name mentioned in Lanzi.

ABATOS, a-ba-tos', an island in the Lake of Mœris, in Egypt, famous for being the sepulchre of Osiris, and for producing the papyrus, of which the ancients made their paper.

ABAUZIT, Firmin, a-bo-ze', a man of letters, who lost his father early, and was sent by his mother to Geneva, to prevent his being brought up in the Romish persuasion. For this she was confined in the castle of Somières; and did not arrive at Geneva till two years after her son. Having finished his studies, he went to Holland and England, and in the latter country formed an intimacy with Sir Isaac Newton. King William wished him to settle there, but filial affection recalled him to Geneva, where he was admitted a citizen, and in 1730 published an improved edition of Spon's History of Geneva. B. at Usez, 1679; D. at Geneva, 1767.

ABAZKAJA, a-baz-ka'-ja, an open town of Siberia, in Asiatic Russia, situate on the river Ischim. Lat. 50° 10′ N. Lon. 69° 5′ E.

ABBADIE, James, ăb'-ba-dé, an eminent divine, who took the degree of D.D. at Sedan, and was afterwards made minister of the French church at Berlin. In 1688 he accompanied Marshal Schomberg to England with the Prince of Orange, and was with that great man when he fell at the battle of the Boyne. On his return to London, he was appointed minister of the French church in the Savoy; and not long after promoted to the deanery of Killalo, in Ireland. B. at Nay, in Berne, 1658; D. London, 1727.

ABBAS, Halli, or Magus, ăb-ba, one of the Magi, and a physical author, who flourished in the 10th century. A treatise of his, entitled "The Royal Work," is still extant.

ABBAS, son of Abdalmothleb, uncle of Mahomet, was at first an enemy to that impostor, but being taken prisoner by him, he changed his sentiments, and became a zealous Mussulman. D. 653.—A century after his death, his grandson Abulabbas, surnamed Saffah, was chosen caliph, in whom began the dynasty of the Abasides, who enjoyed that dignity 524 years.

ABBAS-ABAD, ab-bas-a-bad, a fortified town of Asiatic Russia, treacherously surrendered to the Russians in the war of 1827.

ABBASSA, ăb-bās'-sa, sister of the caliph Haroun-al-Raschid, by whom she was married to Giafar, his vizier, on a singular condition of wedlock, which failed to be fulfilled. There are extant some Arabic verses by her, on the subject of her love for Giafar.—Lived in the 8th century.

ABEA THULLE, ăb-ba-tool, king of the Pellew Islands. He allowed his second son, Prince Le Boo, to visit England, where he died. When the king heard of the event, his conduct was marked by great resignation, and he continued till his death the friend of Englishmen. D. 1791.

ABBE, Louise, ă'b, a poetess of France, who flourished in the 16th century, and was surnamed La Belle Cordonnière—the fair cobbler.

ABBEFIORD, ăb-be-fe'-ord, a seaport town of Norway, situate on a small bay, in which are three islands, 60 miles S. W. of Christiana, in the government of Aggerhuus.

ABBEOKUTA, ăb-be-o-ku'-ta, a town of West Africa, in the Bight of Benin, greatly civilized by the labours of missionaries.

ABBETIBBE, ăb'-be-tib, one of the districts in the territories of the Hudson's Bay Co. Lat. between 48° 52′ N. Lon. 75° 30′ W.

ABBEVILLE, ăbb'-veel, a fortified city of France. It was formerly a farm belonging to the abbey of St. Requier, whence its name is derived. This city received considerable damage by an explosion of gunpowder in November, 1773, when 150 of its inhabitants perished, and about 100 houses were destroyed. Manf. Woollen, canvas, packing and sail-cloths, soap, jewellery, hosiery, and glass-wares. Pop. 19,158.

ABBEVILLE, ăbb'-vil, a district in the United States of America, in the west part of South Carolina. Pop. free, 14,000; slaves, nearly 20,000; total, 34,000.—A town of the same name is situate in the centre of the district.

ABBEYFEALE, ăb'-be-feel, a parish and village of Ireland, in the county of Limerick. Ext. 18,150 acres. Pop., united, 5,000.

ABBEYLEIX, ăb'-be-le, a post and market town, Queen's County, Ireland. Pop. 1,200.

ABBIATI, Filippo, ăb-be-a'-te, an historical painter, was born at Milan, in 1640, and died in 1715.

ABBON, ăb-bon, a Norman monk, who, at the end of the 9th century, wrote an account of the siege of Paris by the Normans.

ABBON, ăb'-bon, de Fleury, a learned French abbot of the monastery of Fleury. King Robert sent him to Rome to avert the wrath of Gregory V., who threatened to lay the kingdom under an interdict, and Abbon obtained all that he asked. Killed in a quarrel between the French and the Gascons, 1004.

ABBOT, George, ăb'-bot, an English prelate, whose father was a weaver. After receiving a succession of preferments, he was appointed one of the divines to translate the present version of the Bible. In 1609 he was made bishop of Lichfield and Coventry, whence, the same year, he was translated to London, and in 1610 to Canterbury. About the close of his life he, by accident, shot to death a keeper of the deer of Lord Zouch, whilst engaged in the exercise of hunting. This calamitous event clouded the remainder of his life. He ever after kept a monthly fast on account of the misfortune, and settled £20 a year on the widow of the keeper. He attended King James on his death-bed, and assisted at the coronation of Charles I., whose favour he subsequently lost, for refusing to license an objectionable sermon preached by Dr. Silthorpe. B. at Guildford, in Surrey, 1562; D. at Croydon, 1633.

ABBOT, Robert, eldest brother of the above archbishop, was appointed by King James one of his chaplains in ordinary, and that monarch was so pleased with his book, "De Antichristo," that he ordered it to be reprinted with his own on the Revelations. The zeal which he displayed for the supremacy of kings procured him the see of Salisbury. B. at Guildford, 1560; D. at Salisbury, 1615.

ABBOT, Maurice, brother of the above, was bred a merchant, and became a director of the East-India Company. He was the first person knighted by Charles I., and in 1625 was chosen one of the representatives for the city of London, of which, in 1638, he was lord mayor. D. 1640.

ABBOT, Charles. (See COLCHESTER, Lord.)

ABBOT, Charles. (See TENTERDEN, Lord.)

ABBOTS, or APEWOOD CASTLE, in Staffordshire, an ancient fortification in the parish of Serfdon, 7 miles from Wolverhampton; supposed to be the work of the ancient Britons.

ABBOTSBURY, ăb'-bots-ber'-re, a market town of Dorsetshire, on the sea-coast, 8 miles from Dorchester, and 133 from London. Pop. 1,100.

ABBOTS-BROMLEY, ăb'-bots-brum'-le, a town in Staffordshire, 6 miles E. of Stafford, and 129 N.W. of London.

ABBOTSFORD, ăb'-bots-ford, the seat of Sir W. Scott, the celebrated author of the Waverley Novels, situate on the south bank of the Tweed, a few miles above Melrose Abbey. It takes its name from a ford formerly used by the monks of Melrose.

ABBOTS-LANGLEY, ăb-bots-lang'-le, a village near St. Albans, in Hertfordshire, distinguished as the birthplace of Nicholas Breakspeare, or Adrian IV.; the only Englishman who ever rose to the pontificate of Rome. It has extensive paper-mills. Pop. 2,384.

ABBOTT, Jacob, a modern American writer, who has published a series of juvenile works, which enjoy a large sale in the United States, and have been reprinted in England.

ABBOTT, J. S. C., related to the above, also an American author, who has written several historical works of interest and value, the principal of which is an admirable biography of Napoleon Bonaparte, lately published in London.

ABB'S HEAD, St., ab's hed, a promontory or headland in Berwickshire, Scotland, where it is in contemplation to erect a lighthouse, which has long been wanted. It is the southern extremity of the Frith of Forth. Lat. 55° 55 N. Lon. 1° 56 W.

ABBT, Thomas, abt, a German writer, whose precocity of talent enabled him to produce, at the age of 13, a work deemed of great ability, and entitled "Historia Vitæ Magistra." He subsequently attracted the notice of Prince Schaumberg-Lippe, by whom he was held in high estimation, and liberally patronized. B. at Ulm, in Suabia, 1738; D. at the early age of 28, 1766.

ABCASSIA, ăb-kăsh'-e-a, or ABASSIA, a subdivision of Georgia, in Asiatic Turkey, being the most northern part of that province. The inhabitants live in mean, low huts, and go almost naked. Each person has an idea that his neighbour is his enemy; and if, by any stratagem, he can catch him, sells him for a slave to the first Turk, Persian, or Tartar, that appears in the country. Lat. 43° to 45° N. Lon. 39° to 43° E.

ABCOUDE, ăb'-kood, a village about nine miles distant from Amsterdam, on the road to Utrecht.

ABDALLA, ăb-dăl'-la, father of Mahomet. He was only a camel-driver; but the Mussulmans, having nothing better to boast of concerning him, declare that he was offered the finest women of his tribe when he was fourscore years old, and that on his wedding night, a hundred girls died of grief, for having lost the honour of being his bride.

ABDALLAH-EBN-ALI, ăb-dăl'-la-en-ăli, uncle of the two first caliphs of the Abasides, under whom he served as a general against the caliph Merwan, whom he vanquished, and proclaimed his nephew in his stead. He was guilty of horrible cruelties on the family of the Ommiades, the name of the rival family of caliphs. When his eldest nephew died, his brother Almanzor assumed the government, which so displeased Abdallah, that he raised an army against him, but was defeated. Put to death, 754.

ABDALLAH-EBN-ZOBHIR, ăb-dăl'-la-en-zo-beer, an Arabian chief, who seized the caliphate in 680, notwithstanding the claim of Yezid, and enjoyed the dignity nine years. Fell fighting in the defence of Mecca, in his 72nd year.

ABDALLATIF, ăb-dăl-lat'-tif, a distinguished Arabic writer, who produced an admirable history of Egypt. B. Bagdad, 1161; D. 1231.

ABDALMALEK, ăb-dăl'-mă-lek, fifth caliph of the race of the Ommiades. His reign was very successful; and on account of his great avarice, he was named the peeler of stone. The vulgar saying of skinning a flint is supposed to be derived from this circumstance. He reigned twenty-one years, at the close of the 7th and beginning of the 8th centuries.

ABDALONYMUS, ăb-da-lon'-i-mus, king of Sidon, who, though only a gardener, was of the blood royal, and received the crown under the following circumstances:—When Alexander conquered that country, he allowed Hephæstion to dispose of the crown. He the question offered it to three brothers, who all refused it; but being requested to point out a proper person, they fixed on Abdalonymus. Being brought to Alexander, the conqueror observed the dignity of his aspect, and said to his courtiers, "I wish to know how he bore his poverty." Abdalonymus, hearing this, said "Would to heaven I may bear my prosperity as well!" This answer so pleased Alexander that he confirmed the appointment.

ABDALRAHMAN, ăb-dăl-ra'-măn, a Saracen general, and governor of Spain, who, after ravaging France with fire and sword, was vanquished at Tours by Charles Martel. Slain at Tours, 732.

ABDALRAHMAN, surnamed the Just, one of the family of the Ommiades, who went to Spain in 756, where he commanded the Saracens against their king Joseph. Abdalrahman slew that prince, and was then acknowledged caliph. He also assumed the title of king of Cordova. D. 790.

ABDAS, ăb-dăs, a Persian bishop in the time of the younger Theodosius, who brought upon the Christians a violent persecution, and was the first to fall in it. The clergy called in Theodosius, by whom the Persians were worsted; but the persecution raged forty years.

ABD-EL-KADER, ăb-del-kad'-der, or ka'-der, the third son of a Marabout of the Arab tribe of Hashem, who had risen to influence through his rank, coupled with a great sanctity of demeanour. The early days of Abd-el-kader are lost in obscurity, but by 1828 he had not only acquired the reputation of a scholar, but that of a saint, from his having twice made a pilgrimage to Mecca, the birthplace of the Prophet. In England, however, he is best known by the persevering courage with which he opposed the aggressions of the French upon his country. Accompanied by his father, he preached a holy war, and called upon the faithful to rise and expel the infidels. In 1832, he found himself at the head of 10,000 warriors, with whom he attacked Oran, or Warrun, but who were several times repulsed with great slaughter. Notwithstanding his discomfiture, however, he might be said to be a gainer, for he had not only increased his reputation for skill and bravery, but had taught his Arabs to face artillery—an act from which they had hitherto recoiled. In 1834, he entered into a treaty with the French, in which he was recognized as emir of Mascara, with the sovereignty of Oran, and a monopoly of commerce with the interior granted him. This treaty added to the importance of the emir in the eyes of the natives, who naturally looked upon their chief as a personage of high consequence, from his having compelled the enemy to recognize him as a sovereign. His success, however, excited the jealousy and envy of some of his brothers in arms, who rose against his authority, but whom he was soon enabled to subdue. For a period of fifteen years he contrived to defend his country, and fight against the encroachments of France, but in 1847 he was compelled to surrender himself a prisoner to General Lamoricière, on condition of being sent to Alexandria or St. Jean-d'Acre. The French government, however, refused to ratify the terms of the treaty, and Abd-el-Kader was consigned a prisoner to the works of Fort Lamalogue, at Toulon. After suffering imprisonment for four years, in 1852 Louis Napoleon restored him to freedom, on condition that he would not return to Algiers, or conspire against the French. The brave, but fallen

Arab consented, and Brussa, in Asia Minor, was assigned him for his future residence. For that place he accordingly set out in 1853, but has since been permitted to remove to Constantinople. In 1855 he visited Paris, to see the Exposition, and has since, with the philosophy of Oriental calmness, resigned himself to his fate. B. in the neighbourhood of Mascara, province of Oran, 1807.

ABDERA, ăb-dē'-ra, an ancient city of Thrace.—Here Democritus, the Epicurean philosopher, was born.

ABDERUS, ăb-dē'-rus, arm-bearer to Hercules, and torn to pieces by the horses of Diomedes, which the hero intrusted to his care when going to war with the Bistones.

ABDIAS, ăb'-dē-as, of Babylon, a pretender to be one of the seventy-two disciples sent out by Jesus Christ, and to have been appointed by Simon and Jude the first bishop of Babylon.—He is the author of a legend entitled "Historia Certaminis Apostolici," printed at Basil, 1571.

ABDIE, ăb-dē, a parish in the county of Fife, Scotland, in which the battle of Blackearnside was fought in the time of Wallace, between the Scots and English. Pop. 1,500.

ABDOLMUMEM, ăb-dol'-mu-mem, or ABDALMOM, though the son of a potter, became a general, and at last a monarch, by the style of Emir al Mumenin (head of the true believers). He took Morocco, and destroyed the whole of the Almoravide family. D. 1156.

ABDUL-MEJID, ăb-dul-mej'-jid, the present sultan of Turkey, succeeded his father, Mahmoud II., on the 1st July, 1839. Like most of the sons of sultans, he was brought up in the harem, and although his father had desired that he should receive an English education, that sovereign was compelled to resign his wishes, and yield to the power of a Mahometan priesthood, who revolted against such an innovation upon the established usages of their country. When he ascended the throne, Turkey was in a very precarious condition. The minds of its people were unsettled by the reforms of his father, whose resolute will was sufficient to keep in check the spirit of open rebellion, but whose demise now seemed to have opened a road for a return to the old system of things. The revolt of Mehemet Ali was checked, however, by the interference of the principal European powers, and the ancient dynasty was saved. The dangers from assassination which beset the first few years of the sultan's reign were happily averted, and Abdul-Mejid gradually rose in popular estimation, until he came to be regarded, not only with respect, but with affection by his people. Revolts in different parts of his dominions were suppressed, and the strong desire he has always evinced to improve the condition of his subjects, has been testified to by English statesmen, eminent themselves in the annals of social reform. However popular the name of the sultan might be in his own country, it was not until the breaking out of the war with Russia that he came to be more especially regarded, in this country, with a feeling of deep interest. It had long been considered a design of the emperors of Russia to appropriate as much of Turkey as possible on the north side of the Bosphorus, and the time seemed to have arrived when an attempt should be made to effect the long-coveted object. Accordingly, in 1853, the emperor Nicholas availed himself of a slight dispute which had arisen about the guardianship of the "Holy Places," to advance his claim to the protectorship of the Greek Christians in Turkey. This was refused by the sultan, and the Russian war was the result. The firmness with which he preserved his position throughout this trying period procured for him universal sympathy, and the consequence was, that France and England united with Turkey in repelling the pretensions of Russia. The war was prosecuted with vigour until 1855, when the allies were joined by a contingent from Sardinia. In the same year Sebastopol fell, and peace was concluded shortly afterwards. Abdul-Mejid, although apparently of a weak and compliant disposition, has shown that he can be firm when he likes. His refusal to surrender the Hungarian refugees, after the revolution of 1848, is a proof of this; and throughout the Russian war his conduct was marked by many traits which could not fail to give additional lustre to his character in the eyes of his subjects, whilst in those of his allies, they raised his reputation both as a man and a sovereign. B. 1823.

ABEDNEGO, ai-bed'-ne-go, signifying the "servant of light," is the Chaldee name conferred by the king of Babylon's officer upon Azariah, one of the three companions of Daniel.

ABEILLE, Gaspard, ă'-bail, a native of Reiz, in Provence, who went to Paris when very young, and became secretary to the Marshal de Luxembourg.—Known as a writer of odes, epistles, and some dramatic pieces. D. at Paris in 1718.

ABEILLE, Scipio, brother of the above, surgeon-major in the army, and author of "The Complete Army Surgeon," and a "History of the Bones." D. in 1697.

ABEL, ai'-bel, signifying "mourning," the second son of our first parents. He was murdered by his brother Cain, from envy, because Abel's offering was accepted and Cain's rejected.

ABEL, Frederic Gottfried, a German physician and poet, but bred a divine. Not obtaining the preferment he expected, he turned his attention to physic, in which he took his doctor's degree at Konigsberg, and practised at Halberstadt with great reputation. He published a German translation of Juvenal in 1788. B. at Halberstadt, 1714; D. 1794.

ABEL, king of Denmark, the son of Valdimir II. He assassinated his brother Eric, in 1750, and took possession of his throne. He was put to death by the Frisons, who revolted against him on account of the heavy taxes imposed upon them.

ABEL, Charles Frederic, an eminent musician. D. in 1787.

ABEL, Dr. Clarke, medical officer and historian of Lord Amherst's embassy to China. He was an accomplished naturalist, a close observer of nature, and a profound thinker, besides being characterized by a highly philanthropic mind. D. 1826.

ABELA, George Francis, ăb'-e-la, commander of the order of Malta, and author of a work entitled "Maltha Illustrata," 1647, folio, or a description of that island and its antiquities. D. in the 17th century.

ABELARD, Peter, ăb'-e-lard, or ab'-ai-lard. A celebrated logician, mathematician, and divine, who has become memorable in biographical annals, from the romantic loves which existed between him and a young damsel named Heloise. This girl was the niece of a wealthy canon, named Fulbert, who desired that Abelard should instruct her in philosophy; but instead of leading her through the intricate paths of learning, he taught her to love, and he himself became so intoxicated with this passion, that his lectures, which had attracted admiring crowds, lost their charm, and Fulbert, perceiving the cause, turned him from his house. Heloise followed him, and he conveyed her to his sister's, in Brittany, where she gave birth to a son, whom she called Astrolabius. Abelard now proposed to Fulbert to marry Heloise, and although he accepted the offer, the lady herself rejected it. She afterwards, indeed, consented to a private marriage, but never would own it, and did not scruple sometimes to swear that it was not true. This increased greatly the rage of Fulbert; and Abelard sent her, in consequence, to the monastery of Argenteuil, where she put on the religious habit, but did not take the veil. Fulbert now caused Abelard to be cruelly mutilated by ruffians, when he became a monk in the abbey of St. Denis, which he soon left, and retired to Champaigne, where he, once more, became a successful lecturer. His fame procured him numerous enemies, particularly the professors at Rheims, who charged him with heterodoxy on the subject of the Trinity, and he was censured at the council of Soissons, in 1121. Subsequently he erected an oratory in the diocese of Troyes, called the Paraclete, "the comforter," but was soon driven from it, and next became abbot of Ruis, in the diocese of Vannes, and gave Heloise and some other nuns the Paraclete. After a life of many vicissitudes, Abelard died. Heloise lived many years after him. His body being sent to her after his death, she deposited it in the Paraclete. B. at Palais, near Nantz, 1079; D. in the priory of St. Marcellus, 1142.—Pope, in his epistles, and other poets, have immortalized the names of these unfortunate lovers. An elegant Gothic monument to their memory, built of the ruins of the abbey of the Paraclete, is one of the most interesting objects in the cemetery of Père-la-Chaise, Paris. The principal works of Abelard are composed in Latin, and consist of, "An Address to the Paraclete on the Study of the Scriptures," "Sermons and Festivals," &c.

ABELL, John, ai'-bell, an English musician, celebrated as a singer and as a player on the lute. Although he amassed considerable sums, his improvidence frequently reduced him to painful necessities. Travelling on one occasion on the continent, he arrived at Warsaw, when he was sent for by the king of Poland to come to court. Abell, however, refused to comply, when peremptory orders were given to compel his attendance. On his arrival he was seated in a chair in a spacious hall, and drawn up by machinery to a great height, when the king and his train appeared in a gallery opposite to him. Several wild bears were then turned into the hall, and the king told him to take his choice, either to sing or be let down among the bears. Abell preferred the former alternative, and used to say that he never sung so well in his life. The year of his death is unknown, but in 1701 he published a collection of songs in several languages.

ABELLA, à-bel'-a, anciently a town of Campania, near the river Clanius; now Avello, in Naples.

ABELLI, Louis, ăb'-el-le, a French prelate, who wrote "Medulla Theologica." He obtained the bishopric of Rhodes in 1664, but resigned it three years afterwards, and retired to St. Lazare. B. 1608; D. at St. Lazare, 1691.

ABEN, Esra, ai-ben, a Jewish scholar, who passed a considerable portion of his life in travelling in various countries, and who is best known to us by his commentary on the Old Testament, which he would seem to have written in the Hebrew language, between 1140 and 1167. He also wrote on astronomy, philosophy, mathematics, medicine, philology, and astrology. B. at Toledo, 1119; D. 1194.

ABENAS, ăb'-e-na, a town of Languedoc, in France, at the foot of the Cevennes. Lat. 44° 37′ N. Lon. 4° 20′ E.

ABENCERAGES, ăb'-en-cer-age-es, the name given by Spanish chroniclers and writers of romance to a noble family in the Moorish kingdom of Granada, several of whom distinguished themselves immediately before the fall of the Mahometan empire in Spain.

ABENGNEFIL, ăb'-en-ne'-fil, an Arabian physician of the 12th century.—Author of a book, the translation of which, entitled "De Virtutibus Medicinarum et Ciborum," was printed at Venice in 1581, folio.

ABEN-MELEC, ăb'-en-me'-lek, a Jewish rabbi.—Author of a Hebrew commentary on the Bible, entitled "The Perfection of Beauty," Amsterdam, 1661, folio.

ABENOW, ăb'-e-nou, a mountain of Suabia, in Germany, 23 miles from Friburg, famous for the source of the Danube, and for giving name to a long chain of mountains.

ABENRADE, ăb'-en-rad, or APENRADE, the principal town of a district of the same name in the duchy of Sleswick, in Denmark. Lat. 54° 52′ N. Lon. 10° 7′ E.

ABENSBERG, ăb'-ens-berg, a town of Bavaria, on the river Abense. Manf. Chiefly woollens. Pop. 1,200.—Here the Austrians were defeated by Napoleon I., in April, 1809.

ABENSE, ăb'-ens, a river in Bavaria.

ABER, ăb -er, an old British word, which signifies the fall of a smaller into a larger water; also the mouth of a river, whence some places derive a characteristic in their names; as, Aber-conway, Aber-gavenny, &c.

ABERAERON, or ABERAYRON, ăb'-er-air'-on, a county and seaport town of Wales, at the mouth of the Aeron, 13 miles from Aberystwith. Exp. Lead ore, oats, and butter. Imp. Coal and limestone. Pop. 534.—Anciently there stood here the castle of Cadwgan, of which some ruins still remain.

ABER-AVON, ăb'-er-av'-von, a town of Glamorganshire, Wales, at the mouth of the river Avon, in Swansea Bay. It imports ore from Cornwall, and exports coal, copper, and tin. Pop. parish and borough, 6,100.

ABERBROTHICK, ăb'-er-broth'-ik, or ARBROATH, ar-brarth, a royal burgh in the shire of Forfar, in Scotland. Here was formerly the largest and richest monastery in Scotland, founded about 1178. Arbroath is a thriving place. Manf. Brown linens, canvas, osnaburgs, &c. Pop. parish and borough, 25,693.

ABERCONWAY, ăb'-er-kon'-way, or CONWAY, a small seaport of Wales, in Caernarvon, at the mouth of the river Conway. It has lofty walls, and the remains of a castle project from a rock into the river. Pop. about 1,200. Lat. 53° 20′ N. Lon. 3° 47′ W.

ABERCORN, ăb'-er-korn, a town of Linlithgowshire, or West Lothian, Scotland, 5 miles N.E. of Linlithgow. Pop. 980.

ABERCORN, a small town of Georgia, N. America, about 13 miles N.W. of Savannah.

ABERCROMBIE, James. (See DUNFERMLINE, Lord.)

ABERCROMBIE, Thomas, ăb'-er-krom -be, a Scottish physician. D. 1726.—Author of "Martial Achievements of Scotland," and a "Treatise on Wit." He became the medical adviser of James II. of England.

ABERCROMBIE, Ralph, a British general, descended from an ancient family in Scotland. The first commission of Sir Ralph was a cornetcy in the Guards, and in 1760 he obtained a lieutenancy. Passing through several degrees of rank, which he attained by his great military talents, he was made a Knight of the Bath in 1795. In 1797 he was raised to the rank of lieutenant-general. He was then employed under the Duke of York in the enterprise against Holland, where it was confessed, even by the enemy, that his abilities were of the most brilliant order. It being resolved to send an army to dispossess the French of Egypt, Sir Ralph was appointed to the command of the expedition. He landed at the head of his troops, March 8th, 1801, and defeated the French at Aboukir. On the 21st of the same month was fought, near Alexandria, a memorable battle, in which the English were again the victors, but in which their general was wounded. This took place early in the action, but he concealed the circumstance from his troops until some time after the battle was over. It was then found to be too late for surgical skill to be of any avail to him. He was immediately conveyed to the ship of the admiral, Lord Keith, where he lingered till the 28th, when he expired. His body was conveyed to Malta, and buried under the ramparts of St. Elmo, near the town of Valetta. B. at Tullibodie, Scot., 1738; D. 1801.—A monument to his memory is to be seen in St. Paul's Cathedral.

ABERCROMBIE, Sir Robert, the younger brother of Sir Ralph, for thirty years governor of Edinburgh Castle. D. 1827.

ABERDARE, ăb'-er-dair, a town and parish in Glamorganshire, on the Cynon, 4 miles from Merthyr. It has coal and iron mines, and is the terminus of the Taff Vale and Aberdare Railway. Its canal is connected with that of Glamorganshire. Pop. about 16,000.

ABERDEEN, ăb'-er-deen, the capital of Aberdeenshire; is formed of the Old and New towns. The former, which is about a mile N. of the latter, is situate on the Don, where it falls into the North Sea. It has a university, to which belong two colleges, King's, in the Old Town, and Marischal, in the New. The New Town is regularly built of granite, with wide and spacious streets, remarkable for their beauty and cleanliness. Here Byron spent a portion of his juvenile days. A granite pier of 1,500 feet in length, and a breakwater, render the harbour one of the safest in this part of Scotland. Girdleness Lighthouse, with two lights, stands at its entrance. Manf. Woollen, cotton, and linen goods, carpets, rope, machinery, paper, soap, and sailcloth, with large iron-foundries, distilleries, and breweries. It does, also, a large trade in exporting granite. Its exports are estimated at from £1,500,000 to £2,000,000 annually. Pop. Old and New towns, with parishes inclusive, 92,798. Lat. 57° 8′, 9″ N. Lon. 2° 5′ 7″ W. —Aberdeen first rises to notice in the eleventh century. In the fourteenth century it was destroyed by Edward III. of England.

ABERDEENSHIRE, a maritime county of Scotland, containing the districts of Mar, Garioch, Strathbogie, and the greater part of Buchan. It occupies the central portion of an extensive promontory running out into the North Sea, between the friths of Tay and Moray. Area, 1,985 square miles, being the fifth in size of the Scotch counties. Desc. Generally hilly and mountainous in the south-west. There is much excellent pasture in the high parts; and the level tract, Strathbogie, contains many well-cultivated fields. Its principal rivers are the Dee, the Don, the Ythan, the Ugie, and the Deveron, with their respective tributaries. Some of its parishes are almost wholly covered with wood, the natural consisting of alder, poplar, birch, and mountain-ash; and the planted, chiefly of Scotch firs and larch. The fir timber of the forest of Mar, for quality and size, stands highest in the British isles. Pop. 213,000.

ARMS OF THE EARL OF ABERDEEN.

ABERDEEN, Earl of, George Hamilton Gordon, succeeded to the title on the death of his grandfather in 1802, and in 1814 was created Viscount Gordon, in the right of which he sits in the House of Lords. On account of his former classic researches into antiquarian remains, he was pronounced in Lord Byron's "English Bards and Scotch Reviewers," "the travell'd Thane, Athenian Aberdeen." It is as a politician and statesman, however, that he is best known. In 1813 he was sent on a special mission to Vienna, and was the means of bringing over Austria to the alliance against France. Subsequently he was recognized as a stanch adherent of the Tory party, and accepted, under the first administration of the Duke of Wellington, the office of Secretary for Foreign Affairs, which he retained till the ministry resigned, in 1830. Whilst in office he assisted in establishing the independence of Greece. Under the brief administration of Sir Robert Peel (1834-5), he was Colonial Secretary, and on the restoration to power of that statesman, in 1841, he once more became Foreign Secretary, which office he held until the ministry fell, in 1846. On the death of Sir Robert, the Earl of Aberdeen was considered to be the virtual representative of what was known as the Peel party, and on the fall of the Derby ministry, in 1852, he was empowered to form a new administration. This he effected, and it is well known with what steadiness of purpose he endeavoured to prevent the country from entering upon the conflict with Russia. All these efforts, however, were unavailing, and war was declared against the northern autocrat. Under the remainder of his administration the public believed that the war was not conducted with that degree of vigour necessary to insure favourable results. Failing to receive sufficient support to enable him to carry out his measures, the earl resigned in 1855. Since then he has taken no very prominent part in political affairs. B. 1784; he is, therefore, now in his 75th year.—As an author, the earl is known by a work entitled, "An Inquiry into the Principles of Beauty in Grecian Architecture," embodying the result of his antiquarian researches in Greece.

ABERDOUR, ăb'-er-dour, a parish in Fifeshire, on the Frith of Forth, about 10 miles from Edinburgh. Pop. 1,100.—Another in Aberdeenshire, where are millstone quarries. Pop. 1,900.

ABERFORD, ăb'-er-ford, or ABYRFORTH, a market and parish town in the W. riding of Yorkshire, noted for a manufactory of pins. Pop. 996.

ABERFOYLE, ăb'-er-foil, a village, parish, and defile in the Grampian Hills, Scot. Pop. 500.—In this parish are lochs Katrine and Achray, and one of the most interesting scenes in the "Rob Roy" of Sir W. Scott is laid here.

ABERFRAW, ăb'-er-fraw, a village of Anglesey, anciently famous for the castle, or palace, of the princes of North Wales, who were styled kings of Aberfraw.

ABERGAVENNY, ăb'-er-ga-ven'-ne, com. pron. ăb'-er-gen'-ne, a town in Monmouthshire, seated on the river Gavenny, where it falls into the Usk, 16 miles W. of Monmouth. It has a trade in flannels. Pop. 4,800.

ABERGELE, ăb'-er-gel'-e, a sea-bathing village of Denbighshire. Pop. with parish, 2,855.

ABERGWILLE, ăb'-er-gwil'-le, or ABERGERLECH, in Carmarthenshire, where is an episcopal palace belonging to the see of St. David's.

ABERLADY, ăb'-er-la'-de, a village in E. Lothian. It has a small bay, which forms the port of Haddington.

ABERLEY, ăb'-er-le, ABURLEY, or ABBOTSLEY, Worcestershire, 5 miles from Bewdley.

ABERLI, John, ăb'-er-le, a Swiss landscape painter of considerable eminence. B. at Winterthur 1723; D. at Berne, 1786.

ABERLOUR, ăb'-er-lour, a town and parish in Banff, Scotland.

ABERNETHY, ăb'-er-ne'-the, a town on the river Spey, in Murrayshire.—Near this place is erected a famous monument, called Macduff's Cross, where, formerly, if any one within the ninth degree of relationship to the laird Macduff, fled for manslaughter, he was pardoned, on paying a few head of cattle, by way of fine. The mountain Cairngorm rises in its parish.

ABERNETHY, a town of Perthshire, on the Tay, said to be formerly the residence of the kings of the Picts.

ABERNETHY, John, a divine, was born in 1680, at Coleraine, in Ireland, educated at Glasgow, where he took the degree of M.A., and then went to Edinburgh, and studied divinity. In 1708 he became pastor of a congregation at Antrim, but subsequently accepted an invitation from the congregation of Wood-street, Dublin. B. at Coleraine, Ireland, 1680; D. at Dublin, 1740.—Two volumes of his sermons were printed at London in 1748, and are held in great estimation.

ABERNETHY, John, F.R.S., a surgeon of distinguished practice and reputation. In 1786 he succeeded Mr. Pott as assistant-surgeon at St. Bartholomew's Hospital, and, shortly afterwards, took the place of that gentleman as lecturer in surgery and anatomy. On the decease of Sir Charles Blick, his former instructor, Abernethy was elected master surgeon, when St. Bartholomew's Hospital began to increase in reputation, and soon acquired a degree of celebrity far beyond anything it had hitherto attained. He was the first to enunciate and establish the great principle "that local diseases are symptoms of a disordered constitution, not primary and independent maladies, and that they are to be cured by remedies calculated to make a salutary impression on the general frame, not by topical dressing, nor any mere manipulations of surgery." To this he added a second, namely, "that this disordered state of the constitution either originates from, or is rigorously allied to, derangements of the stomach and bowels, and that it can only be reached by remedies which first exercise a curative influence upon these organs." These principles revolutionized the whole field of surgery, and raised it from the rank of a manual art to the position of a science.—In private life the character of this eminent man was as spotless as his public life was humane and useful. B. at Abernethy, in Scotland, 1764; D. 1831.

ABERYSTWITH, ăb'-er-ist'-with, a town of Cardiganshire, seated on the river Rheidol, near its confluence with the Istwith, and where they both fall into the sea. Its principal trade is in lead, fish, oak-bark, flannel, corn, and butter. It is a fashionable watering-place.

ABEX, ai'-bex, a name of a country of Africa, south of Egypt, bordering on the Red Sea, about 500 miles long and 100 miles broad. It contains large forests of ebony-trees.

ABGARUS, ăb'-gă-rus, king of Edessa, in Mesopotamia. This sovereign, it is said, wrote a letter to our Saviour, and received an answer, which, with the other, is extant and well known. Both letters, however, have been thought to be forgeries. Flourished in the time of our Saviour.

ABGILLUS, ăb'-gil-lus, surnamed Prester John, a king of the Frisons. He attended Charlemagne to the Holy Land, and did not return with him, but made great conquests in Abyssinia, which was called from him the empire of Prester John. He is said to have written the history of Charlemagne's journey, and of his own to the East. Lived in the 8th century.

ABHER, ăb'-her, HABAR, or EBHER, a city of Persian Irak, or ancient Parthia, with a small river of the same name running through its middle. It is governed by a deroga, and is said to contain upwards of 1,000 well-built houses.

ABHER LOCH, ăb'-her-lok, a lake of Lorn, in Argyleshire, Scotland. It is about 24 miles from its rise to the outlet in the Western Ocean, and it receives a great many small rivers.

ABIAD, ai'-be-ad, a town on the coast of Abex, seated on a high mountain, and remarkable for its trade in ebony and aromatic plants.

ABIAD, BAHR EL, bar-el-ai'-be-ad, or the WHITE RIVER, a name of the Nile.

ABIATHAR, ă-bi'-a-thar, "father of abundance," a Jewish high-priest, was the son of Abimelech, who was killed by Saul. He succeeded his father, and attached himself to David, but on his death, attempting to put Adonijah on the throne, he was deposed and banished by Solomon, 1014 B.C.

ABIGAIL, ăb'-e-gale, signifying "my father's joy," the wife of Nabal, and afterwards of David, a woman of great personal attractions and sound understanding.—Another, of the same name, a sister of David, and the mother of Amasa.

ABII, ai'-be-i, a nomadic people of Scythia. They carried all their possessions in waggons; subsisted on the flesh of their herds and flocks, on milk and cheese, and knew nothing of commerce. They were remarkable for their integrity and forbearance; never entering into wars, but when compelled. According to Arrian and Curtius, they surrendered to Alexander, after they had been independent since the reign of Cyrus.

ABIJAH, ă-bi'-juh, "the Lord my father," king of Judah, was the son of Rehoboam. In the second year of his reign he defeated Jeroboam, king of Israel. Began to reign 958 B.C.

ABILA, or ABYLA, ă-bi'-la, a mountain of Africa, opposite that which is called Calpe, on the coast of Spain, only 18 miles distant. These two mountains are named the Pillars of Hercules, and were supposed formerly to have been united, till the hero separated them, and thereby effected a communication between the Mediterranean and Atlantic seas.

ABILDGAARD, Philip Christian, ăb'-il-gord, a physician of Denmark, and one of the most accomplished naturalists of the 18th century.

ABILDGAARD, Nicholas Abraham, a brother of Philip, author of some useful works on art, and an historical painter of considerable ability. B. 1744; D. 1809.

ABIMELECH, ai-bim'-e-lek, a general title, signifying, "my father the king," of the sovereigns of the Philistines.

ABINGER, ăb'-in-ger, Surrey, near Dorking.

ABINGER, Lord, James Scarlett, an able advocate, who rose to be a peer of the realm, and chief baron of the Exchequer, taking his title from Abinger, in Surrey. B. in Jamaica, 1769; D. at Bury St. Edmunds, while on his circuit, 1844.

ABINGDON, ăb'-ing-don, or ABINGTON, formerly Shrovesham, a town and borough of Berkshire, on the Thames. It is a station on the Great Western Railway. Pop. 6,000.—Another on the Holston river, Virginia, U.S. Pop. 1,000.

ABINGTON, a town of Philadelphia county, in Pennsylvania, and another in the state of Maryland, United States.—Another in Limerick, Munster, 91 miles from Dublin.—Another in Scotland, with a station on the Caledonian Railway, near which gold-mines were worked in the time of James VI.

ABINGTON, Frances, a comic actress of great celebrity, whose maiden name was Barton, and whose father was a common soldier. She began life as an errand-girl to a French milliner, at whose establishment she was enabled to pick up the language used by her mistress. She next was a flower-girl in St. James's Park, and subsequently made her appearance at the Haymarket theatre, in the character of Miranda, in the "Busy-body." The first step of her fame, however, was made in the character of Kitty, in "High Life Below Stairs." Her last appearance was in April, 1799. B. 1731, or according to some, 1738; D. 1815.

ABINGWORTH, ăb'-ing-worth, Surrey, near Godalming and Stoke.

ABIPONIANS, ăb'-e-po'-ne-ans, or ABIPONS, or pons, an aboriginal tribe of South America, inhabiting the centre of Paraguay, near the parallel 28° S.

ABLANCOURT, Perrot Nicholas d', ab'-lăn-koor, one of the best French translators of the classic authors of the 17th century. He was proposed by Colbert to Louis XIV., to be the historian of his reign, but that monarch would not entertain the proposition, on account of the author being a Protestant. B. at Chalons-sur-Marne, in Champagne, 1606; D. at Ablancourt, 1664.

ABLAVIUS, ăb-lai'-ve-us, a minister of state under Constantine the Great, and treacherously put to death by the son of that sovereign.

ABLE, or ABEL, Thomas, ai'-bel, chaplain to Catherine of Arragon, whom he taught music and the languages. His attachment to his royal mistress brought him into great trouble. He suffered death for denying the king's supremacy, 1534.—He wrote a treatise against the divorce of the queen, and was attainted for being implicated in the affair of the Holy Maid of Kent.

ABNER, ăb'-ner, the uncle of Saul, whom he served with great loyalty against David. Murdered by Joab, 1018 B.C.

ABNEY, ăb'-ne, Sir Thomas, a distinguished magistrate of London, lord mayor, member for the City, and one of the first promoters, and subsequently a director, of the Bank of England. When the Pretender was proclaimed king of Great Britain by the king of France, he proposed an address to King William, which was adopted and followed by other corporations, which was so encouraging to the king that he dissolved the Parliament, and took the sense of the people upon the state of parties, which proved to be almost universally in favour of the Protestant succession. D. 1722.

ABO, o'-boo, the capital of Finland, lies at the extremity of the promontory formed by the gulfs of Bothnia and Finland, on the river Aura-jocki, which runs through the town.—Manf. Sugar, tobacco, sailcloth; and deals in provisions, pitch, tar, &c. There are also saw-mills and shipbuilding-yards. Pop. 14,000. Lat. 60° 27′ N. Lon. 22° 19′ E.

ABO (District of), one of the divisions of Finland, and of greater fertility than other parts of that country. Potatoes, flax, hemp, corn, and cabbage, are the principal crops. The real wealth of the country, however, is in its forests, which extend over a large portion of its surface. Pop. 212,000.

ABOMEY, ab'-o-mai', capital of the kingdom of Dahomey, in Africa, built without order or regularity. Pop. 24,000. Lat. 7° 30′ N. Lon. 0° 55′ E.

ABOO, a'-boo, a mountain in the territory of Serohee, in Rajpootana, whose highest point of elevation is said to be 5,000 feet. It is celebrated as a place of worship for the Jains, and for its temple, which is constructed in the form of a cross, and which, according to Colonel Tod, is one of the most superb—if not the most superb—temples in India. Lat. 24° 45′ N. Lon. 72° 49′ E.

ABOOPOOR, a'-boo-poor, an Indian village, on the route from Meerut to Delhi. Lat. 28° 48′ N. Lon. 77° 35′ E.

ABORIGINES, ăb'-o-ridj'-e-nees, the original inhabitants of Italy, under the reign of Saturn.—Their posterity were called Latins, from Latinus, one of their kings. They assisted Æneas against Turnus. Rome was built in their country. The word signifies, without origin, or of unknown origin: it is now employed to denote the original inhabitants, as distinguished from new settlers.

ABOS, ai'-los, a musician of the eighteenth century, and author of the opera, "Lito chenibo."

ABOUGHEHEL, ă-boo'-ghai'-hel, an Arabian idolater, and a bitter enemy to Mahomet.—The Mahometans, by way of contempt, call coloquintida, the melon or cucumber of Aboughehel.

ABOU-HANIFAH, ă-boo-han'-e-fa, was the son of Thabet, and esteemed among the Mussulmans for his expositions of their law, but persecuted for denying predestination. B. at Coufa, A.D. 699; D. in prison, at Bagdad.—A caliph who reigned 385 years after the death of this learned man, erected a mausoleum to his memory, and founded a college for his followers.

ABOU-JOSEPH, ă-boo-jo-sef, a Mussulman doctor, who was the first that had the title of Kadhi al kodhat, or judge of the judges. He lived in the caliphate of Haroun-al-Raschid.

ABOUKIR, ă'-boo-kir', a small town of Egypt, with a castle, situate about 10 miles N.E. of Alexandria, where Sir Ralph Abercrombie disembarked his troops for the invasion of Egypt, on March 8th, 1801.—Also a small island, near the town, and a BAY, formed on its west side. In it was fought the famous battle of the Nile, by Lord Nelson, on August 1st, 1798. On this occasion the French captains, who were assembled on board the ship of their admiral, had scarcely time to take their several posts before the British began the attack. Their fleet formed a curve as near as possible to the small island; but Nelson, with half his force, broke through their line, and with the other half attacked them in front; so that on both sides the enemy was assailed. At about half-past six in the evening the battle began, and by the time that an hour had elapsed, five French ships were dismasted and captured. The French admiral, Brueys, was killed, and at about ten o'clock, his ship, L'Orient, 120 guns, blew up. Of 1,000 men, only 70 or 80 were saved. By the morning the fleet was entirely defeated, only two ships of the line and two frigates escaping to Malta and Corfu. When the sun was setting on the previous evening, just before this terrific conflict commenced, no fewer than thirteen ships of the line, fourteen frigates, and 400 transports, extending over six leagues of sea, were assembled, of the enemy, which mighty armada Nelson entirely annihilated in a few hours. On the shore, Napoleon, on July 25th, 1799, defeated the Turks with great slaughter.

ABOULAINA, ă-boo-lai'-na, a Mahometan doctor, famous for his wit.

ABOULOLA, ă-boo'-lo'-la, the surname of Ahmed ben Soliman, an Arabian poet, who, losing his sight when only three years old, embraced the notions of the Brahmins respecting the metempsychosis, and lived during the remainder of his life on vegetables. D. 1057.

ABOUSIMBUL, ai-boo'-sim'-bel, IPSAMBUL, or EBSAMBUL, in Nubia, and remarkable for containing singular specimens of temples sculptured in the rocks. They are fashioned out of the solid mass of the mountain, and their architecture is of that kind which, no doubt, suggested to the Egyptian sculptors the style called propyla. These temples, of which there are two, are colossal monuments of that genius which delighted to represent ideal grandeur in material forms of strength and vastness. In front of the great temple sit four colossi, figures of Rameses the Great. Their grandeur is beyond expression, and the delight in the lofty character of their beauty quite consumes the natural wonder at their uninterrupted duration for twenty or thirty centuries. It is impossible to contemplate them without feeling that they were conceived by colossal minds.

ABOUSHEHR. (See BUSHIRE.)

ABOUSIR, ăb'-oo-seer, a small place on the Egyptian delta, where are some remains of the ancient Busiris.

ABRABANEL, Isaac, ă-bra-bă'-nel, a learned rabbi, and a member of the council of Alphonsus, king of Portugal. Falling into disgrace on the death of that monarch, he fled to Castille, where he was protected by Ferdinand and Isabella. In 1492 he was obliged to quit Spain, in consequence of an edict against the Jews, and continued to pass a life of vicissitude. B. at Lisbon, 1437; D. at Venice, 1508.—He is author of a commentary on the Scriptures.

ABRAHAM, ai'-brā-ham', the patriarch, was at first called Abram, which was altered by divine appointment. His father, Terah, in his old age, went to reside at Haran, in Canaan, where Abram received a promise that he should be the father of a great nation; on which he, with his wife Sarah, and his nephew Lot, left Haran, and dwelt at Sichem. A famine drove them thence into Egypt, and on their return, a dispute having arisen between the servants of Abram and those of Lot, the two kinsmen were induced to part. Lot being taken prisoner by the prince of Elam, Abram armed his servants, and retook his nephew, with a great spoil. Having no prospect of a child by Sarah, he took Hagar, an Egyptian, by whom he had Ishmael; but at the age of ninety, he received a promise that Sarah should have a son, and, in consequence, his name was changed to Abraham, which signifies "the father of a great multitude." At this time circumcision was instituted. Going afterwards to Gerar, Sarah was delivered of a son, named Isaac. When Isaac was grown to maturity, Abraham was commanded, as a trial of his faith, to offer him up as a sacrifice; but as he was about to obey the mandate, an angel stayed his hand, and provided a ram for a burnt-offering. After the death of Sarah, Abraham married Keturah, by whom he had six sons. B. at Ur, in Chaldea, A.M. 2004; D. about A.M. 2179.

ABRAHAM, Nicholas, a learned Jesuit, and theological professor in the university of Pont-à-Mousson. B. in Lorraine, 1589; D. at Pont-à-Mousson, 1655.—He wrote a commentary on Virgil, and some of the orations of Cicero.

ABRAHAM, Ben Chaila, a Spanish rabbi and astrologer, who predicted the birth of the Messiah, but did not live to be disappointed by the non-fulfilment of his prophecy. Flourished in the 14th century.—He wrote a treatise on the figure of the earth.

ABRAHAM, a musician at Paris, composer of airs for the clarionet, and author of a method for the bassoon. D. 1805.

ABRAHAM USQUE, a Portuguese Jew, but thought by some to have been a Christian.—He published, in conjunction with Tobias Athias, in 1553, a translation of the Bible into Spanish.

ABRAM. (See ABRAHAM the Patriarch.)

ABRANTES, ă-bran'-tes, a fortified town on the Tagus, in Portuguese Estremadura, 80 miles N.E. of Lisbon. Exp. Grain, fruits, and oil. Pop. 5,000.—Another town in Brazil.

Abrasdates, ă-brăs'-dăt'-tes, king of Susa, who, when his wife Panthea had been taken prisoner by Cyrus, and humanely treated, surrendered himself and his troops to the conqueror. He was killed in the first battle he undertook in the cause of Cyrus, and his wife stabbed herself on his corpse. Cyrus raised a monument on their tomb.

Abrentius, ab-ren'-she-us, a man made governor of Tarentum, by Hannibal. To gain the favours of a beautiful woman, whose brother was in the Roman army, he betrayed his trust to the enemy.

Abresch, Frederick Louis, aub'-resh, a Dutch critic and excellent Greek scholar. His scholia on Greek authors are highly esteemed. B. at Hamburg, 1699; D. in Switzerland, 1782.

Abrodiætus, ăb-ro'-de-ee'-tus, a name given to Parrhasius, the painter, on account of the sumptuous manner of his living.

Abrosi, John, ăb-ro'-se', an Italian physician and astronomer, who lived in the beginning of the 16th century.—His "Dialogue on Astrology," 4to, Venice, 1494, is in the "Index Expurgatorius."

Abrota, ab'-ro-ta, the wife of Nisus, the youngest of the sons of Ægeus. After her death, Nisus decreed that the garments she had worn should become the fashion in Megari. This was done as a monument to her chastity.

Abrug-Banya, ăb-roo'-băn'-yă, a small town in Transylvania, with gold and silver mines. Lat. 46° 23′ N. Lon. 22° 10′ E.

Abruzzo, ă-broot'-zo, one of the four great provinces of the kingdom of Naples, bounded on the east by the Adriatic, north and west by the States of the Church, and south by the provinces of Terra di Lavoro and Capitanata. It is divided into two districts, Abruzzo Citra, and Abruzzo Ultra. Area, 4,990 square miles. Desc. Mountainous, intersected with beautiful valleys of great fertility. On the slopes of the hills the fir and the oak appear in vast forests; but where they are devoted to pasture, flocks and herds are numerous.

SHEPHERD OF ABRUZZO.

The mountains yield many valuable medicinal plants: wild boars, bears, and wolves, are abundant and dangerous. The shepherds on the heights are clothed in the skins of sheep, and protect their feet with sandals of untanned leather, tied round the legs with small cords. Like all mountaineers, they are a frugal and hardy race. Pro. Wheat, wine, tobacco, saffron, oil, almonds, liquorice, silk, and fruits. Manf. Silks and woollens. Pop. about 830,000.

Abruzzo, Belthazer, a Sicilian philosopher. B. 1601; D. 1665.

Abruzzo, Peter, a Neapolitan architect of the 17th century.

Abs, ăbs, a dilapidated town of France, in the department of Ardèche.

Absalom, ab'-să-lom, the son of David, who assassinated his brother-in-law Ammon, for violating his sister Tamar, and raised a rebellion against his father; but his army being routed, he was slain by Joab, B.C. 1030.

Absalom, John, archbishop of Lunden, in Denmark; founder of the castle and city of Copenhagen, and a distinguished warrior and statesman. D. 1201.

Abstemius, Laurentius, ăb-stee'-me-us, an Italian writer, who was librarian at the court of Urbino, where he taught the belles lettres. Flourished in the 15th century.—He wrote some pieces of repute, but the best known are his fables, which have been frequently printed with those of Æsop, Phædrus, &c.

Absyrtus, ăb-sir'-tus, a son of Æetes, king of Colchis. His sister Medea, as she fled with Jason, tore his body to pieces, and strewed his limbs in her father's way, to stop his pursuit. Some say that she murdered him in Colchis; others in one of the Absyrtides; and others again lay the scene at Tomos. It has been asserted, on the contrary, that he was not murdered, but that he arrived safe in Illyricum.

Abu-Arisch, ăb-u-ăb'-ish, a walled city of Arabia, in a principality of the same name, 80 miles N. of Lohcia.

Abu Arish, ab'-u-air-ish, a petty state in Arabia, on the Red Sea.

Abubeker, ăb-u-be'-ker, the successor of Mahomet, and the first who assumed the title of caliph. D. 632.

Abucaras, Theodore, ăb-u-car'-as, a bishop of Caria, who was a partisan of Photius, but recanted at the council of Constantinople, and was re-admitted to his seat. Flourished in the 8th century.—He wrote several controversial treatises, which were published at Ingoldstadt, in 1606.

Abudhaher, ab-ude-hai-her, founder of the sect called Karmatians, and a great enemy to the Mussulmans. He plundered Mecca, and carried away the black stone, which the Turks pretend came down from heaven. The relic, however, was returned, when the Karmatians found it to be of no value. D. 953.

Abulfaragius, Gregory, ăb'-ul-fă-rai'-ge-us, an Armenian physician, bishop, and historian. B. at Mulatia, 1226; D. 1286.—This person wrote, in Arabic, a universal history, published with a Latin translation and a supplement, in 1663.

Abulfazel, ăb'-ul-fai'-zel, vizier of Akbar, the Mogul emperor. Author of "Ayeen Akberry," a history of the reign of his sovereign, and a geographical and statistical account of the Mogul empire. This work was translated into English by a Mr. Gladwin, in 1785. D. by assassination, 1604.

Abulfeda, Ismael, ăb-ul-fe'-da, prince of Hamah, in Syria. D. about 1382.—This prince wrote a piece, entitled, "A Description of Chorasmia and Mawaralnahre, or the regions beyond the river Oxus, from the Tables of Abulfeda Ismael, Prince of Hamah." He also wrote the lives of Mahomet and Saladin.

Abulgasi-Bayatur, ab-ul-gai'-se-bă-tai'-tur, khan of the Tartars. B. at Urgens, capital of Khorasan, 1605; D. 1663.—After a reign of twenty years, like Charles V. of Spain, he resigned the crown to his son, and led a retired life, during which he wrote the history of the Tartars, which valuable work was afterwards translated into German and French.

Abulites, ăb-u-lī'-tes, governor of Susa, who betrayed his trust to Alexander, and was rewarded with a province.

Abulola, a-bu-lo'-la, an Arabian poet. B. 973; D. 1057. About the middle of the 17th century some of the effusions of this poet were published.

Abu-Maunder, ab'-u-maun'-der, a village of Egypt, supposed to indicate the site of the ancient Bolbitinum.

Abu-Moslem, ăb'-u-mos'-lem, governor of Khorassan, who, in 747, changed the caliphate from the family of the Ommiades to the Abasides; in producing which, above 600,000 men lost their lives. After rendering the caliph Almanzor the most important services, that prince caused him to be assassinated.

ABUNDANCE, John, a-bun'-dans, a name assumed by a French poet who flourished in the 16th century.

ABUNOWAS, a-bu-no'-as, an Arabian poet who dwelt in the palace of Haroun-al-Raschid, with Masai and Rekashi, two other poets. B. at Bara, 762; D. 810.—The works of this poet are still extant.

ABU-OBEIDAH, ab'-u-o-bi'-da, a companion of Mahomet, who served under Caled, but, gaining the supreme command, Caled served as his second. D. 639.

ABURY, ab'-ber'-re, a village of England, in Wiltshire, 6 miles from Marlborough.

ABUS, ab'-bus, a river of England, now the Humber.

ABUSAID KHAN, ab'-u-said-kan, the last sultan of the race of Zingis Khan. D. 1336.

ABUSAID MIRZA, ab'-u-said-mer'-za, served in the army of Uleg Beg, when he was at war with his son. He took advantage of this dissension, and set up for himself in 1450. He greatly extended his dominions. Killed 1468.

ABUTEMAN, ab-u'-te-man, surnamed ALTAYI, the prince of Arabian poets. B. 812, or 846, at Yasem, near Damascus.

ABYDENUS, ab-i-de'-nus, author of the history of the Chaldeans and Abyssinians, the only remains of which are in the "Preparatio Evangelica" of Eusebius.

ABYDOS, a-bi'-dos, an ancient city of Upper Egypt, near two villages on the bank of the Nile. Here, in a temple, was discovered in 1818, the "tablet of Abydos," which contains a list of the early Egyptian kings. It is supposed to have been the ancient This, and to have been second only to Thebes. Lat. 26° 10′ N. Lon. 32° 3′ E.

ABYDOS, a town and castle of Natolia, on the Straits of Gallipoli. In its neighbourhood Xerxes, when he invaded Greece, crossed with his immense army the Hellespont, on a bridge of boats. Memorable also from being the scene of the loves of Hero and Leander, and from Byron having adopted its name in his "Bride of Abydos."

ABYO, ab'-e-o, one of the Philippine Islands, between Mindinao and Luzon. Lat. 10° N. Lon. 122° 15 E.

ABYSSINIA, ab'-is-sin'-ya, a kingdom of Africa, first made known to Europe by the Portuguese missionaries. It is bounded on the N. by Nubia, E. by the Red Sea and Dancala, W. by Gorham, and S. by Gingia and Ababa. Area, 27,000 square miles. Desc. This country may be described as an elevated table-land, divided by two mountain tracts of great extent, into a southern and western region, and a north-eastern. Climate. The rainy season continues from April to September, which is followed by a cloudless sky and a vertical sun. Cold nights again as suddenly succeed these scorching days; yet the earth keeps remarkably cool, partly owing to the six months' rain, when no sun appears, and partly to the perpetual equality of nights and days. Wild Animals. There is no country in the world productive of a greater variety of quadrupeds; but there are no tigers. The hyenas, however, are very numerous, and dreadful in their ravages. Elephants and buffaloes are very numerous, and the double-horned rhinoceros is found. Besides these, giraffes, zebras, quaggas, and wild asses are plentiful. Boars, in some of the woods, are common, and the smaller animals, such as porcupines, ferrets, otters, polecats, rabbits, and squirrels, abound. There are several species of the eagle and the vulture, and of insects the bee is so plentiful that their honey produce supersedes the necessity of importing sugar. Locusts frequently devastate the fields, and hippopotami abound in some of the larger rivers. To supply all these animals with food, in a wild state, the fertility of Abyssinia must be immense. Domestic Animals. These consist of cattle, sheep, goats, asses, mules, and horses. The Sanga ox is found in Auteilo, with horns sometimes extending to the length of 4 feet. Pro. Corn of different kinds, dates, tamarinds, and coffee, which is indigenous, and on long journeys is frequently used as an article of food. COMMERCE—Imp. Cotton, raw silk, metals, and leather. Exp. Slaves, gold, and ivory. Rel. A mixture of Christianity, Paganism, and Judaism. Pop. 3,500,000. Lat. between 8° 30′ and 15° 40′ N. Lon. between 35° and 42° E.

ACACIUS, a-kai'-se-us, a bishop of Amida, on the Tigris. D. in the 5th century.—This bishop sold the plate of his church, and with the receipts ransomed 7,000 Persian slaves, and sent them to their king.

ACACIUS, surnamed MONOPHTHALMUS, from having lost an eye, was the disciple and successor of Eusebius, bishop of Cæsarea. He was deposed by the council of Sardica, for heresy; on which he and some others assembled at Philippopolis, and anathematized Athanasius and the rest of their adversaries. Acacius was concerned in banishing Pope Liberius, and settling Felix in the see of Rome. D. about 365.—Was the founder of a sect called Acaciani, and wrote the "Life of Eusebius," and other works.

ACACIUS, patriarch of Constantinople, who was excommunicated by Pope Felix III., and, in his turn, commanded the name of that prelate to be struck out of the list of bishops who were to be mentioned in the public prayers. D. 487.

ACACIUS, bishop of Berœa in Syria, who was the means of deposing St. Chrysostom, and also Cyril, bishop of Alexandria. D. 436.

ACADEMUS, a-ka-de'-mus, or ECADEMUS, an Athenian, whose house was employed as a philosophical school in the time of Theseus. He had the honour of giving his name to a sect of philosophers, or rather three sects, called Academics. The old academy had Plato for its chief, the second Arcesilaus, and the last Carneades.—No one was suffered to laugh in the academy at Athens, under the penalty of expulsion.

ACADIA, a-kai'-de-a (see NOVA SCOTIA), of which this is the original Indian name.—Here Longfellow has laid the scene of his beautiful poem "Evangeline."

ACADIA, a county in the district of Montreal, Canada. Manf. Linen, flannel, and cloth. Pop. 11,500.

ACAMBOU, a-kam-boo, a kingdom on the coast of Guinea, where the king is absolute.

ACANNY, a-kan'-ne, an inland country and town of Guinea, affording the best gold in great plenty.

ACANTHA, a-kon'-tha, a nymph loved by Apollo, and changed into the flower acanthus.

ACANTHUS, ai-kan'-thus, a city of Macedonia, near Mount Athos, colonized by Andrians. It is supposed to be the modern Erissus. Near it Xerxes cut a canal, about a mile and a half in length, and twenty-five yards in breadth, through which he conveyed his fleet into the Sinus Singiticus, without doubling the dangerous promontory of Athos.

ACANTHUS, a town of Egypt, near Memphis, the present Bisalta, or, according to D'Anville, Dashur, whither the waters of the Nile are conducted by a canal, and not far from which are the ruins of the temple of Osiris, and some pyramids.

ACAPONETA, a-kä-po-ne'-ta, a town of Mexico.

ACAPULCO, a-ka-pul'-ko, a city of New Spain, seated on a bay of the Pacific Ocean. The harbour is very commodious, and defended by a strong castle; but the town is mean and unhealthy. On December 4th, 1852, an earthquake destroyed all its principal buildings, besides a great portion of the houses of the inhabitants. COMMERCE—Exp. Silver, indigo, cochineal, and skins. Pop. about 4,000, chiefly coloured. Lat. 16° 50′ N. Lon. 99° 48′ W.

ACARNANIA, a-kar-nai'-ne-a, a division of ancient Greece, now forming, with Ætolia, a department of the kingdom of Greece. Area, 1,571 square miles. Desc. Mountainous and woody, intersected with fertile valleys, several of which contain beautiful lakes. Pro. Flocks and herds; has some copper, and abundance of sulphur and coal. Pop. with Ætolia, 99,000.

ACARNAS and AMPHOTERUS, ai-kar-nas, am-fot'-e-rus, sons of Alcmæon and Callirhoe. Alcmæon being murdered by the brothers of Alphesibœa, his former wife, Callirhoe asked from Jupiter that her children, who were still in the cradle, might grow up to punish their father's murderers. Her prayer was granted.

ACARNAS, or ACARNAN, a stony mountain of Attica.

ACASTA, ai-kas'-ta, one of the Oceanides.

ACASTUS, ai-kas'-tus, son of Pelias, king of Thessaly, married Astydamia or Hippolyte, who fell in love with Peleus, son of Æacus, when in banishment at her husband's court. Peleus, rejecting the addresses of Hippolyte, was accused before Acastus of attempts upon her virtue, and soon after, at a chase, exposed to wild beasts. Vulcan, by order of Jupiter, delivered Peleus, who returned to Thessaly, and put to death Acastus and his wife.

Acca, ăk'-ka, bishop of Hexham, in Northumberland. D. 740.—This personage was a liberal patron of the arts, an improver of the music of the church, and an author of a work, entitled, "Sufferings of Saints."

Acca Laurentia, ăk'-ka law-ren'-shе-a, the wife of Faustulus the shepherd, and the nurse of Remus and Romulus. Some say she was a courtesan, and have called her Lupa. The Romans made her a goddess, and devoted a holiday to her service.

Accarisi, Francis, professor of civil law at Sienna, and afterwards at Pisa. B. at Ancona; D. at Sienna, 1622.

Accarisi, James, ăk'-ka-re'-se, a professor of rhetoric at Mantua, who subsequently became bishop of Vesta. B. at Bologna; D. at Vesta, 1654.

Acciaioli, Renatus, ak-ke-a-e-o-le, a Florentine, who conquered Athens, Corinth, and part of Bœotia. Lived in the beginning of the 15th century.—He bequeathed Athens to the Venetians; Corinth to Theodosius Paleologus, who married his eldest daughter; and Bœotia, with Thebes, to his natural son Anthony, who also got Athens; but this was retaken in 1455 by Mahomet II.

Acciajuoli, Angelo, ăk-ke-a-ju-o-le, a native of Florence, of which he became archbishop, and by his merit obtained a cardinalship. D. 1407.

Acciajuoli, Donatus, a noble and learned Florentine and disciple of Argyropylus, who flourished in the 15th century. D. at Milan.—He wrote a commentary on the "Ethics" of Aristotle, and translated some of the "Lives" of Plutarch, to which he added those of Hannibal and Scipio. He also wrote a life of Charlemagne.

Acciajuoli, Zenobio, a churchman of the order of St. Dominic, and librarian to Pope Leo. X. B. 1461; D. 1520.—He translated some of the fathers into Latin, and left several pieces of his own, some of which were published.

Accius, Lucius, ăk'-ke-us, a Latin tragic poet, none of whose works are extant. Flourished about 170 B.C. —There was also, in the same age, an orator of the name of Accius, against whom Cicero defended Cluentius. He was a native of Pisaurum.

Accius Tullius, prince of the Volsci, in Italy, to whom Coriolanus fled for refuge.

Accolti, Benedict, ăc-col'-te, secretary to the state of Florence. D. 1466.—He wrote a history of the Holy War, printed at Venice, in 1532, which was consulted by Tasso in the composition of his "Jerusalem Delivered." He likewise wrote a little book of the famous men of his time.

Accolti, Francis, brother to Benedict, was called the prince of lawyers. D. vastly rich, about 1470.

Accolti, Benedict, a cardinal, related to the above, called the Cicero of his age, and distinguished by several popes. B. 1497; D. 1549.

Accolti, Benedict, an Italian conspirator, who, with five others, meditated the murder of Pius IV.—Put to death 1564.

Accords, Stephen Tabouret, ăk-kor, an advocate in the parliament of Dijon. D. 1561.—He was the author of two trifling books, one entitled, "Les Bigarrures," and the other "Les Touches."

Accorso, Francis, ăk-kor'-so, professor of law at Bologna. B. at Florence, 1182; D. 1260. Reduced the Code, Digests, and Institutes into one system, printed at Lyons, in 6 vols. folio, 1627.

Accorso, Mariangelo, a learned Neapolitan, who was very industrious in collecting ancient MSS. Flourished in the 16th century.—Published remarks on Ausonius, Solinus, and Ovid, in 1524, entitled "Diatribæ;" also an edition of Ammianus Marcellinus, at Augsburg, in 1533, and some other valuable works.

Accra, ak'-kra, a kingdom, of about 500 miles area, and also one of the English ports, Gold Coast, Western Africa. Lat. 5° 30′ N. Lon. 0° 12′ W.

Accrington, ăk'-kring-ton, a manufacturing town of Lancashire, 19 miles N. of Manchester. It is considered the centre of the cotton-printing business.

Accumpixtli, ăk'-um-pix'-tle, the first king of the ancient Mexicans, a legislator, and the founder of the capital of his kingdom. D. 1420.

Aceldama, ă-kel'-da-ma, the potters' field, purchased with the thirty pieces of silver which Judas took to betray our Saviour. It is still shown to travellers.

Acerenza, a-che-ren'-dza, or Cirenza, a city of Naples, capital of Basilicata. The see of an archbishop, and seated on the Brandano, at the foot of the Apennines. Pop. 2,000.

Acerno, a-cher'-no, an episcopal town of Naples, in Principato Citeriore, 15 miles N.E. of Salerno. Manf. Iron and paper. Pop. about 3,000.

Acerra, a-cher'-ra, an episcopal town of Naples, in Terra di Lavoro, seated on the Agno, 7 miles N.E. of Naples. Pop. about 11,000.

Acesius, a-ce'-se-us, bishop of Constantinople in the time of Constantine, who, on account of his rigid doctrine, said to him, "Make a ladder for yourself, Acesius, and go up to heaven alone." Flourished in the 3rd century.

Acestes, or Ægestus, ai-ses'-tees, son of Crinisus and Egesta, and king of the country near Drepanum, in Sicily. He assisted Priam in the Trojan war, entertained Æneas during his voyage, and helped him to bury his father on Mount Eryx. In commemoration of this, Æneas built a city there, and called it Acesta.

Ach, John, ak, Van, or Achen, was born at Cologne, in 1566, and became eminent in historical and portrait painting. D. 1621.

Ach, ak, a town of Suabia, in the landgravate of Nellenburg, on the river Ach, 14 miles N.E. of Schaffhausen.

Achabytos, ăk-ă-bi'-tos, a lofty mountain in Rhodes, on the summit of which stood a temple to Jupiter.

Achæa, ă-kee'-a, a surname of Pallas, whose temple in Daunia was defended by dogs, who fawned upon the Greeks, but fiercely attacked all other persons.—A name applied to Ceres, and derived from achos, a word expressive of her grief for the loss of her daughter Proserpine.

Achæi, ă-kee'-i, the descendants of Achæus, the son of Xuthus, and grandson of Helen. Achæus having committed manslaughter, was compelled to take refuge in Laconia, where he died, and where his posterity remained under the name of Achæi, until they were expelled by the Heraclidæ. Upon this, they passed into the northern parts of Peloponnesus, and, under the command of Tisamenus, the son of Orestes, took possession of the country of the Ionians, and called it Achaia. The successors of Tisamenus ruled until the time of Gyges's tyranny, when Achaia was parcelled into twelve small republics, or so many cities with their respective districts, each of which comprised seven or eight cantons. Three of these—Patræ, Dymæ, and Pharæ—became famous as a confederacy, 284 years B.C., which continued formidable upwards of 130 years, under the name of the Achæan League, and was most illustrious whilst supported by the splendid virtues and abilities of Aratus and Philopœmen. They directed their arms for three years against the Ætolians, and rose to be powerful by the accession of neighbouring states, and freed their country from foreign slavery. At last, however, they were attacked by the Romans, and, after one year's hostilities, the Achæan League was totally destroyed, B.C. 147. From this period the Peloponnesus was reduced to the condition of a Roman province, bearing the name of Achaia.—The name of Achæi is generally applied to all the Greeks indiscriminately, by the poets.

Achæorum statio, ă-kee-or'-um stai-she-o, a place on the coast of the Thracian Chersonesus, where Polyxena was sacrificed to the shades of Achilles, and where Hecuba killed Polymnestor, who had murdered her son Polydorus.

Achaia, a-kai'-ya, a province of the Peloponnesus, running along the southern shore of the Corinthian gulf, from the river Larissus to Cape Araxus. Area, 650 square miles. Desc. Mountainous, inclosing valleys of great fertility. Agriculture. Defective. Sheep and goats are numerous.—From Achaia comes the name of the celebrated Achæan League, which first held its meetings at Helice, and then at Egium, 373 B.C. (See Achæi.)

Achalen, ăk'-ai-len, a sovereign of the northern Britons, who, on losing his territory, fled into Wales. Reigned in the 6th century.—He and his brother, Arthanad, are famous for a journey performed on one horse, up the hill of Maelwig, in Cardiganshire, to revenge the death of their father.

ACHARD, François Charles, a-kar, an experimental philosopher and chemist of supposed French extraction. He was among the first who proposed to extract sugar from beet-root. B. at Berlin, 1753; D. 1821.—An author of various works in German, on experimental physics, agriculture, and chemistry.

ACHARDS, Elcazar, a-kar, bishop of Avignon. When the plague raged there, he continued, at the hazard of his life, to perform the offices of charity and religion, and Clement XII. sent him to China to settle the disputes which prevailed among the missionaries. B. at Avignon, 1679; D. at Cochin, 1741.

ACHARNÆ, ăk-ar'-nce, a very large country town of Attica, where the tyrants encamped when they marched against Thrasybulus, and where the Lacedæmonians, under their king Archidamus, pitched their tents when they made an irruption into Attica, at the beginning of the Peloponnesian war. Aristophanes, in the comedy which takes its title from this town, represents the inhabitants as charcoal-makers; and other comic writers stigmatize them as rough and boorish. Acharnæ contained a great many temples. Its remains are topographically placed at about an hour from Kasha, and near Menidi.

ACHATES, ă-kai-tees, a friend of Æneas, whose fidelity was so exemplary that fidus Achates (the faithful Achates) became a proverb.

ACHEEN, a-keen, a kingdom in the N.W. part of Sumatra, powerful enough, in former times, to expel the Portuguese from the island, and important enough for its sovereigns to receive embassies from some of the greatest potentates of Europe. Desc. Comparatively healthy, being freer from woods and swamps than the other parts of the island. Pro. Chiefly fine fruits, rice, cotton, gold-dust, and sulphur. COMMERCE—Imp. Salt, soap, opium, wine, arms, gunpowder, and manufactured goods. Exp. Mace, cloves, nutmegs, pepper, sugar, coffee, and rice. Rel. Mahometan.—The Achinese are taller, stouter, and darker-complexioned than the other Sumatrans. They are more active and industrious than their neighbours, and have more sagacity and penetration.

ACHEEN, the capital of the above kingdom, seated near the mouth of a river, on the N.W. point of the island, or Acheen Head, in a wide valley, formed by two lofty ranges of hills. The houses are built of bamboos and rough timbers, and are raised some feet from the ground, this part of the country being overflowed in the rainy season. Lat. 5° 22′ N. Lon. 95° 31′ E.

ACHILOIDES, a'-ke-lo'-e-des, a patronymic given to the Sirens as daughters of Achelous.

ACHELOUS, a'-ke-lo-us, the son of Oceanus and Terra, or Tethys, god of the river of the same name in Epirus.—As one of the numerous suitors of Dejanira, daughter of Œneus, Achelous entered the lists against Hercules, and being inferior, changed himself into a serpent, and afterwards into an ox. Hercules broke off one of his horns, and Achelous being defeated, retired into his bed of waters. The broken horn was given to the goddess of Plenty.

ACHERI, Luc de, a-ker-e, a Benedictine monk. B. at St. Quintin, 1609; D. at Paris, 1685.—He published several books on ecclesiastical history; as the "Lives of Saints," &c.

ACHERN, a-kern, a town of Baden, Germany, on the Acher. Pop. 1,800.

ACHERON, ăk'-ke-ron, a river of Thesprotia, in Epirus. Homer calls it one of the rivers of hell, and the fable has been adopted by all succeeding poets, who make the god of the stream to be the son of Ceres without a father, and say that he concealed himself in hell for fear of the Titans, and was changed into a bitter stream, over which the souls of the dead are at first conveyed. The word Acheron is often used for hell itself.

ACHERUSIA, ă-ke-ru'-se-a, a lake of Campania, near Capua. Diodorus mentions, that in Egypt, the bodies of the dead were conveyed over a lake called Acherusia, and received sentence according to the actions of their life. The boat which carried them was called Baris, and the ferryman Charon. Hence arose the fable of Charon and the Styx, &c.

ACHILL, ă'-kill, an island off the west coast of Ireland. Area, 35,283 acres. Pop. 4,000.

ACHILLES, ă-kil'-lees, the son of Peleus and Thetis, and the bravest of all the Greeks in the Trojan war. During his infancy, Thetis plunged him in the Styx, and made every part of his body invulnerable, except the heel, by which she held him. His education was intrusted to the centaur Chiron, who taught him the art of war, and made him master of music. As Troy could not be taken without Achilles, Ulysses went to the court of Lycomedes, where he was, and, in the habit of a merchant, exposed jewels and arms to sale. Achilles, choosing the arms, discovered his sex, and went to war. Vulcan, at the entreaties of Thetis, made him a strong armour, which was proof against all weapons. He was deprived by Agamemnon of his favourite mistress, Briseis, who had fallen to his lot at the division of the booty of Lyrnessus. For this affront, he refused to appear in the field till the death of his friend Patroclus recalled him to action and to revenge. He slew Hector, the bulwark of Troy, tied the corpse by the heels to his chariot, and dragged it three times round the walls of Troy. After thus appeasing the shades of his friend, he permitted old Priam to carry away Hector's body. In the tenth year of the war, Achilles was charmed with Polyxena; and as he solicited her hand in the temple of Minerva, it is said that Paris aimed an arrow at his vulnerable heel, and gave him the wound of which he died. His body was buried at Sigæum, and divine honours were paid to him, and temples raised to his memory.—Some ages after the Trojan war, Alexander the Great, going to the conquest of Persia, offered sacrifices on the tomb of Achilles, and envied the hero who had found a Homer to transmit his fame to posterity.

ACHILLINI, Alexander, a-kil-le'-ne, an eminent philosopher and physician of Bologna. D. 1512.—He is said to have discovered the hammer and anvil, two small bones in the organ of hearing. His works were published in folio, at Venice, in 1568.

ACHILLINI, John Philotheus, brother of the above. D. 1538.—Was author of a poem, entitled "Viridario," containing the eulogy of many learned men of his time.

ACHILLINI, Claude, a relative of the preceding. A man of universal learning and genius, and professor of jurisprudence, for several years, in different universities. Cardinal Richelieu is said to have rewarded him for a poem with a gold chain valued at 1,000 crowns. B. at Bologna, 1574; D. 1640.—Inscriptions to his honour were placed upon the schools in which he taught.

ACHMET I., ak'-met, emperor of the Turks, who succeeded his father, Mahomet III., in 1603. He was then only fifteen, and began his reign by endeavouring to suppress a rebellion, which lasted two years. He next engaged in a war with the Germans, in which he was assisted by the famous Bethlem Gabor. Peace was concluded in 1606; but he continued to be disturbed by insurrections, and the security of his throne was threatened by a pretender to his rightful inheritance. He indulged in sensual pleasures and in field sports; but, though proud and ambitious, was less sanguinary than his predecessors. D. 1617.

ACHMET II., successor to his brother Solyman, in 1691. D. 1695.

ACHMET III., son of Mahomet IV., on the deposition of his brother, Mustapha II., in 1703, ascended the imperial throne. He sheltered Charles XII. of Sweden, after the battle of Pultowa, and declared war against the Russians, but, soon after, concluded an advantageous peace. He likewise made war on the Venetians, and recovered from them the Morea; but in an attack on Hungary, his army was defeated by Prince Eugene, in 1716, at the battle of Peterwardin.—Achmet was dethroned in 1730. D. in prison, 1763.

ACHMETSCHEM, ack-met-shem, a town of Crim Tartary, capital of the Russian province of Taurida, and government of Catharinenslaf. Lat. 45° 0′ N. Lon. 33° 20′ E.

ACHMIN, or ACKMIN, ăk'-min, a town on the right bank of the Nile, in Middle Egypt. Manf. Coarse cotton cloth. Pop. 3,000. Lat. 26° 38′ N. Lon. 31° 55′ E.—This is the Panopolis of the ancient Greeks, and the Chemnis of the Egyptians, and the ruins of the former are still visible in some magnificent granite pillars.

Achonry, ăk'-on-re, a town and parish of Ireland, in the county of Sligo, on the Shannon, 16 miles W.S.W. of Sligo. Area, 60,896 acres. Pop. 13,500.

Achray, Loch, ak'-ray, a small but picturesque lake in the county of Perth, Scotland, 15 miles N.W. from Stirling.—Introduced in the "Lady of the Lake" of Sir W. Scott

Achsai, ak'-sai, a town of Circassia, near the Terek, 150 miles S.E. of Georgievsk.

Achtyrka, ak-tir'-ka, a town of European Russia, on the Kharkov, about 60 miles N.W. of Kharkov. Manf. Principally woollen. Pop. upwards of 14,000.

Achyr, a-kir, a strong town and castle of Ukraine, on the river Uorskio, about 127 miles E. of Kiow.

Aci, or Aci Reall, a'-che rai'-al, a seaport town in Sicily, in the province of Catania, well built with lava, having a castle and many fine edifices. Manf. Silks, linens, cutlery, and filigree-work, in which an extensive trade is carried on. Pop. 15,000.—Here was the cave of Polyphemus, and the grotto of Galatæa. It is celebrated for its mineral waters.

Acis, ai'-sis, a shepherd of Sicily, with whom Galatæa fell in love; upon which his rival, Polyphemus, through jealousy, crushed him to death with the fragment of a rock. The gods changed Acis into a stream, which rises from Mount Ætna, and which is now called Jaci. He was the son of Faunus and the nymph Simæthis. This fable forms the subject of a beautiful modern opera.

Ackrn, ak'-en, a town of Lower Saxony, in the duchy of Magdeburg, with a citadel, situate on the Elbe, about 5 miles from Dessau.

Ackermann, Conrad, ăk'-er-man, a comedian of Germany, who founded the modern German theatre. D. 1771.

Ackermann, John Christian Gotlieb, a distinguished German physician. B. 1756; D. at Altdorf, in Franconia, 1801.

Ackermann, Rudolph, a carriage-draughtsman, who, previously to the French Revolution, arrived in England, where, after a short time, he settled down in the Strand as a printseller. He produced an elegant annual, which was called "Forget me not," and which was the first of that class of works which, for several years, were so popular in this country. He greatly promoted the art of lithography, and by his embellished "Histories" of Westminster, Oxford, &c., improved the public taste, and added to his own reputation as an enterprising publisher. B. at Schneeberg, Saxony, 1764; D. 1834.

Ackmar, William, ak'-mar, a Scottish artist, who, as a portrait-painter, was held in high estimation. Lived in the 18th century.—Ackmar was the first person of influence to appreciate the ability, and assist the fortunes of Thomson, the author of "The Seasons."

Ackworth, ăk'-werth, a parish in the West Riding of Yorkshire, near Pontefract. Area, 2,270 acres. Pop. about 2,000.

Acmonides, ăk-mon'-e-dees, one of the Cyclops.

Acœtes, a-see'-tees, the pilot of the ship which, against his consent, carried away Bacchus, who had been found asleep at Naxos. The crew were changed into sea monsters, but Acœtes was preserved.

Acoluthus, Andrew, ă-ko-lu-thus, an archdeacon, and professor of the Oriental languages at Breslau. B. at Breslau; D. 1704.—He wrote a treatise "De Aquis Amaris," 1682, 4to, and a Latin translation of the Armenian version of the prophet Obadiah, 4to. Leipsic.

Acoma, a-ko'-ma, or St. Estevan de Acoma, a town of New Mexico, seated on a high mountain, with a strong castle. It is the capital of a province.

Aconcagua, a-kon-kag'-u-a, a district of the kingdom of Chili, which is bounded on the north and west by the province of Quillota, east by the Andes, and south by Santiago. Area, 12,000 square miles. Desc. Mountainous, and fertile in the valleys. Pro. Maize, wheat, beans, pumpkins, melons, and other garden produce; vineyards and orchards are plentiful, and in summer, numerous flocks are pastured on the slopes of the Andes; figs, nectarines, peaches, &c., are sent to Santiago and Valparaiso. Gold is found, and copper is worked in mines. Pop. 92,000.

Aconteus, ai-kon'-te-us, a famous hunter changed by the head of Medusa into a stone, at the nuptials of Perseus and Andromeda.

Acontius, ai-kon'-she-us, a youth of the island of Cea, who went to Delos, to see the sacred rites which were performed there by a crowd of virgins in the temple of Diana, and fell in love with Cydippe, a beautiful virgin. Not daring, however, to ask her in marriage, on account of the meanness of his birth, he presented her with an apple, on which were inscribed these words, "I swear by Diana, Acontius shall be my husband." Cydippe read the words, and feeling herself compelled by the oath she had inadvertently taken, married Acontius.

Acontius, James, a-kon'-she-us, a Catholic, who, becoming Protestant, came to England, where he met with a kind reception from Queen Elizabeth, to whom he dedicated a work, entitled, "The Stratagems of Satan," printed at Basil, in 1565. He died soon after. B. at Trent.—Another edition of his work appeared at Basil in 1610, to which was added a letter of Acontius, "De Ratione edendorum Librorum;" but his best work is a treatise "On Method," printed at Utrecht, in 1653.

Acoono-Coono, a-koo'-no, a town and district of Africa. Pop. about 5,000. Lat. 6° 20' N. Lon. 8° 27' E.

Acosta, Gabriel, a-kos'-ta, a canon and professor of divinity at Coimbra. D. 1616.—Wrote a commentary on part of the Old Testament, folio, 1641.

Acosta, Joseph, a Spanish Jesuit, who, from being a missionary in Peru, became provincial of his order. B. at Medina del Campo, 1537; D. at Salamanca, 1600. —His "History of the West-Indies," first printed in Spanish, in 1521. 8vo, is universally known and esteemed.

Acosta, Uriel, an extraordinary character, who, at the age of twenty-five, was made treasurer of a church in Oporto, but, having embraced Judaism, resolved to quit Portugal, with his mother and brothers, whom he had converted to the same faith. They proceeded to Amsterdam, and were received into a synagogue. Not long after, becoming dissatisfied with the Jewish rites, and expressing his sentiments with freedom, he was excommunicated. He then wrote a book, in which he denied the immortality of the soul; for which he was thrown into prison, whence he was bailed; but all the copies of his book were seized, and a fine levied upon the author. After lying under excommunication fifteen years, he was, on making submission, re-admitted into the synagogue, but was again expelled for not conforming to the laws of Moses, and for dissuading two Christians from turning Jews. In this state he remained seven years, abandoned by his friends, and reduced to the utmost destitution. At the end of that time he made another submission, and underwent an extraordinary penance in the synagogue; where, after making his recantation, he was publicly scourged, and had to lay himself down on the threshold, and allow all the people to walk over him. B. at Oporto; shot himself in 1640, or, according to others, 1647.

Acqs, aks, a town of France, in the department of Arriége, at the foot of the Pyrenees. Its vicinity is noted for hot springs.

Acqua, ak'-qua, a town of Tuscany, noted for warm baths. Lat. 43° 45' N. Lon. 12° 10' E.

Acquakanouck, ak'-qua-kun-ouk', a North-American township, in the state of New Jersey. Pop. 2,500.

Acquapendente, ak'-qua-pen'-den-te, a town of Italy, seated on a mountain near the river Paglia. It takes its name from a waterfall, which rushes from the top of the mountain. Pop. 2,500.—Here Fabricius ab Acquapendente, the celebrated anatomist, was born, 1537.

Acquaria, ak-quair'-e-a, a town of Italy, in the Modenese, noted for its medicinal waters. 12 miles S. of Modena.

Acquaviva, ak'-qua-ve'-va, a town of Naples, in Terra di Bari, 16 miles from Bari. Pop. nearly 6,000.

Acquaviva, Andrew Matthew, duke of Atri and prince of Teramo, in the kingdom of Naples. B. 1456; D. 1528.—Was one of the greatest luminaries of his age, and seems to have been the first who conceived the idea of an Encyclopædia, or Universal Dictionary of Arts and Sciences. He published a work under that title in 2 vols. folio, which, though scanty and defective, was found sufficient to give some hints for conducting a compilation of that kind.

ACQUI, ak-kē', a province of Piedmont, on the northern side of the Ligurian Apennines. Area, 445 square miles. Pro. Corn and fruit. Chestnut-trees furnish the peasantry with an article of common food, and silkworms are reared as a branch of industry. Pop. 102,000.

ACQUI, capital of the above. It has commodious baths, and is seated on the Bormida. Pop. 8,000.—Acqui was taken by the Spaniards in 1745; retaken by the Piedmontese in 1746; and afterwards dismantled by the French.

ACRATUS, ă-krāī'-tus, a freed man of Nero, sent into Asia to plunder the temples of the gods.

ACRE, or ST. JEAN D'ACRE, ak'-ker, să-ja-daker, a seaport of Palestine, formerly called Ptolemais. In 1799, aided by the British under Sir Sydney Smith, it withstood a severe siege by the French, under General Bonaparte, who raised the siege after failing in the twelfth assault, and made over the putrid bodies of his soldiers. In 1832 it was taken from the sultan for Mehemet Ali, by Ibrahim Pacha. Considerable strength was then given to its defences; in 1840, however, it succumbed to the British and Austrian squadrons. This event compelled Ibrahim Pacha to quit the country, and retire into Egypt. Since then Acre has been restored to the Turks. Pop. 15,000 to 20,000. In the time of the Crusades it underwent several sieges, and was taken in 1191 by Philip Augustus of France and Richard Cœur-de-Lion of England. It was here that our king Edward I., when prince, receiving a wound from a poisoned arrow, was cured by his wife Eleanor, who sucked out the poison.

ACRI, a'-kre, a town of Naples, in the province of Calabria Citra. Pop. 8,000.

ACROCERAUNIUM, ak-ro'-se-raū'-ne-um, a promontory of Epirus, with mountains called Acroceraunia, which separate the Ionian and Adriatic seas. The word comes from akros, high, and keraunos, thunder; because, by reason of their great height, they were often struck by lightning. They were remarkable for attracting storms, and thence dreaded by mariners.

ACROCORINTHUS, ăk'-ro-ko-rin'-thus, a steep and lofty mountain, overhanging the city of Corinth, on which was built a citadel, called by the same name. It was one of the horns on which Philip was advised to lay hold, in order to secure the Peloponnesus, figured in the heifer. It was also considered as one of the fetters of Greece, of which the others were Demetrias, in Thessaly, and Chalcis, in Eubœa. Its position was naturally so strong that a small number of men were sufficient to garrison it; and in the time of Aratus a force of four hundred soldiers defended it. It abounded in excellent water, and afforded one of the most magnificent prospects in the world.

ACRON, ak'-ron, a territory of Guinea, on the Gold Coast. The Dutch have a fort here called Patience; and under it is the village. Lat. 5° 10′ N. Lon. 0° 28′ E.

ACRON, or ACRO, ak'-cron, an ancient scholiast on Horace. Lived in the 7th century.—His work is extant in an edition of Horace printed at Basil in 1527, 8vo.

ACRON, a Sicilian physician, who expelled the plague from Athens by burning perfumes. Flourished B.C. 430.

ACRON, a king of the Cæcinenses, who, after the rape of the Sabines, was slain by Romulus, in single combat. His spoils were dedicated to Jupiter, under the name of Feretrius, because they were carried on a frame.

ACROPOLIS, ă-krop'-o-lis, the citadel of Athens, built on a rock, and accessible only on one side.—Minerva had a temple at the bottom.

ACROPOLITA, George, ă-kro-po''-e-ta, a writer on the Byzantine history, who, at the age of twenty-one, disputed with a physician concerning solar eclipses, before the emperor John. He afterwards rose to the rank of chancellor of the empire. B. at Constantinople 1220; D. 1282.—His "Chronicle of the Greek Empire" was printed at Paris, in Greek and Latin, in 1651, folio.

ACROPOLITA, Constantine, son of the above, was called the younger Metaphrastes, and was great chancellor of the empire. Flourished about 1270.

ACROTERI, a-kro-teer'-e, a town in the island of Santorini. Lat. 36° 25′ N. Lon. 26° 1′ E.

ACS, aks, an Hungarian town, 6 miles S.W. of Komorn, where a great many sheep are reared. Pop. about 5,000.

ACTA, or ACTE, ak'-ta, a name given to the seacoast about Mount Athos, in which were six cities mentioned by Thucydides. It was likewise the ancient name of Attica, Peloponnesus, Troezene, and Epidaurus.

ACTÆA, ăk-tee'-a, one of the Nereids.—A surname of Ceres.—A daughter of Danaus.

ACTÆON, ăk-tē'-on, a famous huntsman of antiquity, who, on seeing Diana and her attendants bathing near Gargaphia, was suddenly changed into a stag, and devoured by his own dogs.

ACTÆUS, ăk-tee'-us, a powerful person who made himself master of a part of Greece, which he called Attica. His daughter Agraulos married Cecrops, whom the Athenians called their first king, though Actæus reigned before him. This word has the same signification as Atticus, an inhabitant of Attica.

ACTIA, ak'-te-a, the mother of Augustus.

ACTIA, games instituted, or perhaps restored, by Augustus, in commemoration of his victory over Marc Antony, at Actium. They were celebrated every fifth year, according to the general opinion, and were sacred to Apollo, who was thence called Actius Apollo.

ACTIS, ăk'-tis, a son of Sol, went from Greece into Egypt, where he taught astrology, and founded Heliopolis.

ACTISANES, ăk'-tis'-a-nees, a king of Ethiopia, who conquered Egypt, and expelled King Amasis. He was famous for his equity, which is in some measure contradicted by his severity to robbers, whose noses he cut off, and whom he banished to a desert place, where they were in want of all aliment, and lived only upon crows.

ACTIUM, ăk'-te-um, a town and promontory of Epirus, famous for the naval victory which Augustus obtained over Antony and Cleopatra, the 2nd of September, B.C. 31, in honour of which the conqueror built there the town of Nicopolis, and instituted games.

ACTIUS NAVIUS, ăk'-te-us nav'-ve-us, an augur who cut a loadstone in two with a razor, before Tarquin and the Roman people, to convince them of his skill in his art.

ACTON, ăk'-ton, eight miles from London, a station on the N. & S. Western Railway; a few years since a rural village, now there are numerous villas inhabited by the merchant princes of the metropolis.

ACTON, Joseph, ăk-ton, originally in the French naval service, but subsequently prime minister at the court of Naples. B. at Besançon, France, 1737; D. in obscurity, Sicily, 1808.—Many of the political persecutions which took place in Naples after the French invasion of 1799 are attributed to the influence of Acton at the Neapolitan court.

ACTON-BURNELL, a village of England, 8 miles from Shrewsbury.—A parliament was held here in the reign of Edward I., when the Lords sat in the castle, and the Commons in a barn, which is still standing. A large part of the castle remains, the walls exhibiting great strength, and adorned with fine battlements and rows of windows curiously carved. Its remains still bear testimony to the magnificence of the original structure.

ACTOPAN, ak'-to-pan, a town of Mexico, 80 miles from the capital of that state, where the inhabitants are chiefly employed in the manufacture of sheep and goat skins. Pop. 3,000.

ACTORIDES, ăk-tor'-e-des, two brothers, so much attached to each other, that in driving a chariot, one generally held the reins and the other the whip, whence they are represented with two heads, four feet, and one body. They were conquered by Hercules.

ACTUARIUS, John, ăk'-tu-air'-e-us, a Greek physician of the Jewish faith, who flourished at Constantinople in the 12th century.—His books on Therapeutics, the Animal Spirits, on Urines, &c. have been printed together, and in parts.

ACUNA, Christopher, ă-ku'-na, a Spanish Jesuit, many years a missionary in South America. B. at Burgos, 1597.—He published, in 1641, "A Description of the Great River of the Amazons," which was afterwards translated into French, in 4 vols. 12mo, 1682.

ACUSILAUS and DAMAGETUS, ăk-u-se-laī'-us, two brothers, conquerors at the Olympic games. The Greeks covered their father, whose name was Diagoras, with flowers, and proclaimed him happy in having such worthy sons.

ACUSILAUS, a Greek historian, who was born at Argos, and flourished at the same time with Cadmus the Milesian (about 1500 B.C.). He composed a work on the genealogies of the principal families of Greece, from some brazen tablets, which his father was reported to have found while digging in his house.

ACWORTH, ak'-werth, a North-American township in New Hampshire, where there are woollen manufactures. Pop. 1,251.

ADA, ai'-da, the wife of Aidricus, and sister to Queen Artemisia. On the death of her husband she succeeded to the throne of Caria, but was expelled by her younger brother, when she retired to Alindæ, which she gave up to Alexander, after adopting him as her son.

ADAIR, James, ă-dair, son of an army agent, and an eminent lawyer. After passing through the usual course of study, in 1774 he was raised to the degree of serjeant-at-law, and on the death of Serjeant Glynne, was chosen recorder of London. On being promoted to be one of his majesty's serjeants-at-law, he resigned the recordership, in expectation of higher preferment, but was disappointed. D. 1798.—He sat as member of parliament, first for Cockermouth, and afterwards for Higham Ferrars, and wrote two tracts, one entitled, "Thoughts on the Dismission of Officers for their Conduct in Parliament," and the other, "Observations on the Power of Alienations of the Crown, before the first of Queen Anne."

ADAIR, Sir Robert, a statesman, who espoused the political views of Mr. Fox. He was the son of Robert Adair, sergeant-surgeon to George III. In 1808 he was specially selected for a mission to the Porte, where, in conjunction with Lord Stratford de Redcliffe and others, he successfully negotiated the treaty of the Dardanelles, 1809. In the same year he was appointed ambassador at Constantinople, in which he remained till 1811. In 1831 he was despatched on a special mission to Prince Leopold, when besieged by William, prince of Orange, in Liege. Sir Robert, on seeing the situation of Leopold, pressed him to fly; but that prince, having only recently been elected to the throne, declined to adopt an advice which might so easily be unfavourably construed to his reign. "I am ready to fight," said he, "but will allow you to negotiate." Accordingly, Sir Robert, fastening a handkerchief to a ramrod, went to the hostile army, and in an interview with Prince William, succeeded in obtaining his connivance for Leopold to withdraw to Malines, where Sir Robert accompanied him. B. in London, 1763; D. 1855.—Sir Robert married a daughter of the marquis of Hazincourt, in 1805, but had no issue. In 1802 he represented Appleby, and in 1806-7, Camelford. He published accounts of two of his missions, and as he was possessed of great information, and had mingled much with the politics of Europe, he was enabled to penetrate the designs of Russia, and predict, with remarkable precision, much that has since been confirmed in the events that have taken place.

ADAIR, a county in Kentucky, in the United States of America. Area, 440 square miles. Pop. About 10,000, of whom three-fourths are slaves.—Also, a county in Missouri. Area, 607 square miles. Pop. 2,500.

ADAL, ai'-dăl, a name adopted by European geographers to designate a part of the eastern coast of Africa, inhabited by the Arabs Danakil, who call themselves Affar. The length of this coast along the Red Sea is about 300 miles, and its width 40 miles. Desc. Varied with hill and dale, but, on the whole, barren. A good deal of butter is made and sent to Massowa, and thence to Arabia. It contains plains of salt, which is cut into pieces the size of a whetstone, and in Abyssinia used as a currency. Wild animals. Leopards, lynxes, wolves, hyenas, and numerous others, which prey upon the cattle, the antelopes, and the hares, which are likewise numerous. Domestic animals. Camels, asses, mules, goats, and sheep are abundant, and in a great measure constitute the riches of the country. Inhabitants. The tribes by which this region is traversed, live a nomadic life, and have no commerce save salt, which they collect on the Bahr Assal, and transport along the caravan-road to Shoa. Lat. between 11° 30′ and 15° 40′ N.—An existing tradition says that Adal was once a powerful empire; but when the barbarous state of its inhabitants, and all that is about them, are taken into consideration, this is utterly incredible. Until 1840 the country may be said to have been entirely unknown to Europe. Then the English possessed themselves of Aden, in Arabia, which naturally opened the way to a more intimate connection with the countries in its neighbourhood.

ADALARD, or ADELARD, ă'-dă-lar, cousin-german of Charlemagne. In 823 he founded the abbey of New Corbie, in Saxony. B. about 753; D. 826.—Some fragments of his writings are extant.

ADALBERON, Ascelinus, a-dal'-be-ron, a bishop of Laon, who treacherously delivered up Arnoul, archbishop of Rheims, and Charles, duke of Lorraine, who had put themselves under his protection, to Hugh Capet. D. 1030.—There is a poem of his extant, which contains some curious historical facts.

ADALBERT, ăd'-al-bair, archbishop of Magdeburg, was employed by the emperor Otho I. to preach the gospel to the Russians, among whom he met with little success. He afterwards laboured to more advantage among the Sclavonians. Lived in the 10th century.

ADALBERT, an archbishop of Prague, and successful missionary in Hungary, Prussia, and Lithuania, where he was murdered by a pagan priest in the 10th century.—It is affirmed that Boscleus, prince of Poland, ransomed the body of this archbishop with its equal weight in gold.

ADALBERT, an archbishop of Bremen and Hamburg. D. 1072.

ADAM, ăd-am, the father of mankind, was created out of the earth, and placed in the garden of Eden, whence he was expelled for eating the forbidden fruit. The creation of Adam is generally placed in the year 4004 before Christ. After his exile from Paradise he lived 930 years.

ADAM, Melchior, a German biographer, born in Silesia, and educated in the college of Brieg. D. 1622.—He published 5 vols. of "Memoirs of Eminent Men," a work still esteemed.

ADAM, Scotus, a Scotch monkish historian, educated in the monastery of Lindisfarne. Thence he went to Paris, and became a member of the Sorbonne. He afterwards returned to his native country, and was a monk, first at Melrose, and lastly at Durham. Flourished in the 12th century.—He wrote the life of St. Columbus, and that of David I., king of Scotland, which were printed at Antwerp in 1659, fol.

ADAM, Lambert Sigisbert, a French sculptor. Various works of his are scattered over France, and are greatly admired. B. at Nancy, 1700; D. 1759.

ADAM, Nicholas, brother of the above, also an eminent artist. He executed the mausoleum of the Queen of Poland, at Bonsecours, and some other fine pieces. B. at Nanci, 1705; D. 1778.

ADAM, Francis Gaspard, a younger brother of the above, who followed the same occupation with his brothers. He went to Prussia, where he gained a great reputation. B. at Nancy, 1710; D. at Paris, 1759.

ADAM, a canon of Bremen. Lived in the 11th century.—His work, entitled "Historia Ecclesiastica Ecclesiæ Hamburgensis et Bremensis," was printed in 1670, 4to.

ADAM, Billaut, a French poet, originally a joiner of Nevers, and patronized by Cardinal Richelieu.—Flourished in the 17th century.—His poems are now extremely scarce.

ADAM, Robert, an architect, who studied in Italy, and on his return was made architect to King George III., which office he resigned in 1768. He gave a new turn to the architecture of this country, and procured great fame by the number and elegance of his designs. B. at Kirkaldy, Scotland, 1728; D. 1792. Adam represented in Parliament the county of Kinross, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. He and his brother were the first to make use of stucco in London, as an imitation of stone.

ADAM, Thomas, an English divine, who, at Hertford College, Oxford, took his degree of B.A. On entering into orders, he obtained the living of Wintringham, in Lincolnshire, of which he continued rector fifty-eight years, though he might have had considerable preferment; but being set against pluralities, he refused every offer of promotion. B. at Leeds, 1701; D. at Wintringham, 1784.—He published a paraphrase of the first eleven chapters of the Romans, 8vo. His other works are lectures on the Church Catechism, a volume of sermons, and a posthumous collection of "Thoughts," to which his life is prefixed.

ADAMANTÆA, ăd-a-măn-tē'-a, Jupiter's nurse in Crete. She suspended the infant god to a tree, that he might be found neither on the earth, the sea, nor in heaven. To drown his cries, she had cymbals sounded and drums beaten around the tree.

ADAMS, Sir Thomas, ăd'-ams, Lord Mayor of London, and brought up a draper in that city. In 1609 he was chosen an alderman, and in 1615 served the office of lord mayor. He was so notorious for his loyalty, that the republicans searched his house in hopes of finding King Charles I., and, though disappointed, they confined him in the Tower. He sent Charles II. £10,000 during his exile, and when the restoration was resolved on, he was appointed by the City to wait on that sovereign, who knighted him at the Hague, and in 1661 created him a baronet. B. at Wem, Shropshire, 1586; D. 1667.—After his death, a stone was taken from him weighing twenty-five ounces, which is now in the laboratory at Cambridge. He founded a school at Wem, and an Arabic professorship at Cambridge, and was at the expense of printing the Gospels in Persian, and sending them to the East.

ADAMS, Thomas, A.M., a fellow of Brazenose College, Oxford, who was ejected in 1662 for non-conformity. He then became chaplain to Sir Samuel Jones, of Shropshire, and afterwards to Lady Clare, in Northamptonshire. D. in 1670.—He wrote "Protestant Union, or Principles of Religion," a very useful work.

ADAMS, Richard, A.M., was also educated at Brazenose College, Oxford, and afterwards had the living of St. Mildred, Bread-street, whence he was ejected in 1662. D. in 1698.—He was one of the editors of Charnock's works, and helped to finish Matthew Poole's annotations on the Bible.

ADAMS, John, an eminent American statesman, who took an active part in effecting the independence of his country. Before the rupture between Great Britain and America he practised as a lawyer, and, in 1770, met in convention at Boston, when the British government had announced their intention of stationing a military force in that city, to make the people submit to the new imposts on tea, glass, paper, &c. In 1773 he became a member of the Council of State, and devoted all his energies to promote the cause he had espoused. He advocated and seconded the Declaration of Independence, which was passed on the 4th of July, 1776, and which was drawn up by Mr. Jefferson. In 1780 he represented the United States in Holland, and in 1782 co-operated with Franklin and the other American commissioners in negotiating a treaty of peace with the mother country. In 1785 he became the first ambassador from the United States to Great Britain, and in that capacity had his first audience with George III. on the 2nd of June. He stayed in England till 1787. In 1789, when Washington was elected president, he was made vice-president, and in 1793 had the same office again conferred him. In 1797, on the retirement of Washington, he was chosen President, and at the close of his term of four years, being defeated by Jefferson in the candidateship for re-election, he retired from public life. B. at Braintree, near Boston, Massachusetts, 1735; D. at Quincy, 1826.—It was on the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of American Independence that Mr. Adams died, and Jefferson, his coadjutor in laying the foundations of the great commonwealth of the New World, expired on the same day. As an author, Mr. Adams is known by a work entitled, "A Defence of the Constitution and Government of the United States," which, in a new dress, again appeared with the title of a "History of the Principal Republics of the World."

ADAMS, Charles B., an American naturalist, who has devoted much of his time to the study of the Molluscs. Three winters which he passed in the island of Jamaica enabled him to throw much light on the formation of that island, of which a complete monograph is meditated. He has both written and published a great many papers on Conchology. B. at Dorchester, Massachusetts, 1814.

ADAMS, John, the patriarch of Pitcairn's Island, and one of the mutineers in his majesty's ship Bounty, 1789. He settled, with several other of the mutineers and some Otaheitans, in Pitcairn's Island, where, after the death and destruction of his English companions, he became, from a rough and desperate character, a humane and religious man; he introduced Christianity and the laws of marriage amongst those that were with him on the island, and regulated the community entirely upon Christian principles. D. 1829.—In the voyages of Captain Beechy a portrait of Adams, whose original name was Smith, may be seen, and a fac-simile of his handwriting. Circumstances made him, as they do most celebrated men, an extraordinary character.

ADAMS, John Couch, an astronomer, and one of the discoverers of the planet Neptune. He became president of the Astronomical Society, and in 1848 received the Copley medal, as the highest scientific award of the Royal Society. B. in a small farmhouse in the Bodmin Moors, Cornwall.

ADAMS, John Quincy, the eldest son of the second President of the United States. He represented his country at Berlin, and in 1814 was plenipotentiary of the United States at the congress of Vienna. In 1815 he was ambassador at the court of St. James's. In 1817 he became secretary, and in 1825 President of the Union, in which office he was succeeded by General Jackson. B. in Massachusetts, 1767; D. at Washington, 1848.—Mr. Adams published, in a volume, a series of letters on the state of Silesia, which were the result of his observations made on a tour through that country. He was a warm advocate of the abolition of slavery.

ADAMS, Samuel, a member of American Congress, and one of the strongest advocates of the political separation of that country from Britain. B. 1722; D. 1803.

ADAMS, Lieutenant-General, a distinguished soldier, who fought under Wellington in India, and who, by his meritorious services, was gradually promoted to his rank of lieutenant-general. D. in Pembroke, 1834.—The death of this soldier occurred under melancholy circumstances. He was shooting on his own estate, when his fowling-piece, accidentally discharging itself whilst he was getting over a hedge, blew one side of his head completely off.

ADAMS, the name of five different counties and two townships in the United States of America. 1. In Pennsylvania. 2. In Ohio. 3. In Indiana. 4. In Mississippi. 5. In Illinois. The townships are in Massachusetts and New York; and many villages and smaller townships of the same name are scattered over the States.

ADAM'S BRIDGE, a line of shoals crossing the Gulf of Manaar, between Ceylon and Hindostan.

ADAMSON, Patrick, ăd'-am-sun, a Scotch prelate, who, passing through several vicissitudes in various countries in which he travelled, returned to his own in 1573, and became minister of Paisley. In 1575 he sat as commissioner for settling the government of the church, and soon after was raised to the see of St. Andrew's, on which he was violently persecuted by the Presbyterians. In 1583 he was sent ambassador to Queen Elizabeth; but on his return to Scotland, in 1584, he found the Presbyterian party very violent, and at a synod, in 1586, they excommunicated him. The king also alienated the revenues of his see, and thereby reduced him and his family to a wretched condition. His works have been collected and published in 4to. B. at Perth, 1536; D. 1591.—Adamson wrote a Latin poem on the birth of James VI., for which he was arrested at Paris, and confined six months. Whilst under concealment, at an inn in Bourges, for seven months, he employed himself in translating the book of Job into Latin verse, and in writing a tragedy of Herod in the same tongue. His works have been collected, and published in 4to.

ADAM'S PEAK, a lofty mountain in the centre of the island of Ceylon. Height, 7,420 feet.

ADAMSTOWN, a village and parish of Ireland, 18 miles from Wexford. Area, 8,134 acres. Pop. about 2,000.

ADAMUR, a-da-mooer, a town of Spain, in the province of Andalusia, 21 miles from Cordova. Pop. nearly 3,000.

ADANA, a-dă'-na, a pashalic, and a town of Natolia, seated on the Sihoon, 25 miles N.E. of Tarsus. Trade. Wine, fruit, corn, cotton, and wool. Lat. 37° 10′ N. Lon. 35° 12′ E. Pop. 10,000.—Here is a bridge, said to have been erected by Justinian.

ADANSON, Michael, ăd'-ăn-sun, a French naturalist, of Scotch extraction, who is supposed to have imbibed his love of natural history from his preceptors, the celebrated Reaumur and Bernard de Jussien. His genius being of that active kind which delights in adventure, in his 21st year he set out for a voyage to Senegal, where he spent five years in making collections illustrative of his favourite pursuits. In 1753 he returned to Paris, greatly reduced in circumstances; but it is to be presumed that his vastly increased fund of knowledge helped to restore his fortunes. He continued to pursue his studies until the breaking out of the French revolution, which involved him in ruin. We find him, after this, so poor that, on being invited to become a member on the establishment of the Institute of France, he was compelled to refuse, because he could not make his appearance, for the "want of shoes." About the close of his life he enjoyed a small pension from the French government. B. at Aix, in Provence, 1727; D. at Paris, 1806.—Adanson wrote a work entitled "The Natural History of Senegal," and another under the name of "The Families of Plants," in which he advocated a system of classification different from that of Linnæus. For many years previous to his death, he entertained the plan of producing an "Encyclopædia of Natural History," to be embellished with 10,000 figures; but it fell to the ground. Adanson was a great friend to civil liberty, and an ardent philanthropist, being among the first to advocate slave emancipation.

ADARSA, or ADASA, a-dar'-sa, a city of Ephraim, not far from Gophna, where Nicanor was defeated by Judas Maccabeus.

ADDA, ăd'-da, a river of Switzerland, which rises in the Grisons, runs through the Valteline and the Lake of Como, by Lecco, and falls into the Po, near Cremona.

ADDEPHAGIA, ad-de-fā'-je-a, a goddess of the Sicilians.

ADDINGTON, Anthony, ăd'-ding-ton, a physician who settled at Reading, where he had considerable practice, particularly in cases of insanity. B. 1713; D. 1790.—Wrote an "Essay on the Scurvy, with the Method of preserving Water sweet at Sea," 8vo; another on "Mortality among Cattle," 8vo; and a pamphlet concerning a negotiation between Lord Chatham and Lord Bute, 8vo. He was the father of Viscount Sidmouth.

ADDINGTON, Henry. (See SIDMOUTH, Lord.)

ADDISON, Lancelot, ăd'-de-sun, a divine, who was sent to Queen's College, Oxford, where he took his degrees in arts. He was chosen one of the terræ filii at the Act in 1658, but being satirical on the men in power, in his oration, he was obliged to ask pardon on his knees. He soon after quitted Oxford, and lived retired till the Restoration, when he became chaplain to the garrison at Dunkirk; and in 1663, to that at Tangier. He returned to England in 1670, and was made chaplain in ordinary to his majesty. Shortly after he obtained the living of Milston, in Wiltshire, and a prebend in the cathedral of Salisbury. In 1683 he was promoted to the deanery of Lichfield. B. at Crosby Ravensworth, Westmoreland, 1632; D. 1703.—He is the author of "An Account of the Present State of the Jews," and a "Description of West Barbary," which show him to have been a man of learning and observation.

ADDISON, Joseph, son of the above, was, after receiving the rudiments of his education, sent to the Charter-house, where he contracted an intimacy with Sir Richard Steele. In 1687 he was admitted at Queen's College, Oxford, but afterwards was entered at Magdalen. In 1693 he took his degree of M.A., and became eminent for his Latin poetry. At the age of 22 he addressed some verses to Dryden, in English, and not long after published a translation of part of Virgil's fourth Georgic. About this time he wrote the arguments prefixed to the several books of Dryden's Virgil, and composed the "Essay on the Georgics." In 1695 he addressed a poem to King William, which recommended him to Lord Somers. In 1699 he obtained a pension of £300 a year, to enable him to travel. He made the tour of France and Italy, improving his mind to the best advantage, as appears from his "Letter to Lord Halifax," which is considered the most elegant of his poetical works, and his "Travels in Italy," which he dedicated, at his return, to Lord Somers. He returned in 1702, and found his old friends out of place. In 1704 he was introduced to Lord Godolphin as a fit person to celebrate the victory of Blenheim, and produced "The Campaign," for which he was rewarded with the place of commissioner of appeals. Next year he went to Hanover with Lord Halifax, and soon after was appointed under-secretary of state. The rage for Italian operas which then prevailed, induced him to write his "Rosamond," which did not succeed, probably because it was English. When the marquis of Wharton went to Ireland as lord-lieutenant, Addison accompanied him as secretary, and was made keeper of the records there, with a salary of £300 a year. While he was in Ireland, Steele commenced the "Tatler," to which Addison liberally contributed. This was followed by the "Spectator," which he also enriched by his contributions, distinguished by one of the letters of the word CLIO. In 1713 his tragedy of "Cato" was brought upon the stage, amidst the plaudits of both Whigs and Tories. At this time the "Guardian" appeared, to which Addison contributed those papers which are marked by a hand. An attempt was afterwards made to revive the "Spectator," but after the publication of eighty numbers, the work was relinquished. Addison's quota amounts to about a fourth part of this second attempt. In 1715 he began the "Freeholder," and continued it till the middle of the next year, in defence of the government. In 1716 he married the Countess Dowager of Warwick, to whose son he had been tutor; but the marriage did not prove happy. In 1717 he became secretary of state, which office he soon resigned, on a pension of £1,500 a year. In his retirement he planned a tragedy on the death of Socrates, but did not execute it. What was perhaps more in accordance with his sentiments, he commenced "A Defence of the Christian Religion," part of which appeared after his death, and makes us regret that he did not live to perfect it. He also conceived the plan of an English dictionary, to be carried out in the manner subsequently adopted by Dr. Johnson. In 1719 he engaged in a political dispute with Steele, who, in his pamphlet of the "Old Whig," he contemptuously styled "little Dicky." B. at Milston, Wilts, 1672; D. at Holland House, 1719.—It is to be regretted that the same year which witnessed the demise of Addison should have been clouded by a dispute between him and his old friend and coadjutor, Steele. It is said that when he found the pressure of death upon him, he sent for Lord Warwick, and, affectionately pressing his hand, whispered, "See in what peace a Christian can die!" He left only one daughter, who died unmarried, in 1797. Dr. Johnson says, "Whoever wishes to attain an English style, familiar but not coarse, and elegant but not ostentatious, must give his days and nights to the volumes of Addison." His style, however, is deficient in force.

ADELAIDE, Madame, ăd'-e-laid, an aunt of Louis XVI. of France. On the 19th of February, 1791, she, with her sister Victoire, fled from the horrors of the French revolution, and sought an asylum in Rome, Naples, and several other places, without success. At length they arrived at Corfu, where they obtained protection until the Russian general Outschaord, took them to Trieste, where they fixed their residence. Victoire died in 1799, and her sister followed her to the grave, nine months afterwards.

ADELAIDE, Amelia Louisa Teresa Caroline, wife of William IV., and queen of England. She was sister to the duke of Saxe-Meimingen, and was married July 11, 1818. She was a lady possessed of many exalted virtues, and was a liberal benefactress of the poor. B. 1792; D. 1849.

ADELAIDE, the capital of South Australia, the seat of the government, and an episcopal city, stands on the river Torrens, which divides it into two parts, the North and the South. These divisions are connected by several wooden bridges, and a belt of park-land, converted into a kind of public garden, runs round the whole of the city, as well as between its two divisions. The south side is the principal place of commerce. The north, standing on a gentle slope, and occupying a much smaller area than the other, is the pleasanter of the two. The streets of both are wide, but indifferently paved, and inadequately lighted. Up to 1852 South Adelaide was without drainage; but since then, sanitary arrangements have been made, and public improvements carried on with considerable activity. No burial-ground is permitted to be attached to any church or chapel in the city, and the cattle which are sold in the market lying outside the city, are allowed to be slaughtered only in the city slaughter-house, a large building erected on the left bank of the Torrens, about half a mile below the town. At a distance of eight miles, and on the shore of the Gulf of St. Vincent, is Port Adelaide, where are built wharfs, warehouses, and every convenience for merchants and shippers. Formerly the goods were conveyed from here to Adelaide by bullocks and horses, but these have since been almost entirely superseded by the laying down of a railway. Albert Town is a small straggling village, at about a mile from the port, and mostly inhabited by persons connected with the shipping. In 1845 the port was made free to all nations. Adelaide was founded in 1836. Pop., with Port Adelaide and Albert Town, about 20,000. Lat. 34° 56′ S. Lon. 138° 36′ E.—(See SOUTH AUSTRALIA.)

ADELAIDE ARCHIPELAGO. (See ARCHIPELAGO.)

ADELARD, ăd'-e-lar, a monk of Bath, who travelled into Egypt and Arabia, and translated the "Elements of Euclid" out of Arabic into Latin, before any Greek copies of that celebrated work had been discovered. He also translated and wrote several other treatises on mathematical and medical subjects, which are to be seen in MS. in the libraries of Corpus Christi and Trinity colleges, Oxford.—Flourished in the 12th century.

ADELBOLD, ăd'-el-bold, a bishop of Utrecht, who wrote the life of Henry II., emperor of Germany, which is still extant. D. 1027.

ADELER, Curtius, ăd'-e-ler, also named Servisen, a Norwegian, who, after serving in the Dutch navy, entered the Venetian service, in which he was raised to the rank of admiral, and, subsequently, was made a knight of St. Mark, and obtained a pension for his meritorious conduct. On leaving the Venetian service, he went to Amsterdam, where he married a lady of rank. We next find him admiral-in-chief of the Danish fleet, and created a noble. B. 1622; D. at Copenhagen, 1675.

ADELGREIFF, John Albrecht, ăd'-el-greef, a German, supposed to be a magician, whose reputed blasphemous fanaticism and sedition caused him to be put to death at Koningsburg, 1636.

ADELMAN, ăd'-el-man, a bishop of Brescia, who wrote a letter on the Eucharist, which is in a collection printed at Louvain in 1561, in 8vo. D. 1062.

ADELPHUS, ăd'-del'-phus, a disciple of Plato, and the composer of a singular theory, compounded of the doctrines of Plato, the Gnostics, and others; greatly followed, though he was opposed by Plotinus.—Flourished in the third century.

ADELSBERG, ăd'-els-berg, a small market-town in the duchy of Carniola, Austria, 22 miles from Laibach, celebrated for some remarkable caverns found in its neighbourhood.

ADELUNG, Johann Christoph, ăd'-e-lung, a universal linguist and grammarian, who finished his education at the university of Stalle. He became professor in the Evangelical Gymnasium at Erfurt, which appointment he resigned in 1761, on account of a religious dispute with the Catholic town magistrates. He then went to Leipsic, where he supported himself by literature till 1787, when he was appointed to the office of principal librarian at Dresden. B. at Spantekon, in Pomerania, in August, 1732; D. at Dresden, September, 1806.—He is best known by his "Grammatical and Critical Dictionary."

ADEMAR, ăd'-e-mar, a monk, who wrote chronicles of France, which were published by Labbe. He flourished in the 10th century.

ADEN, ai'-den, or a'-den, a seaport, the capital of the state of Aden, situate on a rocky peninsula in the south-west extremity of Arabia, projecting into the sea. It was formerly strongly fortified, and the most opulent city of Arabia; but had altogether declined, when it was, in 1840, taken possession of by the British, who have converted it from ruin and misery into a flourishing place of trade, encompassed by fruitful orchards and blooming gardens. Its harbours are the best on the Arabian coast. Between the mountain-masses which command their entrance, there is a space of four miles, and vessels may take up any position in a depth of water of from 5 to 10 fathoms. On account of this, Aden has become one of the principal coaling stations of the Anglo-Indian mail steamers, and every year it is becoming a place of greater importance. Pop. 24,000. Lat. 12° 46′ N. Lon. 45° 10′ E.

ADENBURG, a'-den-burg, a town of Westphalia, in the duchy of Berg, 12 miles from Cologne.

ADEN KALESSI, ai'-den ka-les'-se, a Turkish fortress on an island in the Danube, where are bomb-proof casemates for two hundred men.

ADENORE, a'-den-ore, a town of Hindostan, in the Carnatic, 5 miles S. of Volconda.

ADEODATUS, ai'-de'-o-dai'-tus, "God's-gift," a pious and charitable pontiff, who obtained the tiara in 672. B. at Rome; D. 676.

ADER, William, a'-der, a physician of Toulouse, who wrote a book entitled, "De Ægrotis et Morbis Evangelicis;" in which he proves that the diseases healed by our Saviour were incurable by medicine. —Flourished in the 17th century.

ADERBEITZAN, a-der'-bite'-zan, a province of Persia, bounded on the N. by Armenia, W. by Ghilan, S. by Irac-Agemi, and W. by Kurdistan. Tauris is the capital.

ADES, or HADES, ha'-dees, the god of hell among the Greeks, and the same as the Pluto of the Latins. The term is, by the ancients, often used to signify hell itself.

ADET, P. A., a'-dai, an envoy, who represented France in the United States, 1796. He is known both as an original author in chemistry and a translator; he suggested new chemical characters and nomenclature.

ADHAD-EDDOULAT, ad'-ha-ed'-doo-la, a Persian emperor who succeeded his uncle, Amad-Eddoulat, and by his conquests greatly enlarged his territories. In 977 he took Bagdad, and increased its beauty by the erection of hospitals, mosques, and other public works. D. 982.—This emperor was a friend to literature, and gave great encouragement to poets and men of learning.

ADHELME, ăd-helm, son of Kenred and nephew of Ina, king of the West Saxons. He became abbot of Malmesbury, was the first bishop of Sherborne, as he was, also, the first Englishman who wrote in Latin, and the first who brought poetry into this country. D. 709, and was canonized.

ADHEMAR, William, ăd-he'-mar, a celebrated poet of Provence. D. about 1190.

ADIABENE, ăd'-e-a-be'-ne, the principal region of the six districts given to Assyria. It is sometimes used to imply the whole of Assyria.

ADIATORIX, ai-de-at'-o-rix, a governor of Galatia, who, to gain Antony's favour, slaughtered, in one night, all the inhabitants of the Roman colony of Heraclea, in Pontus. He was made prisoner at Actium, and, after being led in triumph by Augustus, was strangled in prison.

ADIGE, a'-deedje, a river which rises to the south of the Lake of Glace, enters the Tyrol, and runs by Trent and Verona into the Gulf of Venice, where it empties itself, about 5 miles south of Chiogga. It is the ancient Athesis, and is called by the Germans the Etsch, throughout its entire length, which is about 250 miles. Nearly 200 flour and rice mills are driven by this river, which, with its valley, has been rendered for ever memorable by the wars of Bonaparte.

ADIMANTUS, ad-e-man'-tus, one of the sect of the Manichees, who denied the authority of the Old Testament, in a book which was answered by St. Augustine. —Flourished at the end of the 3rd century.

ADIMARI, Raphael, ad-e-ma'-ri, an Italian author, who wrote the history of Rimini. Flourished in the 16th century.

ADIMARI, Alexander, a Florentine poet, who acquired a high reputation. B. at Florence, 1579; D. 1649.

ADINKIRKE, ad'-in-kerk, a village of Belgium, 18 miles south of Ostend. Pop. 1,000.

ADJUNTA, ad'-jun-ta, an Indian town in Hyderabad, or the territory of the Nizam. In its neighbourhood are some remarkable cavern-temples, profusely decorated with Buddhistic paintings or sculptures. Lat. 20° N. Lon. 75° 50' E.

ADJYGURH, ad-je-gur, a town and district of British India, in the province of Allahabad. In 1809 it was taken by the British. Area, 340 square miles. Pop. from 40,000 to 50,000. Annual revenue, £33,000. Lat. 24° 52' N. Lon. 80° 20' E.

ADLER, James George, ad'-ler, a Danish orientalist and philosopher. He produced a work entitled, "Museum Cufieum," and several works on the language, laws, and rites of the Jews. B. 1756.

ADLER, Philip, a German engraver, and apparently the founder of the school which gave rise to the Hopfars and Hollar.—He flourished in the 16th century.

ADLERFELDT, Gustavus, ad'-ler-felt, a gentleman of the bedchamber of Charles XII., whose history he wrote with great fidelity. B. at Stockholm. Fell at the battle of Pultowa, 1709.—A French translation of his history was published in 1740.

ADLINGFLEET, ăd-ling-fleet, a parish in the West Riding of Yorkshire, 8 miles south of Howden. Area, 4,580 acres. Pop. 500.

ADLINGTON, ad-ling-ton, a township near Macclesfield, in Cheshire, in which the inhabitants are chiefly employed in silk manufactures. Pop. 1,500.—There is another township near Wigan, in Lancashire. Pop. 1,100.

ADLZREITTER, John, adl-zreit-ter, a German, chancellor of Bavaria, who wrote the annals of Bavaria in Latin, folio.—Flourished in the 17th century.—His "Annals" were printed in Leipsic in 1710.

ADMAH, ăd'-ma, the most easterly of the five cities of the plain, consumed by fire from heaven, and the site of which was afterwards submerged by the waters of the Dead Sea.

ADMETUS, ăd-me'-tus, the most remarkable of this name was a king of Pheræ, in Thessaly. Apollo, when banished from heaven, is said to have tended his flocks for nine years, and to have obtained from the Parcæ that Admetus should never die, if another person laid down his life for him. This was cheerfully done by his wife, Alceste.—Admetus was one of the Argonauts, and was at the hunt of the Calydonian boar. Pelias promised his daughter in marriage only to him who could bring him a chariot drawn by a lion and a wild boar. Admetus did this by the aid of Apollo, and obtained Alceste in marriage.

ADMIRALTY ISLAND, ăd'-me-ral-te, on the North-American coast, about 80 miles long and 20 wide, belonging to Russia. It is covered with pine forests, and was circumnavigated by Vancouver. Lat. about 58° 24' N. Lon. 135° 30' W.

ADMIRALTY ISLANDS, a cluster of islands in the Pacific Ocean, to the N.W. of New Ireland. They were visited in 1767 by Captain Carteret, but were, in 1616, discovered by the Dutch. Some of them are of considerable extent, and the centre one is supposed to be about 45 miles long. None appear to be inhabited but those that are covered with cocoa-trees; and as they are little raised above the level of the sea, it is believed that water must be scarce. The inhabitants are of a dark colour, with woolly hair, and go naked. Lat. between 2° and 3° S. Lon. between 146° 18' and 147° 46' E.

ADO, a-do, archbishop of Vienne, in Dauphiny. D. 875, aged 75.—He wrote a "Universal Chronicle," printed at Paris, 1522, and at Rome in 1745, folio; and a "Martyrology," published in 1613.

ADOLPHATI, a-dol-fa'-te, an Italian musician, who composed a piece in which there were two kinds of time—one of two notes, and the other of three—in the same air. He was, besides, both the author and composer of several operas.

ADOLPHUS, John, ă-dol'-fus, a barrister of considerable standing in the criminal courts, being a ready speaker, a sharp advocate, and a sound lawyer. He was leading counsel in the Thistlewood conspiracy of 1820, in which case he greatly distinguished himself, although he was retained for the conspirators but a few hours before the trial of the prisoners. B. 1770; D. 1845.—As an author, Adolphus is known by a "History of England from the Accession of George III." He was also the author of the "Political State of the British Empire," "Biographical Memoirs," and fugitive pieces and pamphlets now forgotten.

ADOLPHUS, Count of Nassau, elected emperor of Germany in 1292. His rapacity and tyrannical conduct caused a confederation to be formed against him, at the head of which was Albert, duke of Austria. He fell in battle, July 2, 1298.

ADOLPHUS, Count of Cleves, who instituted the Order of Fools, 1380, which consisted of the principal noblemen of Cleves, and which has long since ceased to exist.

ADOLPHUS, G., a warlike duke of Holstein, and son of Frederick, king of Denmark. B. 1526; D. 1586. —His name frequently occurs in the military transactions of Germany.

ADOLPHUS-FREDERICK II. of Holstein Gottorp, king of Sweden, succeeded his father in 1751. He reformed the laws, and encouraged learning and the arts of peace. B. 1710; D. 1771.—This sovereign instituted, at Torneo, in Lapland, an academy of inscriptions and belles-lettres.

ADONI, a-do-ne, a town of India, situate in the Deccan, under the presidency of Madras, in Golconda, on one of the branches of the Tungchadda, 175 miles S.W. of Hyderabad. In 1787 it was reduced to ruins by Tippoo Saib.

ADONIA, ă-do'-ne-a, festivals in honour of Adonis, first celebrated at Byblos, in Phœnicia. They lasted two days, the first of which was spent in howlings and lamentations, the second in joyful acclamations, as if Adonis had returned to life. Only women were admitted, and such as did not appear, were compelled to undergo, for one day, a punishment revolting to virtue.

ADONI-BEZEK, ăd-o'-ni-be'-zek, king of Bezek, in Canaan. He was a cruel prince, on account of which his thumbs and great toes were cut off by the tribes of Judah and Simeon, after they had defeated him in a great battle. D. at Jerusalem, B.C. 1443.

ADONIJAH, ăd'-o-ni'-ja, the fourth son of King David, by Haggiah. He aimed at his father's crown, but Solomon was proclaimed king of Israel, when Adonijah fled to the tabernacle for protection. B.C. 1015.

ADONIS, ă-do'-nis, son of Cinyras, by his daughter Myrrha, the favourite of Venus. He was fond of hunting, and was often cautioned by his mistress not to hunt wild beasts, for fear of being killed in the exercise. This advice he slighted, and at last received a mortal bite from a wild boar which he had wounded, and Venus, after shedding many tears at his death, changed him into the flower called anemone. Proserpine is said to have restored him to life, on condition that he should spend six months with her, and the rest of the year with Venus. This implies the alternate return of summer and winter.—Adonis had temples raised to his memory, and is said to have been beloved by Apollo and Bacchus.

ADONY, a-do-ne, a Hungarian town on the banks of the Danube, 28 miles south of Pesth. Pop., about 3,000.

ADORF, ad-orf, the most southern town of Saxony, in Voigtland, seated on the Elsther, 15 miles N.N.W. of Egra. Manf. Chiefly cotton goods. Pop. 3,000.

ADORNE, Francis, ad-orn, a Jesuit of Genoa, who wrote a treatise on ecclesiastical discipline. D. 1586.

ADOUR, ad'-oor, a river of France, which rises six miles to the east of Barèges, in the department of the Upper Pyrenees, and running by Tarbes and Dax, falls into the Bay of Biscay, three miles beyond Bayonne, where it joins the Nive. Its course, through many fertile valleys, is about 180 miles.

ADOWA, ad'-o-a, one of the principal towns in the kingdom of Tigré, Abyssinia, with houses built in a conical form, and arranged into streets. It is the great mart between the interior and the coast, and reaps the advantage of a transit trade between the Red Sea ports and Gondaro. Pop. 7,000. Lat. 14° 12′ 30″ N. Lon. 39° 5′ E.

ADRA, a'-dra, a seaport of Spain, in Grenada, 60 miles S.E. of Grenada. Its lead-mines are the chief support of the inhabitants. Pop. 7,500.

ADRAMMELECH, ăd-ram'-e-lek, "magnificence of the king," a son of Sennacherib, king of Assyria, slain by his sons, B.C. 713.—One of the gods adored by the inhabitants of Sepharnaim.

ADRAMPATAM, ad-ram'-pa-tam, an Indian town in the British district of Tanjore, presidency of Madras, 34 miles W. of Point Calimere.

ADRAMYTI, a-dra-me'-te, a town of Natolia, on the E. coast of a gulf of its name, 83 miles N. of Smyrna. Gall-nuts, olives, and wool form its principal exports.

ADRARA, a-dra'-ra, a village of Lombardy, celebrated for the wars of the Guelphs and the Ghibellines, 74 miles from Bargamo.

ADRASTA, ad-ras-ta, one of the Oceanides, who nursed Jupiter.

ADRASTIA, ăd-ras'-te-a, a daughter of Jupiter and Necessity. She is called by some Nemesis, and is the avenger of wrong. The Egyptians placed her above the moon, whence she looked down upon the actions of men.

ADRASTUS, ăd-răs'-tus. There are many of this name in ancient history, the most remarkable of whom is the son of Talaus and Lysimache, who was king of Argos. Polynices being banished from Thebes by his brother Eteocles, fled to Argos, where he married Argia, daughter of Adrastus. The king assisted his son-in-law, and marched against Thebes with an army led by seven of his most famous generals. All perished in the war except Adrastus, who, with a few men who were saved from slaughter, fled to Athens, and implored the aid of Theseus against the Thebans, who opposed the burying of the Argives fallen in battle. Theseus went to his assistance, and was victorious.—Adrastus, after a long reign, died through grief, occasioned by the death of his son Ægialeus. A temple was raised to his memory at Sicyon.

ADRETS, Baron des, Francis de Beaumont, ăd'-rai, a violent Huguenot, who signalized himself by many daring exploits, as well as cruelties. He subsequently became a Catholic, but died as he had lived, in general detestation. D. 1587.—At some places he obliged his prisoners to throw themselves from the battlements, upon the pikes of his soldiers. Reproaching one for retreating twice from the fatal leap, "Sir," replied the man, "I defy you, with all your bravery, to take it in three." This keen rejoinder saved his life.

ADRIA, John James, ad'-re-a, a Sicilian writer, who became physician-general to Charles V. of Spain. D. 1560.

ADRIA, a town of Italy, in Polesino di Rovigo, the see of a bishop, who resides at Rovigo. This town gives name to the Adriatic Sea, and was formerly of great note, but has been much reduced by frequent inundations. It is crossed by the Castaguaro, a branch of the Adige, and stands 30 miles S.S.W. of Venice. Pop. about 10,000. Lat. 45° 3′ N. Lon. 11° E.

ADRIAM, Marie, a-dre-am, a female who, at the age of 16, defended her native town of Lyons with the utmost valour throughout the whole time of its being besieged, in 1793, by the French army of the Convention. At the close of the siege she was arrested and executed, with many others, who had so bravely distinguished themselves for a period of two months, in defence of the beleaguered city.

ADRIAN, Publius Ælius, ai'-dre-an, one of the greatest of the Roman emperors. He entered early into the army, and became tribune of a legion, when he married Sabina, the heiress of Trajan, whom he accompanied in his expeditions, and became successively prætor, governor of Pannonia, and consul. On the death of Trajan, in 117, he assumed the government, made peace with the Persians, and remitted the debts of the Roman people. No monarch informed himself more by travelling than Adrian. In 120 he visited Gaul, whence he passed over to Britain, where he erected a wall extending from the Solway Frith to the mouth of the Tyne. The object of this was to secure the Roman province from the incursions of the Caledonians. On leaving Britain he went into Africa and Asia, and in 125 was initiated into the Eleusinian mysteries at Athens. This, as a matter of course, according to Greek superstition, secured him an abode in the Elysian fields after his death. In his reign the Christians underwent a dreadful persecution. He built a temple to Jupiter, on Mount Calvary, and placed a statue of Adonis in the manger of Bethlehem; he also had images of swine engraved on the gates of Jerusalem, all of which acts indicate a contempt for Christianity. B. A.D. 76; D. at Baiæ, 139.—On his deathbed he composed some Latin verses, addressed to his soul, which betray his uncertainty with regard to a future state. He had great virtues, which were, however, blended with as great vices. He adopted as his son Titus Antonius, on condition that he should adopt Marcus Annius Verus and the son of Lucius Verus.

ADRIAN, an author, who wrote an introduction to the Scriptures, in Greek, printed at Augsburg in 1602, 4to; and in Latin, in 1650, folio. Lived in the fifth century.

ADRIAN, a Carthusian monk, known by a treatise, entitled "De Remediis Utriusque Fortunæ," printed at Cologne in 1471, folio.

ADRIAN I., one of a Roman patrician family, elected to the pontificate in 772. He sanctioned the worship of images, which had been allowed in a council held at Nice, in 787, but which was opposed by the kings of France and England. D. 795.

ADRIAN II., an ecclesiastic, who succeeded to the papal chair in 867. He contended, without success, for superiority over the patriarch of Constantinople and the crowned heads of the West. B. at Rome; D. 872.

ADRIAN III., a Roman, raised to the pontificate in 884, but died the next year, on his journey to a diet at Worms.

ADRIAN IV., the only Englishman who was ever raised to the dignity of the papal chair. His name was Nicholas Breakespere; and for some time he filled a mean situation in the monastery of St. Albans. Being refused the habit in that house, he went to France, and became a clerk in the monastery of St. Rufus, in Provence, of which he was afterwards chosen abbot. Eugenius III. created him a cardinal in 1146, and in 1148 sent him legate to Denmark and Norway, which nations he converted to the Christian faith. In 1154 he obtained the tiara, and Henry II., king of England, sent the abbot of St. Albans, with three bishops, to congratulate him. Adrian, disregarding the slight formerly put upon him by the brethren of St. Albans, granted considerable privileges to that monastery, and a bull to Henry for the conquest of Ireland. In 1155 he excommunicated the king of Sicily; and about the same time, the emperor Frederic, meeting him near Sutinam, held his stirrup while he mounted his horse. With this act his holiness seems to have been pleased, for he took the emperor to Rome with him, and consecrated him king of the Romans in St. Peter's church. The next year the king of Sicily submitted, and was absolved. B. at Langley, near St. Albans; D. supposed of poison, 1159.—Adrian, by his active conduct, left the papal territory in a better state than he found it, and bequeathed to posterity some letters and homilies still extant.

ADRIAN V. ascended the papal throne in 1276. He was despatched as legate to England in 1254, and again in 1265, to settle the disputes between Henry III. and his barons. B. at Geneva; D. 1276.—He only lived thirty-eight days after his election.

ADRIAN VI., a Dutchman, who was educated on charity at Louvain. The bishopric of Tortoso was conferred upon him by Ferdinand, king of Spain; and his successor Charles, during his minority, chose him to be regent. When that prince became emperor, by the title of Charles V., he placed unlimited confidence in Adrian, who, on the death of Leo X., in 1521, was elected pope. B. at Utrecht; D. 1523.

ADRIAN de Castello, an Italian, who, passing through several employments, it is presumed, without success, at last found his way to England, where Henry VII. first made him his agent at Rome, then gave him the bishopric of Hereford, and afterwards that of Bath and Wells. He farmed out his bishopric, preferring to live at Rome, where he built a superb palace, which he left to the king of England and his successors. Alexander VI. created him cardinal, in 1503; soon after which he narrowly escaped being poisoned with others of his order, at a feast given by the pope and his son Cæsar Borgia. Engaging in a plot against Pope Leo X., into which he was led by the prediction of a fortune-teller, that Leo should die a violent death, and be succeeded by one Adrian, he was fined 12,500 ducats, and prohibited from leaving Rome. However, in 1518, he fled from that city and was excommunicated. At this time he was at Venice; but what became of him afterwards is unknown. Polydore Virgil says he ended his days at Riva, in the diocese of Trent; and gives him a high character for erudition. B. at Cornetto, in Tuscany.

ADRIANI, John Baptist, a-dre-a'-ne, a Florentine who wrote the history of his own times in Italian. B. at Florence, 1511; D. at Florence, 1579.

ADRIANI, Marcel Virgil, a chancellor of the republic of Florence, and an expert scholar in the Greek and Latin languages. He translated Dioscorides from the former into the latter. B. 1464; D. 1521.

ADRIANI, Marcel, secretary to the Florentine republic, and son of the above chancellor. B. at Florence, 1513; D. 1579.—He wrote a "History of his Own Times," which has considerable merit.

ADRIANO, a-dre-a'-no, a mountain of Spain, in Biscay, over which is a very difficult road to Alba and Old Castille. It is one of the highest of the Pyrenees, and is only inhabited by a few shepherds.

ADRIANO, a Carmelite friar of Spain, and a painter of some excellence, who destroyed his works almost as soon as he had finished them. D. 1650.

ADRIANOPLE, ad-re-an-o'-pel, the second city of European Turkey, standing on the Maritza, at a distance of 135 miles from Constantinople. It is now about five miles in circumference, surrounded by old walls, and defended by a citadel. Its streets are narrow and irregular, but adorned with fountains and mosques, of which there are about 40. It was taken by the Turks from the Greek emperors in 1362, and made the seat of their empire, which it continued for a great many years. Manf. Silk, woollen, and cotton stuffs. Rose-water and other perfumes are made, and there are both dyeing and tanning establishments. Exp. Wool, opium, leather, wax, &c. Pop. 100,000, of whom about 30,000 are Greeks. Lat. 41° 41′ N. Lon. 26° 35′ E. —The bazar and the mosque of Selim are here the objects of greatest attraction. The former is a brick building of about 300 paces in length, and offers for sale all the rich commodities of the East: the latter is built like a theatre, from the ruins of Famagusta, in Cyprus. Its principal balcony has an ascent of 377 steps. In the adjacent plain, Constantine the Great defeated Licinius in 323, and in 378 the Goths overpowered Valens. In 1360 the sultan Moorad I. took the city, when it became the capital of the empire, and the favourite residence of the sultans till the 18th century. On the 20th August, 1829, it was taken by the Russian general Diebitsch, which led to the treaty of peace concluded at Adrianople on the following 14th September. The stipulations of this treaty restored to the Porte those parts of Bulgaria and Roumelia which the Russians had conquered, besides Moldavia and Wallachia; it also fixed the Pruth and the right bank of the Danube, from the mouth of the former river, to be the boundary-line between Turkey in Europe and Russia. The limits of the Asiatic territories of the two states were also exactly defined. Sums of indemnification for the expenses of the war were assigned to Russia, and the liberty of trading to all parts of the Turkish dominions conceded, besides the trading navigation of the Danube, the Mediterranean, and the Black Sea. The free passage of the Dardanelles was likewise guaranteed. The political independence of Greece was to be recognized by the Porte, as well as that of Moldavia, Wallachia, and Servia, acknowledged.

ADRIATIC SEA, or Gulf of Venice, ai dre-ăt'-ik, that portion of the Mediterranean Sea which lies between the coasts of Italy, Illyria, and Albania. Its length from Cape Leuca to Trieste is 450 miles, and its mean breadth is 90 miles. The Po and the Adige are the only rivers of importance it receives, and its greatest depth is not more than 22 fathoms, whilst a great part of it is not 12 fathoms. Its navigation is generally safe in summer, but in winter the violence of the winds from the south-east causes much destruction to shipping. On the Venetian side, the shores are low, but on the Dalmatian, the waves, in stormy weather, lash the rocks which girdle the coast to a great height. It runs from the south-east, at Lat. 40° 15′, to north-west, at Lat. 45° 15′.—The Adriatic takes its name from the city of Adria: its waters are saltier than those of the ocean.

ADRICHOMIA, Cornelia, ad-re-ko'-me-a, a Dutch nun of a noble family, who wrote a poetical version of the Psalms in the sixteenth century.

ADRICHOMIUS, Christian, ăd-re-ko'-me-us, a Dutch author, who wrote a description of the Holy Land, and a chronicle of the Old and New Testaments, published in 1593. B. at Delft, 1533; D. at Cologne, 1585.

ADRO, a'-dro, a town of Austrian Italy, 10 miles from Brescia. Pop. 2,300.

ADRY, J. F., a'-dre, a professor of rhetoric in France, and a voluminous author. B. 1713; D. 1818.—Among his works we may notice his "Life of the Duchess of Schomberg;" a "Biography of Malebranche," and a "History of Vittoria Accaramboni."

ADSON, ad'-son, abbot of Luxeuil, who was the author of a book on the Miracles of St. Wandalbert, and of another concerning Antichrist.—Lived in the 10th century.

ADULE, ăd'-ool, the modern Zulla, zool-la, situate in Annesley Bay, on the west coast of the Red Sea. Lat. 15° 40′ N.

ADUMPOOR, ad'-um-poor, an Indian town in the British district of Azimgurh. Lat. 16° N. Lon. 80° 20′ E.

ADVENTURE BAY, ăd-vent'-yur, near the southern extremity of Tasmania. Lat. 43° S. Lon. 147° E.

ADVENTURE BAY, on the east coast of Brewer Island, in the Pacific Ocean, so called from the ship in which Captain Furneaux, its discoverer, sailed. Captain Cook found the people to be mild and cheerful, with little of that wild appearance which savages in general have. They were, however, almost totally devoid of activity or genius, and were nearly on a level with the wretched natives of Terra del Fuego. Lat. 43° 21′ S. Lon. 147° 29′ W.

ÆA, e-a, a huntress, changed by the gods into an island of the same name, to rescue her from the pursuit of her lover, the river Phasis. On the island was a town called Æa, which was the capital of Colchis.

ÆACUS, e'-a-kus, son of Jupiter, by Ægina, and king of the island of Œnopia. A pestilence having destroyed all his subjects, he entreated Jupiter to repeople his kingdom; and, according to his desire, all the ants which were in an old oak were changed into men, and called by Æacus myrmidons, from mœmex, an ant. Æacus married Endeis, by whom he had Telemon and Peleus. He was a man of such integrity that the ancients have made him one of the judges of hell, with Minos and Rhadamanthus.

ÆATUS, e'-a-tus, son of Philip and brother of Polyclea, was descended from Hercules. An oracle having announced, that whoever of the two first touched the land after crossing the Achelous should obtain the kingdom, Polyclea pretended to be lame, and prevailed upon her brother to carry her across on his shoulders. When they came near the opposite side, Polyclea leaped ashore from her brother's back, exclaiming that the kingdom was her own. Æatus joined her in her exclamation, and afterwards married her, and reigned conjointly with her. Their son, Thessalus, gave his name to Thessaly.

Æchmacoras, ek-ma-k'o-ras, a son of Hercules, by Phyllone, daughter of Amphimedon. When the father heard that his daughter had had a child, he exposed her and the infant in the woods to wild beasts, where Hercules, conducted by the noise of a magpie, which imitated the cries of a child, found and delivered them.

Ædesius, e-dé'-se-us, a Platonic philosopher, who succeeded Iamblichus as teacher of philosophy at Cappadocia. He proceeded to hold communion with the deities. Flourished in the 4th century.

Ædessa, or Edessa, e-des'-sa, a town of Macedonia, near Pella. Caranus, king of Macedonia, took it by following goats that sought shelter from the rain, and called it from that circumstance (aigas, capras) Ægeas. It was the burying-place of the Macedonian kings; and an oracle had said, that as long as the kings were buried there, so long would their kingdom exist. Alexander was buried in a different place; and on that account some authors have said that the kingdom became extinct.

Æeta, or Aetes, e-é'-ta, king of Colchis, son of Sol and Perseis, daughter of Oceanus, was father of Medea, Absyrtus, and Chalciope, by Idyia, one of the Oceanides. He killed Phryxus, son of Athamas, who had fled to his court on a golden ram. He was induced to perpetrate this crime in order to obtain the fleece of the golden ram. The Argonauts came against Colchis, and recovered the golden fleece by means of Medea, though it was guarded by bulls that breathed fire, and by a venomous dragon. This expedition has been celebrated by all the ancient poets.

Ægades, é'-ga-dees, or Aegates, three small rocky islands to the west of Sicily, near Marsella: their names are Levanzo, Favagnana, and Maretima.

Ægæ, é'-jee', a town near Eubœa, from which the Ægæan Sea is said to take its name.

Æglon, e-jé'-on, the son of Pelus, or of Pontus and Terra, the same as Nereus. It is supposed that he was a notorious pirate, chiefly residing at Ægæ, whence his name; and that the fable about his hundred hands arises from his having one hundred men to manage his oars in his piratical excursions.

Æglus, e-jé'-us, a surname of Neptune, from Ægæ, in Eubœa.—A river of Corcyra.—A plain in Phocis.

Ægaleos, e-ga'-le-os, or Aegaleum, a mountain of Attica, from which Xerxes beheld the battle of Salamis. It was situated to the left of the road from Athens to Eleusis. Its present name is Saranango.

Ægean Sea, e-jé'-an, now the Archipelago, a part of the Mediterranean which divides Greece from Asia Minor. It is full of islands, some of which are called Cyclades, others Sporades, &c. Some refer the origin of its name to Ægeus, but others, with more probability, derive it from the town of Ægæ, in the neighbourhood of Eubœa. The Ægean Sea was accounted particularly stormy and dangerous to mariners.

Ægeates, John, e-je'-a-tes, a Nestorian monk, who wrote an ecclesiastical history, and a treatise against the council of Chalcedon. Flourished in the 5th century.

Ægeus, e-jé'-us, king of Athens, son of Pandion, being desirous of having children, went to consult the oracle, and in his return, stopped at the court of Pittheus, king of Troezene, who gave him his daughter Æthra in marriage. He left her pregnant, and told her if she had a son to send him to Athens, as soon as he could lift a stone under which he had concealed his sword. By this sword he was to be known to Ægeus, who did not wish to make any public discovery of a son, for fear of his nephews, the Pallantides, who expected his crown. Æthra became mother of Theseus, whom she accordingly sent to Athens with his father's sword. At that time Ægeus lived with Medea, the divorced wife of Jason. When Theseus came to Athens, Medea attempted to poison him; but he escaped, and upon showing Ægeus the sword he wore, discovered himself to be his son. The Ægean Sea is supposed by some to be called after him. Theseus had agreed with Ægeus, when he should return from Crete, that he should hoist white sails, as a signal of his having subdued the Minotaur; forgetting to do so, his disconsolate father, at the sight of the black sails, threw himself into this sea. Ægeus reigned forty-eight years, and died B.C. 1235.

Ægiale, e-ji'-a-le, one of Phaeton's sisters, who were themselves changed into poplars, and their tears into amber. They are called Heliades.

Ægialeus, e-ji-a'-le-us, son of Adrastus, by Amphitea, was one of the Epigoni, or sons of the seven generals who were killed in the first Theban war. They went against the Thebans, who had refused to give burial to their fathers, and were victorious. They all returned home safe except Ægialeus, who was killed. This expedition is called the War of the Epigoni.

Ægidius, Petrus Albiensis, e-jid'-e-us, an Asiatic and African traveller, who wrote a description of Thrace, Constantinople, and other works. D. 1555.

Ægidius Atheniensis, a Greek ecclesiastic and physician, who wrote several books, the chief of which are, "De Pulsibus et de Venenis." Flourished in the 8th century.

Ægidius de Columna, a general of the Augustines, who taught divinity at Paris with great reputation, but whose works have long since sunk into oblivion. One of his books, however, as an early specimen of typography, is still sought for. D. 1316.

Ægilia, e-jil'-e-a, a small island in Eubœa, where the Persian fleet, under Datis and Artaphernes, was moored before the battle of Marathon. It is now called Stouri.—Another in the channel which separates Cythera from Crete.

Ægina, e-ji'-na, daughter of Asopus, had Æacus by Jupiter changed into a flame of fire. She afterwards married Actor, son of Myrmidon, by whom she had some children, who conspired against their father. Some say that she was changed by Jupiter into the island which bears her name.

Ægina, an island in that part of the Ægean Sea which formed the Saronic gulf. It was also called Œnone, Œnopia, and Myrmidonia, and was reckoned about 22½ miles in circumference. This island furnished eighteen ships to the battle of Artemisium; thirty to that of Salamis; and 500 men to the battle of Platæa. The modern name of the island is Engia. On the conical hill called Mount Oras, are still to be seen some remains of the temple of Jupiter Panhellenius. Pop. 4,000. Lat. 37° 43′ N. Lon. 23° 27′ E.

Ægineta, Paulus, e-ji-ne'-ta, a native of the island Ægina, who first noticed the cathartic quality of rhubarb. Lived in the 7th century. His works were published at Paris in 1532, folio.

Æginhard, e'-jin-hard, the secretary of Charlemagne, beloved by Emma, the daughter of that monarch, whom he carried through the snow from his chamber, to prevent her being traced by her footsteps. Being seen by her father, however, Charlemagne consented to their union. Æginhard was a German, and wrote the life of Charlemagne, also a book of annals from 741 to 809. The first edition is that at Paris, in 1576, 2 vols. folio.

Ægiocus, e-ji'-o-kus, a surname of Jupiter, from his using the skin of the goat Amalthæa instead of a shield, in the war of the Titans.

Ægipan, e-ji'-pan, a name of Pan, because he had the feet of a goat.

Ægis, é'-jis, the shield of Jupiter, apo tes aigos, goat's skin. This was the goat Amalthæa, with whose skin he covered his shield. The goat was placed among the constellations. Jupiter gave this shield to Pallas, who placed upon it Medusa's head, which turned into stones all those who fixed their eyes upon it.

Ægisthus, e-jis'-thus, king of Argos, was son of Thyestes by his daughter Pelopea. Being left guardian of Agamemnon's kingdoms, and of his wife Clytemnestra, he fell in love with her and lived with her. They were both put to death afterwards, by Orestes, after a reign of seven years from the murder of his father Agamemnon.

Ægle, é'-gle, a nymph, daughter of Sol and Neæra.—One of the Hesperides.—One of the Graces.

Ægles, é'-glees, a Samian wrestler, born dumb. Seeing some unfair measures practised in a contest, he broke the string which held his tongue, through the desire of speaking, and always afterwards spoke with ease.

Ægletes, e-glee'-tees, a surname of Apollo.

Ægoceros, e-gos'-e-ros, or Capricornus, an animal into which Pan transformed himself when flying before Typhon, in the war with the giants. Jupiter made him a constellation.

ÆGOSPOTAMOS, e-gos-pot'-ă-mos, i.e. the goat's river, a town in the Thracian Chersonesus, with a river, where the Athenian fleet, consisting of 180 ships, was defeated by Lysander, on the 13th December, B.C. 405, in the last year of the Peloponnesian war.

ÆGYPANES, e-ji-pai'-neez, a people in the middle of Africa, whose bodies were said to be human above the waist, and like that of a goat below.

ÆGYPTUS, e-jip'-tus son of Belus, and brother to Danaus, gave his fifty sons in marriage to the fifty daughters of his brother. Danaus, who had established himself at Argos, and was jealous of his brother, obliged all his daughters to murder their husbands the first night of their nuptials. This was executed, with the exception that Hypermnestra alone spared her husband, Lynceus. Even Ægyptus was killed by his niece Polyxena. Ægyptus was king, after his father, of a part of Africa, which from him has been called Ægyptus.

ÆLFRIC, el'-frik, a distinguished Saxon prelate, supposed to have been the son of an earl of Kent. He entered the monastery of Abingdon as a Benedictine, and subsequently became one of the priests of the cathedral of Winchester. He was afterwards removed to Cerne Abbey, and next was created abbot of St. Albans, and then bishop of Wilton. In 994 he was made archbishop of Canterbury, over which see he presided till his death. D. 1005.—This churchman possessed great ability, which he employed in the diffusion of such knowledge as the age in which he lived enabled him to possess. His principal productions are, a Saxon translation of the greater number of the historical books of the Old Testament; a Latin and Saxon Glossary; a Saxon Grammar in Latin, and two volumes of Homilies, translated from the Latin fathers.

ÆLIA CAPITOLINA, e'-le-a, a name given to Jerusalem in the time of the emperor Adrian.

ÆLIAN, Claudius, e'-le-an, an Italian historian and rhetorician, who, though he never left his native country, became so perfect in the Greek language as to write it with the greatest purity. In the reign of Antoninus he taught rhetoric at Rome, and wrote a "Various History," which consists of a curious collection of anecdotes. He also wrote a valuable "History of Animals." B. about A.D. 80.—His works were collected and published by Gesner, at Zurich, in 1556.

ÆLIANUS, Meccius, e'-le-a'-nus, a physician, of whom Galen speaks with great praise. He was the first who found the use of treacle to be a preventative against the plague.

ÆLIUS, e'-le-us. There were several Romans of this name, the most remarkable of whom is Q. Æl. Pætus, son of Sextus, or Publius. As he sat in the senate-house, a woodpecker perched on his head: upon which a soothsayer exclaimed, that if he preserved the bird, his house would flourish, and Rome decay; and if he killed it, the contrary must happen. Hearing this, Ælius, in the presence of the senate, bit off the head of the bird. All the youths of his family were killed at Cannæ, and the Roman arms were soon attended with success.

ÆLIUS, Sextus Catus, censor with M. Cethegus. He separated the senators from the people in the public spectacles. During his consulship, the ambassadors of the Ætolians found him feasting off earthen dishes, and offered him silver vessels, which he refused, satisfied with the others, which for his virtues he had received from his father-in-law, L. Paulus, after the conquest of Macedonia.

AELLO, ai'-el-o, one of the Harpies.

ÆLST, Everhard Van, elst, a Dutch painter, famous for his dead-game and fruit pieces. B. at Delft, 1602; D. 1658.—He had a nephew William, also distinguished as an artist. D. 1679.

AELTERRE, al'-tair, a village in Belgium, 12 miles from Ghent. Pop. with commune, 6,000.

ÆLURUS, e-lu'-rus, a cat, a deity worshipped by the Egyptians, and after death embalmed, and buried in the city of Bubastis.

ÆMILIANI, Jerom, e-mil'-e-a'-ne, a Venetian of a noble family, and one of the founders of the regular clerks of St. Maieul, in the 16th century.

ÆMILIANUS, C. Julius, e-mil'-e-ai'-nus, a Moor, who, from the lowest station, rose to be emperor of Rome. He reigned only four months, when he was killed, in his 46th year, by his own soldiers, who then offered the crown to Valerian.

ÆMILIUS, Paulus, e-mil'-e-us, a Roman general, who was of noble family, and passed through several civil offices with reputation, until he obtained a military command, in which he acquired great glory. At the age of 46 he held the office of consul; and at 60 accepted the command of the armies against Perses, king of Macedon, whom he made prisoner, leading him and the king of Illyria, his ally, in triumph through Italy. On his arrival at Rome, he obtained a magnificent triumph, in which Perses and his family, as captives, led the procession. He afterwards served the office of censor. B. 223 B.C.; D. universally regretted, 161.

ÆMILIUS, Paulus, a canon in the cathedral of Paris, who was employed thirty years in writing the history of the kings of France, which he did not live to finish. It was, however, continued by Arnold Feron, and published in 1576. B. at Verona; D. at Paris, 1529.

ÆNEAS, e-ne'-as, a Trojan prince, son of Anchises and the goddess Venus. The care of his infancy was intrusted to a nymph; but at the age of five he was recalled to Troy, and placed under the inspection of Alcathous, the friend and companion of his father. He afterwards improved himself in Thessaly, under Chiron, whose house was frequented by all the young princes and heroes of the age. Soon after his return home, he married Creusa, Priam's daughter, by whom he had a son, called Ascanius. During the Trojan war he behaved with great valour in defence of his country, and encountered Diomedes and Achilles. Yet he is accused, with Antenor, of betraying his country to the Greeks, and of preserving his life and fortune by this treacherous measure. He lived at variance with Priam, on account of not receiving sufficient marks of distinction from the king and his family, a circumstance which might have provoked him to seek revenge by perfidy. When Troy was in flames, he carried away upon his shoulders his father Anchises and the statues of his household gods, leading in his hand his son Ascanius, and leaving his wife to follow behind. Some say that he retired to Mount Ida, where he built a fleet of twenty ships, and set sail in quest of a settlement. Strabo, on the contrary, says that Æneas never left his country, but rebuilt Troy, where he reigned, and his posterity after him. Even Homer, who lived four hundred years after the Trojan war, says that the gods destined Æneas and his posterity to reign over the Trojans. According to Virgil and other Latin authors, he was sailing from Sicily to Italy, when he landed in Epirus, and was driven on the coasts of Africa, and received by Dido, queen of Carthage, to whom, on his first interview, he gave one of the garments of the beautiful Helen. Dido being enamoured of him, wished to marry him; but he left Carthage by order of the gods. In his voyage he passed to Cumæ, where the Sybil conducted him to hell, that he might hear from his father the fate which awaited him and all his posterity. After a voyage of seven years, and the loss of thirteen ships, he arrived in the Tiber. Latinus, the king of the country, received him with hospitality, and promised him his daughter Lavinia, who had been before betrothed to King Turnus by her mother Amata. To prevent this marriage, Turnus made war against Æneas; and after many battles, it was terminated by a combat between the two rivals, in which Turnus was killed. Æneas married Lavinia, in whose honour he built the town of Lavinium, and succeeded his father-in-law. His reign was but of short duration, various accounts being given of the cause of his death.—Æneas has been praised for his piety and submission to the will of the gods. The story of the loves of Dido and Æneas is allowed to be a mere poetical ornament, introduced by a violent anachronism.

ÆNEAS, Gazeus, a disciple of the doctrines of Plato, who, becoming a convert to Christianity, wrote a dialogue on the immortality of the soul and the resurrection of the body. Flourished in the 5th century.—His dialogue was printed in Greek and Latin, at Basil, 1560, and at Leipsic in 1655.

ÆNEAS OF ÆNGUS, an Irish bishop, who composed the history of the Old Testament in verse, and compiled, in five books, a history of Irish saints. D. 829.

ÆNEAS, Tacticus, a Greek author, who wrote on the art of war. Flourished about 336 B.C.—His work was prefixed by Casaubon to his edition of Polybius, Paris, 1609, and reprinted at Leyden in 1633.

AENG, ang, a village of British India, province of Bengal. Near it is the best pass into the Burmese dominions. Pop. 800. Lat. 19° 50′ N. Lon. 94° 9′ E.

ÆNOBARBUS, or HAHENOBARBUS, e-no-bar'-bus, the surname of Domitius. When Castor and Pollux acquainted him with a victory, he discredited the intelligence; upon which they touched his chin and beard, which instantly became of a brazen colour; whence the surname given to himself and his descendants.

ÆOLUS, e'-o-lus, the king of storms and winds, was the son of Hippotas. He reigned over Æolia; and because he was the inventor of sails, and a great astronomer, the poets have called him the god of the wind. According to Virgil, Æolus was indebted to Juno for his royal dignity. The name seems to be derived from aiolos, 'various,' because the winds over which he presided are ever varying.

ÆPINUS, John, e-pi'-nus, a Franciscan friar, a fellow-labourer with Luther and Melancthon in the great cause of the Reformation. He became a convert to Lutheranism, and pastor of St. Peter's church, Hamburg. B. 1499; D. 1553.

ÆPINUS, Francis Maria Ulric Theodore, a distinguished electrician, who was the first to see the affinity between magnetism and electricity in its full extent, and to perceive how these may illustrate each other. He is also the inventor of the condenser of electricity and of the electropus. He published several memoirs relating to philosophical subjects, and seems to have devoted a considerable portion of his time to mechanical pursuits. B. at Rostock, Lower Saxony, 1724; D. at Dorpat, in Livonia, 1802.

AERIUS, ai-e'-re-us, an Asiatic presbyter, who from being a follower of Arius (the founder of Arianism), advocated the notion that there was no distinction between bishops and presbyters, and procured many followers, who were named Aërians. Flourished in Sebastia, Pontus, in the 4th century.

AERÖE or ÆRÖE, a'-e-ro, a Danish island in the duchy of Schleswig, about 14 miles long and 5 broad. It lies 10 miles S. of Fuhnen, and is possessed of a good soil, which is carefully cultivated. Pop. 11,000.

AEROESKJOBING, a'-e-ro'-es-ke-o'-bang, the capital of the above island, where shipbuilding is carried on. Pop. 2,000.

AERSCHOT, ar-shot, a town of Belgium, 23 miles from Brussels. Pop. 4,000.

AERSCHOT, Duke of, a noble of the Netherlands, celebrated in the struggle of the Dutch republic against Philip of Spain. He refused to join the league that was formed against Cardinal Granvelle (archbishop of Mechlin), the governor of the Netherlands. He was governor of Antwerp, and subsequently of Flanders; but the treachery of his disposition made him no favourite with the people, who took him prisoner and confined him at Ghent for a long period. Lived in the middle of the 16th century.

ÆRSENS, Peter, ar-sens, a Dutch painter, surnamed Longo. B. at Amsterdam, 1519; D. 1573.

AERTRYKE, ar-treek, a village and commune of West Flanders, 8 miles from Bruges. Pop. 3,000.

AERZEELE, ar-zeel, a village and commune in West Flanders, 15 miles from Courtrai. Pop. 3,300.

AERZEN, ar-zen, a town of Hanover, where there are powder manufactories, 5 miles from Hameln. Pop. 1,200.

ÆSCHINES, e'-ski-nees, a disciple of Socrates and the son of a sausage-maker. He went to the court of Dionysius, the tyrant of Sicily, and afterwards maintained himself by keeping a school at Athens. His dialogues so closely resemble those of Socrates, that Menedemus charges him with having stolen them from that philosopher. Flourished B.C. 350. Only three of his dialogues are extant; of which Le Clerc published a Latin translation, with notes, in 1711.

ÆSCHINES, usually distinguished as "the Orator," was the cotemporary and rival of Demosthenes. He was first a schoolmaster, then a clerk, then an actor, and finally a political orator. There are only three of his orations extant, which are exquisitely beautiful. B. at Athens, B.C. 393; D. at Samos, 318.—He was considered the founder of the Rhodian school of eloquence, and his style, though wanting in the close sententious severity of the Athenian school, is marked by great correctness and clearness of language.

ÆSCHRION, e'-skre-on, a poet of Mitylene, intimate with Aristotle. He accompanied Alexander in his Asiatic expedition.—Another iambic poet of Samos.

ÆSCHYLUS, e'-ski-lus, the father of the Athenian drama. He was in the sea-fight at Salamis, and received a wound on the plains of Marathon. His most solid fame, however, rests on his powers as a tragic poet. Of ninety tragedies produced by him, forty were rewarded with the public prize, but only seven have come down to us. He was the first to introduce two actors on the stage, and to clothe them with dresses suitable to their character. He likewise removed murder from the sight of the audience. He decorated the theatre with the best paintings of the time, and the ancient, like the modern stage, exhibited temples, sepulchres, armies, fleets, flying cars, and apparitions. He mounted the actors on stilts, and gave them masks to augment the natural sounds of their voices. The priests accused him before the Areopagus of bringing upon the stage the mysteries of religion; but the wounds he had received at Marathon pleaded his cause and obtained his acquittal. B. at Athens, 456 B.C.; D. in Sicily, in his 69th year.—It is fabled that an eagle mistaking his bald head for a stone, as he slept in a field, dropped upon it a tortoise, which instantly killed him. His imagination was strong but wild, vast in its conceptions, but greatly dealing in improbabilities. The obscurity of his style is admitted, and an excellent modern critic has pronounced him the most difficult of all the Greek classics.

ÆSCULAPIUS, e-sku-lai'-pe-us, son of Apollo, by Coronis, or as some say, by Larissa, daughter of Phlegias, was god of medicine. He was taught the art of medicine by Chiron, and became physician to the Argonauts. He restored many to life, of which Pluto complained to Jupiter, who struck Æsculapius with thunder. Æsculapius received divine honours after death, chiefly at Epidaurus, Pergamus, Athens, Smyrna, &c. Goats, bulls, lambs, and pigs, were sacrificed to him, and the cock and the serpent were sacred to him. Æsculapius is represented with a large beard, holding a staff round which a serpent is wreathed. He married Epione, by whom he had two sons, famous for their medicinal skill, and four daughters, of whom Hygeia, the goddess of health, was one. Some have supposed that he lived a short time after the Trojan war.

ÆSOP, e'-sop, the fable writer, is usually held as the inventor of those short pieces of moral wisdom with which the readers of all ages, since his time, have been delighted. He is said to have been first bought as a slave by an Athenian, from whom he learned the Greek language, and then passed successively into the service of Xanthus and Idmon, both of Samos. The latter gave him his freedom, on which he was retained by Crœsus. The places and time of his birth and death are both uncertain. He was contemporary, however, with Solon and Pisistratus; therefore flourished in the 6th century B.C. His fables were first published at Milan, in 1476, folio, which edition now bears an exorbitant price. But the first Greek edition is reckoned that of 1480, 4to.

ÆSOP, the author of a romantic history of Alexander the Great, in Greek, which has been translated into Latin and German. The age in which he lived is unknown.

ÆSOPUS, Clodius, e-so'-pus, a famous actor, who had the honour of instructing Cicero in oratory. He was a great epicure, and at an entertainment is said to have had a dish of singing birds which cost above £800. D. worth £160,000, sixty years B.C.—His son was also noted for his luxuriousness; and Horace says that he swallowed a pearl of great value dissolved in vinegar.

ÆSTUARY, e-stu'-a-re, a term used in geography to signify a wide opening at the mouth of a river.

ÆTHERIUS, e-the'-re-us, an architect of Constantinople, who is supposed to have built the wall which runs from the sea to Selimbria, to keep out the Bulgarians and Scythians. Lived in the 6th century.

ÆTION, e'-she-on, a Greek painter, whose picture of the nuptials of Alexander and Roxana, shown at the Olympic games, obtained for him the daughter of the president in marriage, although he was quite unknown.

Aetius, a-ē'-she-us, a famous general in the reign of Valentinian III., emperor of the West. He was brought up in the emperor's guards, and after the battle of Pollentia, in 403, was delivered as a hostage to Alaric, and next to the Huns. On the death of Honorius, he took the side of the usurper John, for whose service he engaged an army of Huns. He was afterwards taken into favour by Valentinian, who gave him the title of count. Being jealous of the power of Boniface, governor of Africa, he secretly advised his recall, and at the same time counselled the governor not to obey the mandate. This produced a revolt, which caused an irruption of the Vandals into that province. The treachery of Aëtius being discovered, a war ensued between him and Boniface, in which the latter was slain. Aëtius now appealed to the Huns, of whom he raised a large army, and returning, so greatly alarmed Placidia, the mother of Valentinian, that she put herself into his power. He defended the declining empire with great bravery, and compelled Attila to retire beyond the Rhine. Stabbed, 454, by Valentinian.—This crime was committed under the conviction that Aëtius entertained a design upon the throne of the emperor.

Aetius, a bishop of Antioch, who, before entering into orders, was a physician, and remarkable for a contentious and sceptical spirit. He contended for a dissimilarity between the Father and the Son, for which he was banished by Constantius, but recalled by Julian. Lived in the 4th century.

Aetius, a physician of Mesopotamia, who wrote on the diseases of women, and other works, which are extant in Greek. He is supposed to have been a Christian. Flourished in the 6th century.

Ætolia, e-tō'-lia, a province of Greece, bounded on the west by Acarnania, on the north by Thessaly, on the east by the country of the Locri and Ozolæ, and on the south by the Corinthian gulf. It received its name from Ætolus. The inhabitants were covetous and illiberal, and were little known in Greece, till after the ruin of Athens and Sparta, when they assumed a consequence in the country, and afterwards made themselves formidable as the allies of Rome, and then as its enemies, till they were conquered by Fulvius. It is very mountainous; but rye, barley, and olives are cultivated along the side of the Corinthian gulf. With Acarnania, it now forms a division in the kingdom of Greece. Its principal river is the Phidaris. In this province is also Mount Oxea, which reaches an elevation of 4,636 feet in its highest point. Missolonghi is its capital. Lat. between 38° 7′ and 38° 50′ N. Lon. between 21° 10′ and 22° 5′ E.

Afer, Domitius, aï'-fer, an ancient orator, who obtained the prætorship of Rome; but being disappointed of further promotion, he became an informer against Claudia Pulchra, cousin of Agrippa, and by his abilities succeeded in gaining the favour of Tiberius. He wrote an inscription, which he affixed to a statue of Caligula, and which embodied the remark that he had been a second time consul at the age of twenty-two. This was meant for an encomium, but the emperor took it as a sarcasm, and made a violent speech in the senate against the author. Afer, instead of replying, supplicated pardon, saying that he feared less the power of the emperor than his eloquence, which flattery so pleased Caligula, that he raised him to the consular dignity. B. at Nismes; D. at Rome, A.D. 59.—Quintilian mentions two books of his, composed on witnesses.

Affletto, Mathew, iff-fle-to, a distinguished lawyer of Italy. B. at Naples; D. 1673.—He wrote several works on Neapolitan law.

Affo, Irenæus, af-fo, an Italian historical author. B. in the duchy of Placentia. D. about the end of the 18th century.—He is best known by his History of Parma, which, although composed in a very indifferent style, has value on account of its general truthfulness.

Affre, Denis Auguste, affr, a French student at the seminary of St. Sulpice, who rose to be archbishop of Paris. B. at St. Remy, 1793; D. 1848.—Affre fell whilst endeavouring to prevent bloodshed between the soldiery and Parisian insurgents. Although previously warned by General Cavaignac of the danger to be apprehended from appearing amongst an excited mob, he replied, that "his life was of small consequence," and, preceded by a man in a workman's dress, with a green branch, as an emblem of peace, in his hand, he went forth to stay the fury of the combatants. Some of the crowd who beheld him thought they were betrayed, and he was soon shot down. When he fell, he was surrounded by many of the insurgents, who blamed the Garde Mobile for the act, and on whom they vowed to avenge him. He, however, exclaimed, "No, no, my friends, blood enough has been shed; let mine be the last on this occasion." He was buried on the 7th July, 1848, universally regretted by the people.

Affrique, St., af-freek, a town of France, 29 miles from Rhodez, which trades in Roquefort cheese. Pop. with commune, 7,000.

Affry, Count d', Louis Augustine Philip, af-fre, a statesman of Switzerland, who rose to the chief magistracy of his country, after Napoleon I. became protector of the Helvetic confederacy. He was a true patriot, and did all that he could to resist the power of the French; but finding his efforts unavailing, he embraced the views of Napoleon, and gave his assistance in forming a new government in accordance with the theories of that conqueror. B. at Friburg, 1743; D. 1810.

Afghanistan, ăf-gan'-is-tăn, or ăf-ga-nis'-tan, a country of Asia, stretching from the mountains of Tartary to the Arabian sea, and from the Indus to the confines of Persia. On the east it is bounded by the Punjab; on the south by Scinde, Beloochistan, and Bwhalpoor; on the north by independent Turkestan; and on the west by Persia. Area, estimated at 225,000 square miles. Desc. By far the greater part of this vast region is mountainous. To the west of the Soliman mountains, which may be regarded as its eastern barrier, it assumes the character of an extensive tableland, considerably elevated above the neighbouring countries. The Hindoo Coosh mountains, which form its northern bulwark, are a continuation of the great Himalaya chain, of which they are the rivals in height, massiveness, and grandeur. Some of their peaks attain to an elevation of 20,493 feet. The inferior mountain-ranges diminish in proportion to their distance from the principal chain, and, bosomed amongst them, are to be found some of the most fertile and beautiful valleys in the world. In these, vegetation is of the same kind as that of India generally; consisting of cotton, rice, millet, maize, turmeric, and sugar-cane. In the higher lands, the various species of the fruits, herbs, and woods of Europe grow wild, and wheat, barley, beans, turnips, and several artificial grasses, are cultivated with success. Rivers. The principal are the Cabul, Koorum, Helmund, Krshrood, Gomal, and Lora, all partaking, more or less, of the character of mountain torrents,—now swelling and rushing rapidly, or becoming all but stagnant in some parts, in accordance with the changes of the seasons. Climate. According to its latitude, it should be decidedly hot, but, on account of the inequality and height of its surface, the climate varies. Inhabitants. A robust hardy race, of Circassian origin, generally addicted to predatory warfare, and evincing a decided contempt for the occupations of civil life. Their common dress consists of a shirt, which falls over the upper part of dark loose cotton trousers, a woollen vest, fitted closely to the body, and reaching to the midleg, and a low, and in some parts a high, cap, of broad-cloth or cotton, usually of one colour, and of a conic form, with two small parallel slits in the upper edge of its facing. Their language is called Pushtoo, half of the words of which are Persian, but the particles and verbs, for the greater part, are of unknown root. Gov. A limited monarchy, before the death of Shah Soojah, but since then the country has been divided into three independent states, Cabul, Candahar, and Herat, each governed by its own chief. Towns. The principal are Candahar, Herat, Peshawur, Jellalabad, Guznee, and Cabul. Manf. Woollen stuffs, carpets, silk, felt, sword-blades, fire-arms, and jewellery. Commerce.—By caravans; camels in the plains; asses and mules in the mountains. Exp. From Peshawur, iron, assafœtida, madder, tobacco, furs, horses, ponies (to Punjab), and fresh and dried fruits; from Candahar and Herat, raw silk, an intoxicating drug called churus, gum, dried fruits, copper and brass vessels, tinsel thread, saffron, antimony, cochineal, and other dyeing materials from Cabul, white cloth of every description, shawls, turbans, Mooltanee chintzes, spices, and indigo. Imp. From the Punjab, silk, cloth, muslins, cottons, ivory, brocade, bamboos, sandal-wood, linen, wax, coral, sugar, musk, and drugs; by the Gomal pass and Dera Ismael Khan, chintzes, golden cloth, calicoes, salt, and gun-locks; from Shikarpoor, metals of all kinds, manufactured silks and cottons, senna, groceries, spices, opium, horse-cloths, dried grains (to these may be added British manufactured cottons of almost every description); from Bokhara to Cabul, gold and siver coins and bars, horses, and some Russian articles in cutlery, cast-iron pots, beads, spectacles, and leather; a kind of fine lamb's wool cloth is also imported from Bokhara, with some lamb-skins. Rel. Mahometanism. Pop. perhaps about 10,000,000. Lat. between 28° and 36° N. Lon. between 62° and 73° E. —The Afghans call themselves Pooshanneh, and trace their origin to the son of Saul, king of Israel; but however remote their descent, they seem to have, at all times, discovered a strong predilection for war. About the year 1720, an army of Afghans invaded Persia, took Ispahan, and made the sultan, Husseyn, prisoner. They kept possession of Ispahan and the southern provinces for ten years, when they were defeated in several battles, and driven out of the country by Nadir Kuli, commonly known in Europe by the name of Kuli Khan. After Nadir had deposed his sovereign, Shah Thamas, he laid siege to, and took, Candahar; but afterwards enlisted in his army a considerable body of the Afghans, who became his favourite foreign troops. On his assassination, in 1747, the general of the Afghans, though furiously attacked by the whole Persian army, effected a safe retreat into his own country, where he caused himself to be acknowledged sovereign of the Afghan territories by the title of Ahmed Shah. He was succeeded in 1772 by his son Timour Shah, an indolent sovereign, who, dying in 1793, bequeathed his kingdom to his two sons, Homayon and Zemaun Shah. These did not long agree, and war breaking out between them, the former was defeated, and the whole country fell under the power of Zemaun. In 1800 he was deposed, and cruelly deprived of his sight, by his brother Mahmood, who again was expelled, in 1803, by his brother Shoojah, who, in his turn, was dethroned in 1809 by Mahmood, but had a pension assigned him. Shoojah again, however, endeavoured to recover his kingdom, but was unsuccessful in the attempt, and in 1837 Dost Mahomed Khan was reigning, when an expedition was prepared in British India, for the purpose of restoring Shoojah to his throne. The force sent to effect this object consisted of about 28,000 men; these men to be assisted by about 20,000 Sikhs, who were to assemble at Peshawur. Treachery, however, proved the ruin of the expedition,—it signally failed; but the heroic conduct of Sir Robert Sale and his lady, and General Nott, raised the character of the British name. Subsequently, however, the Afghan war was closed by the success of the British arms. The fortifications of the Bala Hissar at Cabul were laid in ruins, and in the middle of December, 1842, the British army arrived in Ferozepoor. After they had evacuated the country, Dost Mahomed returned to Cabul, and again assumed the sovereignty of the kingdom. From that period until November, 1856, the political history of Afghanistan, in a great measure, loses its interest. Then, however, war was formally declared at Calcutta, against the Shah of Persia, who had successfully invaded Afghanistan, and laid siege to Herat. This seemed only the prelude to further encroachments, and ultimately, perhaps, to an absolute invasion of our Indian possessions through the mountain-passes of Afghanistan, stimulated and assisted by the gold and physical strength of Russia. Dost Mahomed became alarmed; the independence of his country seemed to be in danger, and, assisted by the British, he determined to repel Persia on the east, whilst, through the Persian Gulf, the British should attack her on the west. A severe contest seemed on the eve of commencement, when the taking of Bushire by the British led to a short armistice, which resulted in a treaty of peace, in February, 1857. (See AFREEDIS.)

AFIOM KARA HISSAR, a'-fe-om ka'-ra his'-sar, takes its name from afiom, which signifies the opium poppy, and kara hissar, 'the black castle,' round which it is built, on the southern side of a fertile plain, about 200 miles east of Smyrna. Manf. Fire-arms, sabres, and tapestry; but the principal articles of trade are opium and madder, which are raised in the neighbourhood. Pop. about 50,000. Lat. 30° N. Lon. 38° E.

AFRAGOLA, a'-fra-go'-là, a Neapolitan town, where straw bonnets are largely made. It is six miles from Naples. Pop. 14,500.

AFRANIA, a-fra'-ne-a, the inventor of the bassoon. He flourished at Ferrara in the 16th century.

AFRANIUS, a-fra'-ne-us, a comic poet, who wrote some Latin comedies, of which only a few fragments remain.—Flourished about 100 years B.C.

AFRANIUS, a senator of Rome, who was put to death by Nero for having written a satire against him.

AFREEDIS, a'-ree'-des, a clan of Afghans, who inhabit the Kyber hills, on the frontiers of the Punjab and Cabul. Like the Scottish Highlanders of the last century, they command the passes of their hills, and their maliks or chiefs hold themselves entitled to levy a toll on those who would pass with safety through their country. They are a warlike, determined race of clansmen. The Kyber pass is memorable in the annals of the last Afghan war, for the vain attempt made in February, 1842, to force it by Colonel Wild, to relieve General Sale in Jellalabad; also for General Pollock's success in getting through it, to relieve the beleaguered city, in the April following.

AFRICA, ăf'-re-ka, one of the great divisions of the earth, and the Libya of the ancients. It is bounded on the north by the Mediterranean Sea, on the south by the Southern Ocean, on the west by the Atlantic Ocean, and on the east by the Isthmus of Suez, the Red Sea, and the Indian Ocean. This vast peninsula is joined to Asia only by the Isthmus of Suez, which is about 75 miles across. Ext. The greatest length of Africa, from Ras-el-Krun, its most northern point, near Bizerta, on the Mediterranean, to Cape Agulhas, or Needles, its most southern, is about 5,000 miles; and from its most western point, Cape Verde, to its most eastern, Cape Guardafui, about 4,600 miles in a direct line. Area, 12,000,000 square miles. Coast. The coast of Africa may be regarded as an almost unbroken line of 16,000 miles, for it has no inland opening of any great size. On this account it is less advantageously adapted for commerce than any of the other great divisions of the globe. Capes. On the north are Bon and Serra; on the west, Spartel, Nun, Bojador, Blanco, and Verde, which is the most western point of the continent; on the south, Palmas, Formosa, Lopez, Negro, and Good Hope—the most southern is Agulhas; on the east, Corrientes, Delgado, and Guardafui, which is the most eastern point of the continent. Divisions. So far as our present knowledge extends, the leading divisions of this continent may be considered to consist of,—1st. NORTHERN AFRICA, which comprehends Egypt and the states of Barbary, Barca, Tripoli, Tunis, Algeria, Fezzan, and Morocco. In this division is embraced the great Atlas mountain-system. 2nd. WESTERN AFRICA, which embraces a large extent of coast, including the whole of the country lying between Morocco and Congo. 3rd. SOUTHERN AFRICA, which takes in Cape Colony and all the country north of the Cape of Good Hope as far as the confines of Congo on the west, and those of Mozambique on the east. In this region lie many of the more recent discoveries of Dr. Livingstone. 4th. EASTERN AFRICA, extending northward from the southern boundaries of Mozambique, to Cape Guardafui, and thence along the shores of the Red Sea to the frontiers of Egypt. Abyssinia, though by some made a division of itself, may be embraced in this general arrangement. 5th. CENTRAL AFRICA. This region comprehends those countries through which the Niger takes its course, and embraces the kingdoms of Houssa, Timbuctoo, Mandara, &c. in the middle; on the north Begharmi, Bornou, &c.; and several others on the west. A great portion of this part still remains unexplored. 6th. ISLANDS. Amongst those with which Africa is in some measure surrounded, may be named the Azores, which, however, some assign to Europe; Madeira with Porto Santo; the Canaries and Cape Verde islands; and the solitary rocks Ascension and St. Helena, the spot of the first Napoleon's exile, and lately made a naval depôt for British ships engaged in the suppression of the slave-trade: these are all on the west. On the east is the large island of Madagascar, and the smaller islands of Bourbon and Mauritius, with several groups, as the Comoros, Seychelles, Socotra, Abd-el-kouri, besides the rocky island of Perim, which commands the entrance to the Red Sea, and of which permanent possession has been taken by the British; thereby exciting the jealousy of other nations. Most of the groups of islands in proximity to this continent are volcanic, although there is not a single volcano known to be on the mainland. Desc. The northern part of this continent may be regarded as a vast plain, and the southern as an elevated table-land. A great part of it is barren, but where fertility exists, it is abundant. The plain which lies between Barbary and Nigritia is so vast, that the waters which run down from the Atlas, as well as from the central chains of mountains, are unable to penetrate it: hence about 2,500 miles of land in length, and 700 or 800 in breadth, are consigned to irretrievable sterility. Only a few scattered spots, rising like emerald islands amidst the general waste, from being favoured with springs, appear here and there, at wide distances, to relieve the monotonous desolation of this vast ocean of sand, as terrific as it is apparently profitless to every inhabitant of the creation. The soil of which it is composed, consists of small particles of gravel commingled with marine shells, on which crystallizations of salt are incrusted. Besides the Sahara, or Great Desert, other patches similar, but smaller in dimensions, occur in other parts of the continent; and even the most prolific regions are disfigured by large tracts of sand lying among them. It would appear that the desert is extending by degrees. Between Egypt and Tripoli, it has reached the sea, covering districts that were once fertile; whilst many of the Egyptian ruins have been submerged by its shifting and treacherous sands. Mountains. The Atlas, the Abyssinian, the mountains of Kong, the Mountains of the Moon, those of Laputa, the Snow Mountains, with Mount Compass, and the Nieuwveld. The Atlasian, which runs across more than one half the continent, is the only great chain that has been explored. It extends from Cape Bojador to the Gulf of Sidra: its highest elevation is more than 13,000 feet above the level of the sea. The Abyssinian have Lamalmon, which defends the country on the side of the Red Sea; the mountains of Samen, and those of Gojam, among which the Abyssinian Nile has its rise. The Kong mountains, stretching from the meridian of Timbuctoo to Cape Verde. Those of the Moon, by which name they were characterized by the ancients, it is supposed, contain the most remote source of the Egyptian Nile. The Laputas, on the east, are sometimes called the backbone of the world, and the Snow Mountains, with Mount Compass at an elevation of 8,000 feet, lie in the south. The Nieuwveld, which is the Dutch for New Forest, attains an elevation of 10,000 feet, and forms a barrier between the Cape colonists and the independent tribes that stretch into the interior on the north. There are few of the African mountains which reach the snow-

line, the most of them being more remarkable for their breadth than their height. Rivers. The Nile and its tributaries, the Bahr-el-Asrek, the Bahr-el-Abiad, and the Tacasse; the Niger and its tributary the Chaddah; the Senegal, the Gambia, Rio Grande, Zaire or Congo, Garriep or Orange River, and its tributaries, Gy Garriep, Nu Garriep, and Great Fish River; Zambezi, Yeou, and Shary. Notwithstanding the great length of some of these rivers, water is by far more sparingly distributed over Africa than it is over any of the other continents. At stated periods most of the rivers overflow their banks, and saturate the surrounding countries, but many of the smaller streams are lost in their course by evaporation or absorption, or finally empty themselves into some inland lake. The Nile is the longest river of Africa, and the valley through which it runs has an average breadth of 15 miles. Its waters are pleasant; so much so, that the Egyptians say, if Mahomet had tasted them, he would have prayed for immortality, in order to enjoy them for ever. It is to its annual overflow that the great fertility of Egypt is attributable. This rising begins at about midsummer, continues till the autumn equinox, when the subsidation commences, and by Christmas the land may be worked. The Niger is in the upper part of its course the Joliba of the natives, and in the lower, the Quorra. It falls into the Bight of Benin by many mouths: this fact was ascertained by Richard Lander, on the 18th November, 1830. The Gambia is navigable only in the dry season, and the Senegal only in the wet, or rainy season. The velocity of the current of the former prevents its navigation when its waters are swollen by the rains; and rocks, which intercept the course of the latter when it is low, in the dry season, preclude the possibility of vessels ascending it until it is increased by the rains. Lakes. Tchad, Tagaynka, Maraya, and Ngami. This last was discovered by Dr. Livingstone, in 1849. Forests. If we except Soudan, Upper and Lower Guinea, Senegambia, and the great mountain-ranges, the forests of Africa are not extensive. On the northern shores of the Mediterranean, and along a portion of those that are washed by the Atlantic, the vegetation which is characteristic of the south of Europe still prevails. The woods consist of cork-trees, and other kinds of oaks; sea-pines, cypresses, and myrtles, spring up, and groves of olives and oranges bud, blossom, ripen, and wave before the eye of the delighted traveller. In the Atlas chain grows the famous sandarach-tree, which is so durable as to seem almost to last for ever, and which is supposed to be the shittim-wood of the Bible. It supplies the timber of which most of the ceilings of mosques are constructed. Passing into the desert, we enter upon a region in which the resources of nature fail to supply the nourishment necessary to a generous vegetation. Here are to be seen vast tracks covered by the prickly kasheia, which gives great annoyance to travellers, and the agoul, which furnishes the camel with food on its long, perilous, and wearisome journeys across the desert. In tropical Africa, we enter upon the grandest features of vegetation: here flourish the families of palms, whose leaves expand into so many verdant awnings, spread out by the beneficent hand of the Creator, to shade from the excessive heat the ebon native, whose existence has been cast in such a burning climate; and here the gigantic baobob makes a forest in itself. This tree attains a height of not more than sixty or seventy feet, but its branches are as large as the stems of common trees, and extend horizontally in all directions; whilst its trunk assumes the largest girth of all the known trees; one of its kind has measured in circumference 104 feet, and the ages of some of them have been estimated, by counting their concentric rings, to be not less than 5,000 years. Huge cotton-trees encumber the earth; the chandelier-tree adorns the landscape, and flowers of the gayest description wreathe themselves around their stems, hang upon their branches, and entwine themselves with their leaves. As we approach the south, the vegetable world again appears in new forms; heaths and geraniums abound, and the hills and rocks are adorned with the cycadaceæ, a kind of plant which occupies a mediate place between ferns and palms. The plains are clothed with the rush-like restio, and, after the ruins, the whole country blooms with the ixia, and other kindred species. The whiteboom, one of the protean tribe, supplies the inhabitants of Cape Town with fuel, and the American aloe has been introduced, and is reared in hedges, as the hawthorn is in this country. Stone-pines, and the oaks of Europe will recall to the newly-arrived colonist the land he may have recently left, and help earlier than might otherwise have been the case to familiarize his mind with the features of the country into which he has transported himself. Wild animals. Of these there are many and of peculiar species: of Carnivora, the foremost are the lion, the panther, the leopard, the hyena, the civet cat, the jackal, and the ichneumon. The first three are not only extremely numerous, but dangerous. They are to be found lurking in the neighbourhood of springs, lakes, and rivers, where they pounce upon their living prey that emerge from the deep recesses of the forest to bathe and quench their thirst. In many parts the inhabitants are compelled to quit the locality in which they may have pitched their habitation, to escape their ravages. Properly speaking, the whole genus of the hyena class are African: they live mostly upon offal and carrion, which, in the dead of night, they pick up in the towns and villages, the streets of which are abandoned to their possession, in that season, by the inhabitants. The true civet is found spread over the whole of this continent: numbers of the natives cherish it for the sake of its perfume. Of ichneumons, Africa contains several distinct species, which keep up a continual war upon the multitudes of reptiles and serpents that infest the country. There are no bears known to exist in Africa. Rats and mice are abundant. Of the hoofed species of animals, elephants take the foremost place: they are found in large herds in Central and Southern Africa, a herd sometimes numbering as many as 200: they are valuable for their tusks, which weigh from 140 to 180 lb., and which bring destruction upon them for the gratification of human cupidity. The African elephant has long ceased to be the servant of man, although, in the time of the Ptolemies, he was doubtless employed in the Ethiopian wars. The rhinoceros is found in the same localities: his skin is in some places made into shields by the natives; and for harness and traces it is well adapted, by its thickness and durability. The hippopotamus inhabits the lakes and rivers to the south of the Sahara; and the zebra, the quagga, and the deer, are found in most of the known central and southern parts. Antelopes and gazelles abound in the same regions, and often fall a sacrifice to the ferocity of the feline tribes, which watch, from their trackless solitudes, these wandering herds as they browse upon the plains. The giraffe and the cameloperd are found from the banks of the Garriep to the southern confines of the Great Desert, and several species of the buffalo have their habitation in the interior. The wild buffalo of the Cape is distinguished by his formidable horns, which extend over the top of his head, imparting to his appearance a frontal at once magnificent and imposing. Hares and rabbits are plentiful. Of cetaceous mammals inhabiting the African coasts and seas, the lamantin is, perhaps, alone worthy of notice: it is mostly found at the mouths of the great rivers falling into the Indian and Atlantic oceans: it suggested to antiquity the fable of the mermaid. The Quadrumana of Africa are numerous, and among them the chimpanzee takes the order of precedence. Of all animals, it bears the nearest resemblance to man in its form; and whilst regarded as ranking the highest in the scale of animal existence, its general habit of walking on all-fours is determined by its organization. Baboons, monkeys, apes, and squirrels, enliven the forests by their gambols, in multitudes. The Cheiroptera, or winged mammals of Africa, are supposed to be as plentiful as they are in Asia or America; but as yet they have not been proved to be so. The most remarkable of these at present known to us is the rousette, which grows to the size of a small fowl, lives upon fruits, and is eaten by the inhabitants of Madagascar and the Mauritius. Birds. The most remarkable birds of Africa are the ostrich, the flamingo, the parrot, the guinea-fowl, and the ibis. The first is more peculiar to this continent, although, in the time of Aristotle, it was found in Syria and Mesopotamia, in Asia: it often appears in company with the quagga, or wild ass. Numerous species of the bustard, which is similar in its habits to the ostrich, inhabit the plains. The parrot tribes are remarkable for the beauty of their plumage and the discordance of their notes. Of gallinaceous fowls, the guinea-hen is the only genus which Africa possesses, and which are found in no other part of the globe: they assemble in vast flocks, and are generally found amongst the underwood that skirts the banks of lakes and rivers. Vultures and falcons are numerous; among which may be noticed the secretary, which preys exclusively upon serpents; of which it destroys vast numbers. Reptiles. The crocodile, serpents, particularly the python, and the chameleon, are the most prominent of these. The first is still abundant below the first cataract of the Nile, and is an inhabitant of all the large rivers in tropical Africa. Serpents of every description abound in the woods, and the python, thirty feet long, lurks in the fens and morasses. The chameleon is so plentiful as to be seen on almost every shrub. Insects. These consist of innumerable species. The locust, from time immemorial, has belonged to Africa; and scorpions, dangerous as the serpents, everywhere abound. The zebubs of Bruce and the tsetses of Livingstone, a species of fly, are the greatest pests of the low-lying and cultivated districts. Domestic animals. Of these, the camel and the horse are the most valuable as beasts of burthen. As we have no reports of the wild horse being found in Africa, the modern animal is supposed to have been introduced to that continent; but at what time it is impossible to determine. Those of the Bedouins of Egypt are probably of Arabian breed, and the original of those in Barbary were, with asses, introduced from Spain during the period of Moorish ascendancy in that country: they are mostly used in war. The camel is of Arabian origin, and is spread over all the central and northern parts of the continent: it is figuratively called the "Ship of the Desert," from its being habitually employed in tracking those interminable seas of sand which lie between the more thickly-populated regions of Africa. Of horned cattle, there are many different varieties, and some of the ox tribes are used both as animals of draught and burthen. Of sheep, there are also many varieties; and goats are, in some parts, extremely numerous. The common cat is scarce, but dogs are plentiful, notwithstanding that, among the Mahometans, they are held as unclean; both in Barbary and Egypt, however, they are cherished for the purpose of cleansing the cities of their offal. From their great usefulness in this respect, Mussulmans frequently bequeath considerable legacies for their support; and notwithstanding their numbers, the intense heat of the climate, and the scarcity of water, no instance of canine madness is known amongst them. The domestic poultry of Africa is almost all of foreign introduction. Climate. As more than three fourths of Africa lie within the tropics, it is the hottest and driest of all the great divisions of the earth: it has only two seasons,—a wet and a dry. In a large portion of the Sahara no rain whatever falls, and very little in either Arabia or Egypt. Guinea, Senegambia, and the Sahara, are considered to be the hottest countries of the globe. During the rainy season, however, the two former are drenched with water, when there rises from the earth a steam that would rival a vapour-bath; and hence the unhealthiness of these regions to Europeans. The eastern coast, being tempered by the trade-winds coming from the east, is not so hot as the western. The Sahara is often swept by terrific hurricanes and the simoom. Guinea and the west countries generally are afflicted with the harmattan, a dry hot wind, which cracks the lips, but announces the termination of the rainy season. Tornadoes are frequent in Senegambia and Egypt, and the Barbary states are, on account of their climate, still subject to visitations of the plague. Pro. Dourra, which is the chief corn, wheat, barley, maize, rice, pulse, banana, and the yam; the date, the olive, and the grape; oranges, sugar, coffee, cotton, tobacco, gum-arabic, indigo, and cotton. These products are determined, in a great measure, by climate and situation. In the northern half of the continent, and in the fertile spots of the desert, the date flourishes, the yam and banana in the western parts; wheat, the olive, and the grape, mostly in Egypt and the Barbary states: gum-arabic, being the hardened juice of the acacia, is found chiefly between the desert and Senegambia: the cassia, whose leaves supply senna, is found in the regions of the Nile; and the coffee-tree grows wild in Abyssinia. Both cotton and dourra are produced in many different parts. Minerals. Salt, iron, copper, and gold. In some parts of the desert the natives build their houses with blocks of salt, and gold is obtained by washing in the higher parts of most of the large rivers. The Kong mountains are supposed to be very rich in this metal. The Atlas range is prolific in metals, and the French obtain copper from it in considerable quantities. Race. The Negro is the principal inhabitant of Central and Southern Africa, the Caucasian of Northern Africa and the European colonies. Rel. Mahometanism in the northern half of the continent, including Soudan or Nigritia, and on the eastern coast; Fetishism among the Negroes, and Christianity among the European populations. Generally, however, the people exhibit a low state of civilization. In many parts manufactures are scarcely known, and what are known are of the rudest kind. The exports are principally slaves, ivory, and gold. The slaves are mostly the unfortunate prisoners of the wars which are constantly being waged by the petty princes against each other. Pop. about 60,000,000. Lat. extending from 37° 20′ N. to 34° 50′ S. Lon. extending from 17° 32′ W. to 51° 22′ E.—The name of Africa is supposed to have been spread by degrees from a small province in the north, over the rest of the continent; and although we have already indicated its races in the proper place in this article, we may add, that in the northern parts the Egyptians and Abyssinians are of Arabian extract; while further to the west the Carthaginians passed from Syria, and, according to Sallust, who refers to Punic manuscripts, other maritime parts were peopled by the Medes, Persians, and Armenians. The original inhabitants of the northern parts appear to have been in all ages radically distinct from the negro race, from whom they were divided by the Great Desert; and in the eastern parts the latter were yet further repelled by the Arabian colony which settled in Abyssinia. The Romans appear to have explored the north of Africa as far as the river Niger; and they established flourishing colonies in many parts. Upon the fall of their empire, the Vandals of Spain passed into Africa, A.D. 429, and established a kingdom, which lasted till A.D. 535. In the following century the Mahometan Arabs subdued the north of Africa, and their descendants, under the name of Moors, constitute a great part of the present population. Accounts of this country, however, are very imperfect until we arrive at the beginning of the 15th century, when we find that the only portion of the western coast of Africa with which European navigators were acquainted is that which lies between the Straits of Gibraltar and Cape Nun. The line embraced between these points extends to about 600 miles. Then, Prince Henry of Portugal, a younger son of John I. and Philippa, daughter of John of Gaunt, and sister to Henry IV. of England, conceiving a strong desire to make further discoveries along this coast, had expeditions fitted out for that purpose. Accordingly, Cape Bojador was doubled in 1432, by Gilianez. In 1434 the same navigator advanced 30 leagues further, and in 1443 Cape Blanco was doubled by Nunno Tristan. In 1446 Dinis Fernandez arrived at Cape Verde, and in the following year Nunno Tristan discovered the Rio Grande, where he was murdered by the natives, 60 leagues beyond Cape Verde. In 1463 Prince Henry died, after having devoted the greater portion of his life to the promotion of African discovery; but the Portuguese still continued to pursue their explorations, and in 1467 Sierra Leone was reached. The progress of discovery was still unremittingly carried on, when, in 1486, Bartholomew Diaz doubled Capo Tormentoso (the Cape of Tempests), which is the Cape of Good Hope, the name subsequently given to it by the Portuguese monarch, John II. In 1495 the Portuguese king died, and under his successor, Emanuel the Great, Vasco de Gama set sail on the 8th of July, 1497, to endeavour to find a passage to India by the Cape of Good Hope. This he accomplished after having first proceeded along the eastern coast as far as Melinda, whence he steered right across the Indian Ocean. Thus, to the Portuguese belongs the merit of having, in a great measure, determined the form of the African continent, and of having pioneered the way for future navigators to visit its shores. Whilst maritime discovery was thus proceeding, the interior of the country was not forgotten; but nothing meriting the character of historical certainty is here worthy to be recorded, until the Portuguese missionary enterprises of the 17th century led to more perfect information regarding the inhabitants of Congo, and the general interior of that part of the continent. By 1505 the Portuguese were enabled to establish themselves on the eastern coast, by the conquests which they had made over the Arabs. At present, they have some settlements on the Zambezi, at Tete, about 400 miles from its mouth, and at Zambo, at about 800. French Africa stretched from Cape Blanco to Sierra Leone; but the French were not successful in their commercial enterprises; they still possess a few inconsiderable settlements in this region. The Sieur Brue, a manager of one of their companies, made several important voyages up the Senegal, and succeeded in establishing a factory at Dramanet, and at one or two other places. In 1714, M. Compagnan penetrated the kingdom of Bambouk, and M. Sangnier, in 1785, visited that of Gallam. The kingdom of Hoval, from which gum-senegal is obtained, was likewise explored by the early French settlers. On the west coast, the English, as well as the Dutch and Danes, effected early settlements; but the latter have not been so zealous as the former in prosecuting discoveries. With a view to the suppression, in 1788, of the slave-trade, an association of English gentlemen was formed; and it is to their zeal that the modern world is greatly indebted for what it at present knows of the interior of several parts of Africa. In 1795 and 1796, Mungo Park, under their direction, proceeded from the west coast until he reached the town of Silla, on the Niger. By this expedition, the geographical knowledge of this part of the interior was greatly extended. In 1805, Park embarked on his second expedition, which was undertaken at the public expense, and in which he perished at Boussa, after having visited the cities Jenné, Timbuctoo, and Yaour. In 1799, Hornemann reached Moursouk, in the desert, having started from Cairo; and from that period the interior of this great continent has, in various directions, been progressively unfolded to us. In these adventurous enterprises there appear, in succession, the names of Captain Tuckey, who, in the hope of proving that the river Congo was the same as the Niger, ascended it for about 280 miles; Major Peddie, who with another party started from the mouth of the Senegal and reached Kakundy; Mr. Bowditch, who in 1817 explored parts of the territories of the Fantees and the Ashantees; and others, who, up to the expedition of Major Denham and Lieutenant Clapperton, in 1822, continued to make new discoveries, or to determine, with greater accuracy, the points already made known in these regions. This last expedition was so successful as to induce the government to fit out another, to be conducted by Clapperton. He set out, accordingly, from Badaggy, a place lying a short way to the east of Cape Coast Castle; passed through the kingdom of Nyffi or Nyffe; visited Kano, the commercial capital of Houssa; thence to Sackatoo, where he died. In the March of 1830, Richard Lander, the former servant of Clapperton, and his brother, proceeded on an expedition, which had for its aim the discovery of the mouth of the Quorra, Joliba, or Niger; and on the 18th of November of the same year, Richard Lander achieved this object, and found it called the river Nun, or first Brass River, from a Negro town of the same name, situate on its banks, at a short distance inland. Since this period, several expeditions have been sent to this region, but they have been attended with indifferent success; indeed, the sickly character of the climate has in general proved fatal to the explorers and adventurers. Whilst these enterprises had been undertaken in Western Africa, the southern portion of the continent was not forgotten. The colony of the Cape of Good Hope was first settled by the Dutch about 1650, and was finally taken possession of by the English in 1806. For upwards of a hundred years, little or no attempts were made to penetrate beyond the immediate boundary-lines which the colonists had fixed for themselves; and even up to a very recent period, the progress of discovery was of an extremely partial description. The journeys of Mr. Andrew Smith, made in 1835 and 1836, are interesting, from his having visited the sources of the Caledon and the Maputa, and his having scaled the Caffrarian mountains; as are those of Captain Alexander, who, in 1836 and 1837, traversed the countries of the Namaquas, Bosjesmans, and the Hill-Damaras. It is since these, however, that the greatest contributions have been made to our geographical knowledge of Southern Africa. These have been obtained principally through the labours of Dr. Livingstone, the missionary stationed at Kolobeng. This traveller, in company with Messrs. Oswell and Murray, on the 1st of June, 1849, departed on a journey, which had for its object the discovery of an inland lake, which, so far back as 1508, had been indicated on maps, and to find which was the chief object of the expedition of Mr. Andrew Smith, who had set out thirteen years before. Dr. Livingstone and his companions were successful in their enterprise. They discovered Lake Ngami, occupying a position by the barometer of 2,825 feet above the level of the sea. Repeated visits to this region have confirmed Dr. Livingstone in the opinion that a legitimate trade might be successfully and profitably pursued by British merchants with the natives. Seventeen years of his life this traveller had passed in Africa previous to his recent visit to England, a great portion of which had been spent amongst various African tribes. Eight of them were occupied among a tribe of the Bechuanas, in preaching the doctrines of Christianity. It is impossible to calculate even the probable results of his explorations. He has disclosed to us the true country of the Negro race, traced the vast Kalahari Desert, and tracked the course of the great river Zambezi. He has indicated new fields for commercial enterprise, and has rendered a great part of Southern Africa, which had hitherto been considered by geographers as a terra incognita, familiar to us, by the history of his adventures and discoveries. His routes extend from Cape Town to Loando on the west, and from Algoa Bay to Quilimane, at the mouth of the Zambezi, on the east, and may be easily followed on our African map, upon which the whole of his discoveries are marked. In 1851, Mr. Galton explored, on the west coast, the country lying between Walvisch Bay on the south, and Ondonga, near the river Nourse, on the north. His inland explorations went as far as 21° E. lon. Since then, M. Gassiott has reached the river Limpopo, and, from the great desire which generally prevails for correct knowledge of this continent in all its parts, there is no doubt that new travellers will enter the field, and that the interior of Africa will, in a very few years, be no longer considered as a terra incognita. On the eastern coast, extending northward, the travelling enterprises of other missionaries have been attended with no great success; but the northern expedition undertaken by Messrs. Richardson, Barth, and Overweg, may be regarded as one of the most important that has yet penetrated the interior of Africa. The objects of this expedition were twofold: the one was to arrange commercial treaties with the chiefs of the desert regions lying between Tripoli and Lake Tchad; the other, more immediately under the conduct of Barth and Overweg, to advance our scientific knowledge. In the latter part of 1849 they left this country for Tripoli, which they reached in safety, and about the 23rd of March, 1850, set out on their perilous enterprise across the desert. Their caravan consisted of about forty camels, and the scientific purposes of their journey tended to make their progress slow; however, they pursued their way, passing through many dangers, until they had passed the Great Desert and arrived at Taradahit, on the confines of Soudan. To the south of this about 60 miles they were attacked by robbers, taken prisoners, and had to ransom themselves at a high price. In 1850, the travellers, on their way to Lake Tchad, reached Damergu, where they separated, appointing Kouka, the capital of Bornou, the rendezvous where they should again meet. This was destined never to take place. Richardson died on the 4th of March, 1851, at Unguratua, situate at about 100 geographical miles W.N.W. from that place. In April, Drs. Barth and Overweg met again at Kouka, and pursuing their researches, the former determined the upper course of the river Chaddah, whilst the latter launched on the lake a boat, which he named the Lord Palmerston, on account of the deep interest which that nobleman had taken in the expedition, and explored it, and visited many of its islands, of which it contains about 100. These are inhabited by the Biddumas, whom Dr. Overweg was the first European to visit. In September they set out on a journey for Borgu, a country lying midway on the road to Egypt, in a north-easterly direction from Lake Tchad, and never before visited by Europeans. Speaking of this expedition, a communication—which we condense to save space—written to the "Athenæum" at the period of its progress, thus comprehensively states not only that which it had already accomplished, but that which it further intended to accomplish.—"After the safe return of the travellers from Borgu, and their successful exploration of the eastern portion of the remarkable basin of Lake Tchad, they will direct all their energies to the south. As regards this last stage of their gigantic journey, namely from Kouka to the shores of the Indian Ocean, Dr. Barth believes, from the information which he has collected, that a more southerly route, in the direction of Lake Nyassi, will be much more practicable than a straight line to Mombaz, on a bearing of about south-east. (This was confirmed in 1853, by the successful journey, which occupied six months, of a Moorish caravan, which started from Zanzibar, on the east coast, and reached Benguela, on the west. During fifteen days, on one part of this journey, the caravan saw no inhabitants whatever.) The routes already performed by Messrs. Barth and Overweg amount, at a rough estimate, to 3,700 geographical miles; and the itineraries sent home by Dr. Barth form a network which covers the greater portion of Northern Africa. Nor would it be right to measure their investigations by mere distances; for it must be borne in mind that up to this time, except within the countries in the vicinity of the seashore, the entire continent of Africa between Tripoli and the Cape colony, and between the basin of the Nile and the lower course of the Kawara, does not present a single point, the position of which (with the exception of some observations made by Mr. Galton in Southern Africa) had been determined with any degree of accuracy. The positions of Lyon, Denham, and Clapperton are merely approximations to the truth, particularly their determinations of longitudes. Within only three or four months after their arrival at Kouka, the travellers had already successfully navigated Lake Tchad, and penetrated 350 miles to the south. Under the different headings of the various countries and kingdoms in Africa, much additional information will be found connected with its history.

AFRICAN ISLANDS, äf'-re-kan, a cluster of low islands in the Indian Ocean, on one of which her majesty's ship Spitfire was wrecked, 21st August, 1801. Lat. 4° 53′ S. Lon. 53° 33′ E.

AFRICANUS, Julius, äf'-re-cai'-nus, the author of a letter pronouncing the story of Susannah a forgery; and another, in which he reconciled St. Matthew and St. Luke's genealogies of our Saviour.—He also compiled a chronicle of events from the commencement of the world to the early part of the 3rd century of the Christian era. Flourished in the 3rd century.

AFRICANUS. (See SCIPIO, Publius Cornelius.)

AFRIKEAH, or MAHADIA, äf'-re-ke'-a, or ma'-ha-de'-a a seaport of the kingdom of Tunis, 115 miles S.S.E. of Tunis. It was taken by Charles V., who demolished its fortifications. Pop. 3,000.

AGADLY, ag'-a-ble, a town built of stone, on the Tuat oasis, between Tripoli, and Timbuctoo, Africa. It is a station where merchants meet for business transactions. Lat. 26° N. Lon. 0° 56′ E.

AGADES, ăg'-a-des, a town of Central Africa, and the capital of the kingdom of Asben, tributary to the king of Timbuctoo. It is situate on a "green spot" in the desert, where the Soudan merchants assemble at fixed periods to transact business with those of Northern Africa. Lat. 18° N. Lon. 13° E.

AGADIR, or SANTA CRUZ, a-'ga-deer, the most southern seaport of Morocco, the ancient Mauritania,—Africa. It is fortified. Pop. about 500.

AGAG, ai'-gag, a king of the Amalekites, who, on the Israelites coming out of Egypt, attacked them in the wilderness and slew all stragglers. He was hewn in pieces in Gilgal.

AGALLEGA, or GALLEGA, a-gall'-e-ga, an island of Africa, near Madagascar. Lat. 10° 12′ N. Lon. 54° 8′ E.

AGAMEDES and TROPHONIUS, ăg'-a-me'-des and tro-fo'-ne-us, two architects who designed the entrance of the temple of Delphi, for which they demanded of the god whatever gift was most advantageous for a man to receive. Three days after they were found dead in their beds.

AGAMEMNON, ăg'-a-mem'-non, king of Mycenæ and Argos, was brother to Menelaus, and son of Pisthenes, the son of Atreus. Homer calls them sons of Atreus, which is wrong, upon the authority of Hesiod and others. When Atreus was dead, his brother Thyestes seized the kingdom of Argos, and removed Agamemnon and Menelaus. Agamemnon married Clytemnestra, and Menelaus became the husband of Helen, both daughters of Tyndarus, king of Sparta, who assisted them to recover their father's kingdom, where Agamemnon established himself, at Mycenæ. Menelaus succeeded his father-in-law. When Helen was stolen by Paris, Agamemnon was elected commander-in-chief of the Grecian forces levied against Troy, and he departed for the siege, leaving his kingdom and wife in the guardianship of Ægisthus, king of Argos. The fleet with the troops being detained at Aulis, Agamemnon there sacrificed his daughter to appease Diana. During the Trojan war, Agamemnon behaved with great valour, but his quarrel with Achilles, on account of the amiable Briseis, whom he took from Achilles by force, was very prejudicial to the cause of the Greeks. Clytemnestra, with her adulterer Ægisthus, prepared to murder him on his return; and as he came from the bath, in order to embarrass him, and effect her purpose, she gave him a tunic, the sleeves of which were sewed together. Whilst trying to put it on, she brought him to the ground with the stroke of a hatchet, and Ægisthus seconded her blows. His death was revenged by his son Orestes.

AGAMENTICUS, ăg-a-men'-te-cus, a mountain of Maine, U.S., 8 miles from York Harbour. It affords pasture up to its summit, and is a seamark for the entrance of Piscataqua river. Lat 43° 16′ N. Lon. 70° 39′ W.

AGANA, a-ga'-na, one of the Ladrone islands, where Magellan was killed, on a voyage in search of the Moluccas. Pop. 3,000.—A Spanish governor resides here.

AGANDURU, Roderic Moriz, ag'-an-du'-ru, a Spanish missionary, who went to Japan and other oriental parts to disseminate Christianity. Lived in the 17th century.

AGANIPPE, ăg-a-nip'-pe, a celebrated fountain of Bœotia, at the foot of Mount Helicon. It flows into the Permessus, and is sacred to the Muses, who, from it, were called Agamippedes.

AGAPE, ăg'-a-pe, 'love;' feasts of love, friendship, or kindness, among the primitive Christians.

AGAPETUS I., ag-a-pe'-tus, a Roman pontiff, who opposed the attempts of Justinian to invade the rights of the Church. He was raised to the pontificate in 535, and died the year after. B. at Rome.

AGAPETUS II., a man of great reputation for sanctity of character. He received the tiara in 946. D. 956.

AGAPETUS, a deacon of Constantinople, who wrote a letter to Justinian, on the duties of a Christian prince. Flourished in the 6th century.

AGAPIUS, a-gai'-pe-us, a Greek monk, who wrote a treatise on the salvation of a sinner. Flourished in the 17th century.—His treatise was printed in modern Greek, at Venice, 1641.

AGARD, Arthur, ăg'-ard, an English antiquary, who held the office of deputy chamberlain in the Exchequer during a period of forty-five years. In conjunction with Sir Robert Cotton and other eminent men, he formed a society of antiquaries. B. at Foston, Derbyshire, 1540; buried in Westminster Abbey, 1615.—He wrote a treatise to explain the Domesday book, which was deposited in the Cotton Library, and several tracts of his on antiquarian subjects were published by Hearne.

AGASIAS, ă-gai'-se-as, a sculptor of Ephesus, celebrated for his admirable statue of the Gladiator.

AGASICLES, ă-găs'-i-cles, a king of Sparta, who used to say, "a king ought to govern his subjects as a father his family."

AGASSIZ, Louis, a-găs'-se, a distinguished French naturalist, for many years professor of natural history at Neufchatel. In 1847, he became, by invitation, professor of natural history in Cambridge College, Massachusetts, America. As a naturalist his fame dates from 1828, and much of his attention has been devoted to fossil remains. He was the first to propose the division of fossil fishes in accordance with the formation of their scales. He was also amongst the first to confirm Mr. Shuttleworth's discovery of animalculæ being in the red snow of the Alps, and has shown that there are higher forms of animal existence there than were before suspected. As a geologist he has directed attention to a large series of important phenomena, and has, in various publications, developed the views he has been led to entertain upon them. He is an upholder of the doctrine which teaches the successive creation of higher orders of organized beings on the surface of the earth, and believes that the human race has had, in its several distinct species, separate stocks of originality, both as to time and space. As an author, his contributions to natural history have been extensive, and, it may be remarked that he was the founder of the "Bibliographia Zoologica et Geologica," a great work, which has been edited by the late Mr. Strickland and Sir W. Jardine, bart. On the death of the late Professor Edward Forbes, he was offered the chair of natural history in Edinburgh, but he declined it. B. in Switzerland, about the beginning of the present century.

AGATA, a-ga'-ta, the name of several towns of Italy, the most remarkable of which is one in the district of Gaeta, Naples, with some magnificent remains, and the ancient Minturno. Pop. 7,000.—Another 4 miles to the south of Reggio, Naples, which has a cotton trade. Pop. 2,500.

AGATHANGELUS, ai'-găth-ăn'-je-lus, an historian of Armenia, who recorded the introduction of Christianity into his native country. Flourished in the 11th century.

AGATHARCIDES, ăg'-ath-ar'-se-des, a native of Cnidus, who wrote in Greek a history of the successes of Alexander. Flourished about 180 B.C.

AGATHARCUS, ăg'-ath-ark'-us, a Samian painter, whom Æschylus employed to paint scenes for his stage. Flourished 450 B.C.

AGATHEMER, Orthonis, ăg-a-the'-mer, the author of a "Compendium of Geography," in Greek, which was published by Hudson, at Oxford, in 1703.

AGATHIAS, ă-ga'-the-as, a Greek historian, who wrote a history of the reign of Justinian in five books. He was also a writer of epigrams, some of which are to be found in the "Anthologia." Flourished in the 6th century.—His history was published in Paris in 1660.

AGATHO, a'-ga-tho, a pope, who despatched legates to the council called at Constantinople to condemn the Eutychians, a sect who denied the human nature of Christ, and asserted that his body was only an aërial vehicle. In 679 he was elected to the papal chair. B. at Palermo; D. 682.

AGATHO, a musician, who was the first to introduce songs in tragedy.

AGATHOCLEA, ăg-ăth-o-cle'-a, a beautiful Egyptian courtezan, with whom one of the Ptolemies fell in love, and in order to marry her, destroyed his wife Eurydice.

AGATHOCLES, ăg-ăth'-o-cles. There were many of this name, the most remarkable of whom was a licentious and ambitious youth, the son of a potter, who, entering the Sicilian army, rose to the greatest honours, and made himself master of Syracuse. He reduced all Sicily under his power; but being defeated at Himera by the Carthaginians, he carried the war into Africa, where, for four years, he extended his conquests over his enemy. He afterwards passed into Italy, and made himself master of Crotona. D. in his 72nd year, B.C. 289, after a reign of 28 years of great prosperity mingled with the deepest adversity.

AGATHODAEMON, ăg'-a-tho-dai-e'-mon, a map-maker of Alexandria, and the supposed constructer of the maps found in the oldest manuscripts of the Geography of Claudius Ptolemæus. It cannot be determined with accuracy when he flourished.

AGATHON, ăg'-a-thon, a tragic poet, who gained the prize at the Olympic games, B.C. 419. His works are lost.

AGATHONISI, ăg-a-tho-ne'-se, a small island of the Grecian archipelago, about a league S. of the isle of Samos.

AGAVE, ă-gav'-ve, daughter of Cadmus and Hermione, married Echion, by whom she had Pentheus, who was torn to pieces by the Bacchanals. She is said to have killed her husband in celebrating the orgies of Bacchus. She received divine honours after death.

AGDE, agd, a town of France, in the department of Herault, seated on the river Herault, not far from its mouth in the Gulf of Lyons, where there is a fort to defend the entrance. It is 30 miles to the S.W. of Montpellier, pleasantly situate; but being constructed of black basalt, it has received the cognomen of the Black Town. It is encompassed by thick walls, possesses a school of navigation and a college, and has its port defended by Fort Brescau. Does an active coasting trade. Pop. 9,000. Lat. 45° 19′ N. Lon. 3° 33′ E.

AGDEH, ag'-de, a town of Persia, 70 miles W. from Yezd, which receives goats' hair from it for the manufacture of shawls.

AGELASTUS, ăj'-e-lăs'-tus, a surname of Crassus, the grandfather of the rich Crassus. He only laughed once in his life, and this, it is said, was upon seeing an ass eat thistles.

AGELIUS, Anthony, ăj'-e-lĭ'-us, bishop of Acerno, in the kingdom of Naples, who wrote commentaries on some parts of the Old Testament. D. 1608.

AGELNOTH, ăj'-el-noth, an archbishop of Canterbury, and a favourite of King Canute. On the death of that monarch, he refused to crown his son Harold, pretending that the deceased king had commanded him to crown none but the issue of Queen Emma. It is uncertain whether Harold ever was crowned. D. 1038.—He wrote some religious pieces.

AGEN, a'-jen, an episcopal town of France, the capital of Lot-et-Garonne, on the banks of the Garonne, 103 miles S.E. of Bordeaux. It has a considerable commerce in prunes. Manf. Serges, camlets, and sail-cloth. Pop. 14,000. Lat. 44° 12′ N. Lon. 0° 4′ E. —In this city Julius Scaliger, the scholar, lived, and here his son Joseph, celebrated for his great learning, was born.

AGENABAT, ăj-en-ai'-bat, a town of Transylvania, 10 miles N.E. of Hermanstadt. Lat. 46° 32′ N. Lon. 24° 50′ E.

AGENOR, ă-je'-nor, king of Phœnicia, was son of Neptune and Libya, and brother to Belus. He married Telephassa, called by some Agriope, by whom he had Cadmus, Phœnix, Cilix, and Europa. As Carthage was built by his descendants, it is called Agenoris urbs.

AGENORIA, or AGENORA, ăj'-e-nor'-e-a, from agenor, 'fortis,' the goddess of industry and courage. Her temple was upon Mount Aventine.

AGENORIA, a name given to the goddess of silence, represented with one of her fingers pressing her lips.

AGER, Nicholas, adj'-air, a professor of medicine at Strasburg; distinguished as a botanist and physician. Lived in the 17th century.

AGEROLA, aj'-e-ro'-la, a town of Naples, 10 miles S.W. of Palermo. Pop. 2,300.

AGESANDER, ăj'-e-săn'-der, a famous sculptor of Rhodes, who, in the time of Vespasian, made a representation of Laocoon's history, which now passes for the best relic of all ancient sculpture. The Laocoon was discovered at Rome in 1506, and afterwards deposited in the Farnese palace, where it still remains.

AGESILAUS, ăj-es'-e-lai'-us, king of Sparta, of the family of the Agidæ, son of Doryssus, and father of Archelaus. During his reign, Lycurgus instituted his famous laws. Reigned 850 B.C.

AGESILAUS, son of Archidamus, of the family of the Proclidæ, elected king of Sparta over his nephew Leotychides. He made war against Artaxerxes, king of Persia, with success; but in the midst of his conquests he was called home to oppose the Athenians and Bœotians, who were ravaging his country. The despatch which he made on this occasion was such, that in thirty days he passed over the same extent of country which occupied the army of Xerxes a whole year. He defeated his enemies at Coronea; but sickness prevented the progress of his conquests, and the Spartans were beaten in every engagement, especially at Leuctra, till he again appeared at their head. Though deformed, small of stature, and lame, he was brave, and possessed of a magnanimity which compensated for all the imperfections of nature. In his 80th year he went to assist Tachus, king of Egypt, whose servants could hardly be persuaded that the Lacedæmonian was a general, when they beheld him eating with his soldiers on the bare ground, and with no covering to his head. D. on his return from Egypt, after a reign of 36 years, 362 B.C., and his remains were embalmed and brought to Lacedæmon.—There were others of this name, but of inferior note.

AGESIPOLIS I., ăj'-e-sip'-o-lis, king of Lacedæmon and son of Pausanias, who obtained a great victory over the Mantineans. He reigned fourteen years, and was succeeded by his brother Cleombrotus, 380 B.C.

AGESISTRATA, ăj'-e-sis'-tra-ta, the mother of King Agis. Lived 1,000 years B.C.

AGGA, or AGGONA, ăg-ga, a town and district on the coast of Guinea, in which is a very high hill called the Devil's Mount. The English have a fort here. Lat. 6° N. Lon. 0° 5′ E.

AGGAS, Ralph, ăg'-găs, an engraver and surveyor, who was the first to execute a plan of London, which was published for the first time in 1560, afterwards in 1618, and again in 1748. He also produced plans of Cambridge, Oxford, and Dunwich in Suffolk. D. 1579.

AGGAS, Robert, or more commonly called Angus, a painter of landscape in the reign of Charles II. D. in London 1679.

AGGER, ag'-ger, a natural communication, formed during a storm in 1825, between the North Sea in Denmark, North Jutland, and the Limfiord.

AGGERHUYS, ag-ger-hoos', a Norwegian fortress and province, which is full of mountains, the largest and in many respects the most important in the kingdom. Its mines, agriculture, and commerce are considerable and valuable. Pop. 600,000. Lat. between 58° and 62° N. Lon. between 8° and 12° E.

AGGEROE, ag'-ge-ro, an island in the Gulf of Christiania, not far from the mainland.

AGGERSOE, ag'-ger-so, a Danish island in the Great Belt. Lat. 55° 12′ N. Lon. 11° 12′ E.

AGGERSUND, ag'-ger-soond, a small island in the Cattegat, Norway.

AGGIUS, adj'-e-us, a village in Sardinia, 35 miles N. of Sassari. Pop. 2,500.

AGGRAMMES, ăg-grăm'-mes, a king of the Gangarides. His father was a hair-dresser, of whom the queen became enamoured, and whom she made governor to the king's children, to gratify a criminal passion. He killed them, to raise Aggrammes, his son by the queen, to the throne.

AGHABOE, ăg'-ha-bo, a village and parish of Ireland, in Queen's county. Pop. 6,000.

AGHADOE, ăg'-ha-do, a town of Ireland, in the county of Kerry, and a bishop's see, united to Limerick. It is situate near the Lake of Killarney, 15 miles S.S.E. of Ardfert.

AGHRIM, ah'-grim, a parish of Ireland, 11 miles E N.E. of Galway, memorable for the decisive victory gained, in 1691, by the army of King William, over that of James II. Saint-Ruth, and 4,000 of his men, fell on the side of James; and only 800 of the English on that of William. Area, 7,252 acres. Pop. 2,360.

AGHRIM, a town of Ireland, in the county of Wicklow, 13 miles S.W. of Wicklow.

AGIAS, aj-i'-as, a famous Lacedæmonian soothsayer, who foretold to Lysander his future success at Ægospotamos, and the destruction of the Athenian fleet.

AGILULF, ăj'-e-loolf, duke of Turin, chosen king of the Lombards in 591. He renounced Arianism, and embraced the Catholic faith; but while engaged in a war with some of the Italian princes, he perpetrated great ravages in the Ecclesiastical States. D. 619.

AGINCOURT, ăj'-in-kort (Fr. adj'-ăn-kooer), a village of France, 7 miles N. of Hesdin. Near this place Henry V., king of England, obtained a signal victory over the French, on the 25th October, 1415. The English army on this occasion is variously stated at from 10,000 to 22,000 men; and the French as consisting of 60,000 by the lowest accounts, but according to some contemporary writers, it amounted to 100,000 or even 110,000. The French left dead, 92 barons, 1,500 knights, and 8,000 gentlemen of family, and several thousand private men, without including 14,000 prisoners; among whom were the duke of Orleans, and many others of great distinction: while the loss of the English, including the duke of York and the earl of Suffolk, who were killed, did not exceed 1,200 men. Lat. 50° 31′ N. Lon. 2° 10′ E.

AGIS, aï'-jis, king of Sparta, succeeded his father, Eurysthenes, and, after a reign of one year, was succeeded by his son Echestratus, 1058 B.C.

AGIS III., king of Sparta, and grandson of Agesilaus. He stirred up several of the Grecian states against Alexander, but fell fighting against the Macedonians, 337 B.C.

AGIS IV., king of Sparta, was the son of Eudamidas. For endeavouring to reform the constitution of his country, and improve the manners of his people, they rose against him and put him to death, 241 B.C.

AGIS, a poet of Argos, who attended Alexander in his Asiatic expedition, and rendered himself agreeable by the meanest adulation. He raised his patron to immortality, and declared that Bacchus, Hercules, and the sons of Leda, would yield to his superior merits in the assembly of the gods.

AGLAIA, ăg-laï'-ya, the youngest of the three Graces, called sometimes Pasiphae.

AGLAONICE, ăg-lai-o-nï'-ce, daughter of Hegemon, was acquainted with astronomy and eclipses; whence she boasted of her power to draw the moon from heaven. Her arrogance, and the falsehood of her assertions, rendered her name proverbial for deceit and imposition.

AGLAOPE, ăg-laï'-o-pe, one of the Sirens.

AGLAOPHON, ăg-laï'-o-fon. There are two Grecian painters distinguished in antiquity by this name, natives of the island of Thasos. Flourished about 500 years B.C.

AGLASOUN, a'-gla-soon, a town 55 miles from Sataliah, in Anatolia, Asia Minor. It stands on a mountain, and is the ancient Lysinæ.

AGLAUROS, ăg-law'-ros, daughter of Erechtheus, the oldest king of Athens. Some make her daughter of Cecrops. She was changed into a stone by Mercury.

AGLAUS, ăg'-lai-us, the poorest man of Arcadia, pronounced by the oracle more happy than Gyges, the king of Lydia.

AGLIE, a'-gle, a town of Italy, in Piedmont, 10 miles S. of Ivrea. Pop. 4,500. It has a splendid palace and gardens.

AGLIONBY, John, ag'-le-on'-be, a divine, who was made chaplain to Queen Elizabeth, and in 1601 elected principal of Edmund Hall. He was concerned in the translation of the New Testament as at present used. B. in Cumberland, 1567; D. at Islip, of which he was rector, 1610.—There was another John Aglionby, who was dean of Canterbury, but died a few months after his nomination, 1613. He appears to have been the son of the preceding.

AGLIONBY, Edward, a poet of the reign of Elizabeth, from whom he received a pension for writing her pedigree.

AGMET, or AGMAT, ag'-met, a town of Morocco, on a river of the same name, and on a declivity of one of the mountains of Atlas, 16 miles S. of Morocco.

AGMON, ăg'-mon, one of the companions of Diomedes, remarkable for his fidelity, his valour, and constancy. The contempt he expressed for Venus offended the gods, and he was changed into a swan.

AGNA, ăg'-na, a woman in the age of Horace, who, though deformed, had many admirers.

AGNANO, an-ya'-no, a circular lake in the kingdom of Naples, 7 miles from Puzzoli. It is about half a mile in diameter, surrounded by mountains, and on its margin is situate the famous Grotta del Cane, in which so many dogs have suffered, to show the deleterious effects of a poisonous vapour that rises to about a foot above the ground.

AGNELLUS, an-yaïl'-loos, an abbot of Ravenna, who wrote the lives of the bishops and archbishops of that city. Lived in the 9th century.

AGNES, ST., saint ăg'-nes, one of the Scilly islands. Area, 300 acres. Pop. 200. Lat. 49° 53′ 30″ N. Lon. 6° 20′ W.

AGNES, ST., a parish and town of Cornwall, in which Opie, the celebrated painter and husband of Mrs. Opie, the writer of juvenile tales, was born. Area, 8,960 acres. Pop. chiefly mining, 8,000. St. Agnes' Beacon, in the neighbourhood, rises to a height of 664 feet.

AGNESI, Maria Gaetana, an-ye'-se, an illustrious Italian lady, who by her application to mathematical learning, and her progress therein, so distinguished herself, that Pope Benedict XIV. appointed her, in 1750, professor of mathematics in the university of Bologna. Subsequently to this act of the pontiff, she took the veil. B. at Milan 1718; D. about 1770.—Her "Analytical Institutions" were published at Milan, in 1743. They were translated into French by M. Cousin, and published at Paris in 1775, and have appeared in English in 2 vols., with her life prefixed, taken from Montucla.

AGNESI, Maria Teresa, a sister of the above, and the composer of three operas, "Sophonisba," "Ciro," and "Nitocri." B. at Milan, 1750.

AGNO, an'-yo, a village of Switzerland, 3 miles W. of Lugano. Pop. 800.

AGNO, ăg'-no, one of the nymphs who nursed Jupiter. She gave her name to a fountain on Mount Lycæus. When the priest of Jupiter prayed and afterwards stirred this fountain with a bough, there arose a thick vapour, which immediately descended in a beautiful shower.

AGNODICE, ăg-nod'-e-ce, an Athenian virgin, who, in order to study medicine, disguised her sex. She was taught by Hierophilus the art of midwifery, and when employed, always discovered her sex to her patients. This brought her into so much repute, that the men-midwives, whose practice she greatly injured, accused her before the Areopagus of corruption. She confessed her sex to the judges, and a law was immediately made to empower all freeborn women to practise midwifery.

AGNOLO, Baccio d', ba-che-o dan'-yo'-lo, a Florentine wood-engraver, which profession he abandoned for that of an architect. Whilst in Rome, pursuing his studies among the remains of antiquity, his workshop was visited by Raphael, Michael Angelo, and others, and on returning to Florence he rose into eminence, notwithstanding the ridicule and detraction which too often follow the footsteps of originality. When he died, his son Giuliano directed the works he had left unfinished. D. at Florence, 1543.

AGNON, ăg'-non, son of Nicias, was present at the taking of Samos by Pericles. In the Peloponnesian war, he went against Potidæa, but abandoned his expedition through disease. He built Amphipolis, whose inhabitants favoured Brasidas, whom they regarded as their founder, forgetful of Agnon.

AGNONI, an-yo'-ne, a town of Naples, situate on a hill, 20 miles N. of Campobasso, and which is said to produce the best copper wares in the kingdom. Pop. about 8,000.

AGNONIDES, ăg-non'-e-dez, a rhetorician of Athens, who accused Phocion of betraying the Piræus to Nicanor. When the people recollected the services Phocion had rendered them, they raised him statues, and put his accuser to death.

AGOA DE PAO, a'-yo-a-de-pa'-o, the mountain peak near the middle of the island of St. Michael, in the Azores, upwards of 3,000 feet high.

AGOBARD, ag'-o-bar, an archbishop of Lyons, who was deprived of his dignity for deposing Louis the Meek, in the assembly of Compiègne, but was afterwards restored. He opposed image-worship, and wrote against the belief of witchcraft and the practice of duelling. D. 840.—His works were printed in 1666, in two vols. 8vo.

AGON, a'-gawng, a town of France, on the north coast of Normandy. Pop. 1,800.

AGON, a'-gon, an island of Sweden, in the Gulf of Bothnia, with a good harbour. Lat. 61° 20′ N. Lon. 18° 10′ E.

AGONALIA and AGONIA, ăg'-o-nai'-le-a, and ăg-o'ne-a, festivals in Rome, celebrated three times a year, in honour of Janus, or Agonius. The chief priest used to offer a ram.

AGONES CAPITOLINI, ăg-o'-nes kăp'-e-to'-lī'-ni, games celebrated at Rome every fifth year upon the Capitoline hill, established by Diocletian. Prizes were proposed for agility and strength, as well as for poetical and other literary compositions. The poet Statius publicly recited his Thebaid at them, but it was not received with much applause.

AGONIUS, ăg-o'-ne-us, a Roman deity, who presided over the actions of men.

AGONOTHETES, ăg'-o-noth'-e-tes, the officers who sat as umpires at the Grecian games. They took care that the contests should be performed according to custom, settled all disputes which arose, and decided to whom the prizes should be awarded.

AGOONA, a-goo'-na, a district on the Gold Coast of Africa. Pop. about 12,000.

AGOP, John, a-gop, a grammarian and critic of Armenia, who flourished in the 17th century.

AGORACRITUS, ăg-o-rak'-re-tus, a sculptor of Paros, and disciple of Phidias. Flourished 429 B.C.—He was such a favourite with his master, that it is said Phidias allowed him to affix his name to some works which he himself had executed.

AGOREA, ăg'-o-re'-a, a name of Minerva at Sparta.

AGORANIS, ăg'-o-rā'-nis, a river falling into the Ganges, now the Gogra.

AGORANOMI, ăg'-o-răn'-o-mi, ten magistrates at Athens, who watched over the city and port, and inspected whatever was exposed to sale.

AGORDO, a-gawr'-do, a town of northern Italy, situate in a fertile plain in which is the valley of Imperina, where are the richest copper-mines in Italy. Pop. 3,000.

AGOREUS, ăg'-o-re'-us, one of the names of Mercury, from his presiding over the markets.

AGOSTA, a'-gos-ta, a town of Sicily, in Val di Noto, with an excellent harbour. In 1763 it was mostly swallowed up by an earthquake, but has been rebuilt. It stands at a distance of about 18 miles to the north of Syracuse. Pop. about 16,000. Lat. 37° 13′ N. Lon. 15° 13′ E. It was off this port that De Ruyter, the famous Dutch admiral, in command of the united Dutch and Spanish fleet, fought on the 22nd April, 1676, the engagement in which he received his death-wound. He was defeated by the French under Duquesne, and died a week after at Syracuse.

AGOSTINO, Paolo da Valerano, a'-gos-te'-no, a celebrated musical composer, and master of the pope's chapel at Rome. D. 1629, aged 36.—His choruses are highly spoken of.

AGOT, ai'-got, a small island in the English Channel. Lat. 48° 38′ N. Lon. 2° 4′ W.

AGOULT, Guillaume d', a'-goolt, a gentleman of Provence, who wrote ballads about the year 1195.

AGOWS, ăg'-ows, a remarkable people of Abyssinia, inhabiting a territory to the east of the sources of the Bahr-el-Azrek (Blue River), or Abyssinian Nile. Ext. 60 miles long and 30 broad. This district is fertile in the highest degree. It produces large quantities of honey, and raises remarkably fine cattle, with which it almost exclusively supplies Gondar, the capital. Pop. Considerable, but unascertained.—The state can send a force of from 4,000 to 5,000 men into the field. There is another tribe of the same people, called Tcheretz Agows, who inhabit a district on the northern bank of the Tacasse.

AGRA, a'-gra, one of the north-west provinces of Hindostan, bounded on the north by the province of Delhi, on the south by Malwa, on the east by Oude and Allahabad, and on the west by Rajpootana. Its length is about 250 and its breadth about 180 miles. Area 9,298 miles. Desc. To the north of the river Chumbul the country is, in general, flat and thinly wooded; but in the north-western direction trees become more abundant and the surface more undulated. The district between the Jumna and the Ganges, called the Doab, is the most fertile part of the province. Rivers. The principal are the Ganges, the Jumna, and the Chumbul. Towns. There are about forty considerable towns, besides villages, and a great many fortresses. The chief are Alwur, Bhurtpoor, Deeg, Mathura, Muttra, Etawah, Gwalior, Calpee, Gohud, and Narwar. Inhabitants. A mixed race of Mahometans and Hindoos. Pro. Sugar, cotton, and indigo. A good breed of horses is reared. Minerals. Marble, salt, and copper.

Manf. Coarse cotton cloths, fine muslins, and some silks. Pop. of the British part, about 4,373,000. Lat. between 25° and 28° N.—As this is one of the disaffected provinces, and has been the theatre of some of the most daring scenes in the recent revolt, we will take the opportunity of briefly rehearsing the probable causes which led to that revolt, which has deluged so many of the beautiful plains of India with much of the bravest blood of England. Previous to entering upon this history, it may be remarked, that the British territory in India is as large as Europe, leaving Russia out of the calculation, and has a population of 200,000,000. This territory is distributed amongst four governments or presidencies—Bengal, Madras, Bombay, and Agra, which is the seat of the government of the North-western Provinces. Bengal is the seat of the governor-general and the Supreme Council; Madras and Bombay have each had a governor and council, and Agra has had a lieutenant-governor without a council. The total military force at the disposal of the governor-general was about 320,000 men. Of these, 20,500 were queen's troops; 20,000 were the European troops of the East-India Company; 240,000 were the honourable Company's native troops, and 32,000 consisted of native contingents, commanded by British officers, and available under treaties. Out of the 322,000, not quite 50,000 were British. Such was the military force of our Indian empire previous to the mutiny, for which various causes have been assigned; but the annexation of Oude has been one of the principal. In 1856 this kingdom was annexed by Lord Dalhousie to the British dominions,—an act which has been variously characterized, and viewed by the natives as one of crying injustice. When it was done, Lord Dalhousie was perfectly aware that large numbers of the Bengal army were natives of Oude, and could not have been so shortsighted as not to have anticipated the great amount of dissatisfaction to which it was calculated to give rise. But be this as it may, it seemed to be the proximate cause of the fearful mutiny which so soon afterwards was destined to take place. From 1836 a feeling of discontent had been gradually growing amongst the native officers, and with an increase of their power the dangerous system of compelling British officers to enlist such men as they had nominated for service, commenced. This system continued to extend until each regiment had become, so to speak, the property of a few families; so that the seventy-four regiments of native infantry which composed the regular army were nothing more than so many family compacts, each governing its members with despotic sway. Gradually the influence of the native officer grew greater and greater, until it almost became compulsory upon commanding officers to place the nominees of the subahdars upon the strength of the regiment when vacancies occurred. However humiliating this system was to the dignity of the European officers, they were forced to acquiesce in it, in order that they might be enabled quietly to prosecute their regimental duties. Thus, by degrees, had the power of the native officers grown to be enormous, and a few of the most crafty of them succeeded in organizing the seventy-four regiments as so many distinct governments, each having for its object the aggrandisement of their own families. Both Hindoos and Mussulmans now perceived their unity and felt their strength, and they were soon persuaded by their officers into the belief that they were the proper persons to whom India belonged, and that absolute power within its boundaries was their undeniable right. Such was the kind of feeling cherished by the native army in relation to the British in 1856. It was an instrument ready for the use of any party or power who might be possessed of the courage to handle it. The king of Oude and the emperor of Delhi jointly made the attempt,—the result was the rebellion, not of the Hindoo masses, but of the better classes of Mussulmans, with the emperor of Delhi and his sons as leaders, carrying with them the sympathy of the whole Mussulman population on the one part, and the king of Oude and his Hindoo partisans on the other. In 1856, as we have said, the annexation of Oude was effected, and the royal family of that kingdom went to Calcutta to intrigue for its recovery. It was now that the tampering with the army commenced. The Mussulman portion of it had proceeded on the same plan as the Hindoos for managing their regiments, and the secret emissaries of the king of Oude found little difficulty in bringing them to act in concert with the Hindoos. The Mussulmans, however, had a scheme of their own in progress; but under other circumstances it would have required a longer time to mature it. The terms upon which the junction of the Hindoo and Mahometan were arranged were, it is said, specified in a treaty, offensive and defensive, entered into between the emperor of Delhi and the king of Oude, in which the boundaries of the territory each was to claim were clearly defined. The Hindoos were stimulated against the Christians because it was secretly affirmed that these had resolved to destroy their caste, and a passage of the Koran was quoted to rouse the hatred of the Mahometan. In that volume it was discovered that Mahomet had predicted, in a mysterious manner, that India would some day fall under the rule of a foreign power, whose sway would last only for a century. That power, as a matter of course, was construed to be the British, and the moulvies, computing from the battle of Plassy, which was fought on the 23rd of June, 1757, declared that the British rule in India would cease on the 23rd of June, 1857. This, then, imparted a religious aspect to the conspiracy in the Mahometan mind, and the 23rd of June was fixed as the day on which a general massacre of the Christians throughout India should take place. The first note of rebellion was sounded on the 18th of February by the 19th native infantry regiment at Berhampore, distant 125 miles from Calcutta. The watchword of forcible conversion to Christianity was raised, and aroused the mutinous spirit of the men. They refused to receive the cartridges about to be served out to them, resolutely affirming that they were made with cow's fat and hog's lard, and were thus objects of abomination to both Hindoos and Mussulmans. The government denied that either of these objectionable materials was used in the preparation of the cartridges, and insisted upon the sepoys receiving and using them. They refused to obey, and the regiment was ordered down to Barrackpore, sixteen miles from Calcutta, where they arrived soon after, when endeavours were again made, but ineffectually, to reduce the men to obedience. On the 31st of March the 34th native infantry regiment at Barrackpore also became mutinous, and on the day following, also the 19th; and both regiments were immediately disbanded. This impolitic, as well as unjust measure, of meeting the spirit of mutiny with the mild process of disbanding, went far to strengthen the general opinion entertained by the army, and by a large portion of the population, of the weakness or timidity of the government. It raised the hopes of the unmistructed sepoys to so inordinate a pitch, as to set at defiance all the attempts of their native officers to control them. The sepoys, believing they could at once accomplish the overthrow of the British government, set at defiance the suggestions of prudence. Their precipitation proved the safety of the British. The 23rd of June was the day fixed upon for a general rising of the troops and of the Mussulman population throughout India. Had the plans of the conspirators been carried out as intended, every Christian in India would have been destroyed, and they would have remained in ignorance of the fate that awaited them, until the knife was at their throats; but God had willed it otherwise. After the disbandment of the 19th regiment and the companies of the 34th, the progress of the mutiny extended to Meerut. On the 9th of May eighty-five men of the 3rd light cavalry were tried by a court-martial at this place for mutiny, and sentenced to imprisonment with hard labour in irons for ten years; a general parade of all the troops of the station was ordered, consisting of the 60th rifles, the carabineers, 3rd light cavalry, 11th and 20th regiments of native infantry, a light field-battery, and the horse-artillery. The carabineers, the rifles, and the horse-artillery were ordered to load; the European troops and artillery were duly placed in position; the mutineers were then brought on the ground, and had there been the least symptom of an insurrectionary movement on the part of the native troops, an effective fire would, it is said, have been opened upon them. The mutineers marched to the parade-ground in their uniforms, and were stripped of all their military accoutrements and clothes, and at once handed over to the civil power in irons, to work on the roads for ten years; yet, notwithstanding this severe example, the same night saw the destruction, by fire, of the entire military lines. On the following day, the 10th, all the native troops rose en masse, and having murdered a number of their officers, liberated the prisoners in the jail, between 1,500 and 2,000 of the most desperate characters of the district, and with them the eighty-five mutineers of the 3rd light cavalry, marched for Delhi, where they arrived the next day, and there fraternized with the troops. From that hour the rebellion became a great historical fact, and its leaders known.—This mutiny, the greatest on record, has called forth the energies of the British in a remarkable manner, and a new army has been levied, if not perfectly organized, as large as that which mutinied in 1857. At present the whole Indian force may be approximately estimated at the following figures:—British soldiers, 87,000; native troops, 188,000; native military police, trained and disciplined like regular troops, 97,000; total Europeans, 87,000; total natives, 285,000. In these figures the forces in Oude, Pegu, and Bengal proper are not included.—For further information respecting the incidents of the mutiny, and of India generally, see HINDOSTAN, LUCKNOW, CAWNPORE, DELHI, MEERUT, ALLAHABAD, &c.

AGRA, a celebrated city of Hindostan, the capital of the above province, and the seat of the British civil authority. It stands on the S.W. bank of the river Jumna, the houses being built of stone, and very lofty, but the streets so narrow as hardly to admit the passage of a carriage. It, however, contains many caravansaries, public baths, and mosques, though some of these, previous to the breaking out of the late mutiny, had been suffered to fall into decay. Within the last fifteen years government has expended a considerable amount upon public works: several court-houses, record-rooms, and revenue offices having been built, a new burial-ground laid out, and bridges and roads constructed. Up to November, 1847, the road to Bombay alone had cost upwards of thirteen lacs of rupees (£130,000). The Hindoo inhabitants hold this city in great veneration, from its being the place of the avatâra, or incarnation of Vishnu, under the name of Parasu Rama Pop. upwards of 100,000. Lat. 27° 12′ N. Lon. 78° 6′ E.—This city, which has attracted so much attention in the recent Indian mutiny, was nothing more than a village till the 16th century, when Sekunder Lody, the then reigning emperor, conferred upon it the rank of an imperial city, gave it the new name of Badulghur, and adopted it as the capital of his dominions. Half a century later, its name was changed to Akbarabad, by the emperor Akbar, who erected a magnificent palace in it. The splendour of this structure has been described as prodigious. Agra continued to be the seat of the Mogul government down to the reign of Shah Jehan, who, in 1647, transferred his court to Delhi, which thenceforth became the capital of the Mogul dominions. From this period it began to decline. Whilst it was the residence of Shah Jehan, however, he built a superb mausoleum, probably the most magnificent in the world, for his wife, the Begum Noor-Jehan. This structure was called the Táj Mahal, or crown of edifices, and cost £750,000. Here Shah Jehan himself rests beside the begum, at the distance of about three miles from the city. In 1784 Agra was taken by the Mahratta chief Madajee Scindia, but in 1803 it was besieged and captured by the British troops, under the command of Lord Lake. In the great mutiny of 1857, this city had to play its part. On the 4th of July, 10,000 of the rebels were defeated at Shahgunge, a village about six miles from the city, by 500 of the British, commanded by Captain D'Oyley, who received his death-wound as the action was nearly closed. On this occasion the number killed and wounded on the side of the British was 141. The number on the side of the enemy was considerable, although not correctly ascertained. This conflict has been called the battle of Agra.

AGRA, ai'-gra, a place of Bœotia, where the Ilissus rises. Diana was called Agræa, because she hunted there.—A city of Suza—of Arcadia, and Arabia.

AGRAGAS, or ACRAGAS, ăg'-ra-gas, a river and mountain of Sicily, near Agrigentum.

AGRAM, a'-gram, a fortified and well-built city of Austria, and the capital of the crown-land of Croatia. Manf. Principally silks and porcelain. It also has an active trade in tobacco, pigs, and wheat. Pop. 17,000. Lat. 45° 49' N. Lon. 16° 4' E.—The native name of Agram is Zagrab.

AGRAMONT, a'-gra-mont, a town of Spain, in Catalonia, 5 miles from Lerida.

AGRARIA LEX, a-grai'-re-a lex, was a law enacted to distribute among the Roman people all the lands which the Romans had gained by conquest. It was first proposed in the year of the city 267, by the consul Sp. Cassius Vicellinus, but it was rejected by the senate. This created dissensions between the senate and the populace, when Cassius offered to distribute among the people the money which was produced from the corn of Sicily, after it had been brought from there and sold in Rome. This act of liberality the people would not accept, and tranquillity was re-established. In two years afterwards the law was a second time proposed by the tribune Licinius Stolo, but with no better success, and so fierce were the tumults which followed, that one of the tribunes of the people was killed, and many of the senators fined for their opposition. In the year of the city 320, Mutius Scævola persuaded the tribune Tiberius Gracchus to bring it forward a third time, and though Octavius, his colleague in the tribuneship, opposed it, yet Tiberius got it passed into a law, after much altercation, and commissioners were authorized to make a division of the lands.—This law at last proved fatal to the freedom of Rome under Julius Cæsar.

AGRAULE, ă-graw'-le, a tribe of Athens.

AGRAULIA, ă-graw'-le-a, a festival at Athens, instituted in honour of Agraulos. The Cyprians also observed these festivals, and generally offered human victims at them.

AGRAULOS, ă-graw'-los, a daughter of Cecrops.—A surname of Minerva.

AGREDA, Marie d', ag'-re-da, superior of the convent of the Immaculate Conception at Agreda, in Spain, who pretended to have received directions in a vision to write the life of the Virgin Mary, which she accordingly did. B. 1602; took the veil, 1620; D. 1665.—Her "Life of the Virgin Mary" was not published till after her death, when it was prohibited at Rome, and censured by the Sorbonne of Paris, though highly esteemed in Spain.

AGRESTI, Livio, ag-res'-te, an historical painter, employed in the Vatican by Gregory XIII. D. 1580.

AGRESTIS, Julius, ă-gres'-tis, a Roman captain, who, when Antonius revolted to Vespasian, and laid in ruins the city of Cremona, obtained leave of the emperor to survey the state of the enemy's forces. He returned with a faithful report, but not being believed, he put an end to his life, A.D. 64.

AGREVE, ST., a'-graive, a town of France, in the Vivarais. Pop. 2,540.

AGRIANES, ă'-gre-ai'-nes, a river of Thrace.—A people that dwelt in the neighbourhood of that river.

AGRICOLA, Cnæus Julius, ă-grik'-o-la, a Roman commander, whose father, Julius Crœcinus, was an orator, put to death by Caligula for refusing to plead against Silanus. Agricola was carefully brought up by his mother Julia Procilla, and sent to Massilia (Marseilles), the chief seat of learning in Gaul, to pursue his studies. After entering the army, he was sent to Britain, where he was at the time of the insurrection of Boadicea, in A.D. 61. On his return to Rome, he married Domitia Decidiana, a lady of rank. He was next made quæstor of Asia, and became tribune of the people, and prætor under Nero. In the commotions between Otho and Vitellius, his mother was murdered, and her estate in Liguria plundered by the fleet of Otho. Being informed on his journey thither, that Vespasian had assumed the government, he espoused his cause. The 20th legion having mutinied in Britain, he was despatched to reduce it to obedience, in which he succeeded. On his return to Rome, he was raised to the rank of patrician, and made governor of Aquitania, in Gaul. In 77 he was chosen consul with Domitian; and, in the same year, gave his daughter in marriage to Tacitus, the historian. Next year he was appointed governor of Britain, where he restored tranquillity and brought the natives to a love of the Roman language and manners. He extended his conquests into Scotland, and built a chain of forts from the Clyde to the Frith of Forth, to prevent the incursions of the inhabitants of the north. He defeated Galgacus at the foot of the Grampian hills, and then made peace with the Caledonians. At the termination of this campaign, a Roman fleet for the first time sailed round Britain. On the accession of Domitian, Agricola had a triumph decreed him, and was recalled. By command of the emperor, he entered Rome at night, and meeting with a cold reception, he retired from public life. B. at Forum Julii, now Frejus, in Provence, A.D. 37: D. at Rome, A.D 93.—The character of Agricola, as drawn by Tacitus, represents him as a great and good man. He bequeathed what property he possessed to his wife Domitia, his only daughter, wife of Tacitus, and the emperor Domitian, albeit, it is asserted, that he fell a sacrifice by poison to the jealousy of the latter.

AGRICOLA, George, an eminent metallurgist and physician, who wrote a number of books on metals, &c. B. at Glauchen, Misnia, 1494; D. 1555.

AGRICOLA, George Andrew, a German physician, who wrote on the multiplication of plants and trees. B. at Ratisbon, 1672; D. 1738.—A French translation of his work was published in Amsterdam in 1720.

AGRICOLA, John, a German divine, who studied theology at Wittenberg, where he embraced the sentiments of Luther, and acquired considerable reputation as a preacher; but entered into a dispute with Melancthon on the use of the law under the gospel dispensation. With the bishop of Nuremberg and others, he made a vain attempt to reconcile the differences between the Protestants and Catholics. B. at Isleben, 1492; D. at Berlin, 1566.—He wrote commentaries on St. Luke, and made a collection of German proverbs.

AGRICOLA, Rodolphus, a learned writer, who was educated at Louvain, but settled at Ferrara, where he taught Latin with great reputation. Here he studied Greek, and attended the philosophical lectures of Theodore Gaza. In 1477 he returned to the Netherlands, and on visiting the city of Deventer saw Erasmus, who was then only ten years old, but who, he predicted, would be a great man. In 1482 Agricola settled in the Palatinate, giving occasional lectures at Heidelberg and Worms. B. at Baffilon, Baffel, or Baffilo, three miles from Groningen, Friesland, 1443; D. at Heidelberg, 1485. Agricola was the first who introduced the Greek language into Germany. His works were printed at Louvain in 1516, and at Cologne in 1539, 4to.

AGRICOLA, Michael, a Lutheran minister at Abo, in Finland, the first who translated the New Testament into the language of that country. D. 1556.

AGRIGENTUM, ă'-gre-jen'-tum, an ancient town of Sicily, situate about 2½ miles from the sea, on Mount Acragas. It was founded by a Rhodian colony, and by the Greeks was called Acragas, and by the Romans Agrigentum. Its situation is affirmed to be one of the most charming in Sicily. "At the foot of the high mountains which bound the plains of Acragas," says Wilkins in his "Magna Græcia," "a low ridge of hills extends from east to west. The southern side gently slopes towards the river, while the northern and western sides fall much more steeply towards the Hypsas, which still flows, though with a current much diminished Here stood the temple of Jupiter Olympus, which, with the exception of the temple of Ephesus, was the largest Greek building applied to religious purposes. Hardly a vestige of it remains." Here also was an artificial lake a mile in circumference, adorned with swans floating upon its surface, and well stocked with fish, which were eaten at the public entertainments. This has long since disappeared, and a garden supplies its place. The Agrigentines were a luxurious-living people. Empedocles, himself a native, observed that "they built as if they were to live for ever, and feasted as if they were to die on the morrow." The city passed through many vicissitudes, sometimes enjoying the highest prosperity, and sometimes suffering under the greatest adversity. In 406 B.C. it was reduced by Hamilcar, the Carthaginian general, and never completely recovered itself again. Pop. perhaps about 200,000, including slaves and foreigners. Diogenes Laertius, however, makes the population 800,000, which is considered a great exaggeration. Lat. 37° 17′ N. Lon. 13° 28′ E.

AGRIONIA, ăg-gre-o'-ne-a, annual festivals in honour of Bacchus, celebrated generally in the night. They were instituted, as some suppose, because the god was attended by wild beasts.

AGRIPPA, ă-grip'-a, a Bithynian astronomer, who was held in high estimation for the accuracy of his observations. Flourished in the 1st century.

AGRIPPA, Camille, a Milanese architect, who, during the pontificate of Gregory XIII., removed a vast obelisk to St. Peter's Square, of which he published an account at Rome, in 1583. Flourished in the 16th century.

AGRIPPA, Henry Cornelius, a French physician and astrologer of considerable learning and talent. He, being of a good family, became secretary to Maximilian I., by whom he was knighted for his bravery in the Italian wars, and afterwards created a doctor in law and physic. He travelled through various parts of Europe, and visited England, but in 1518 settled at Mentz, where he became a counsellor of the city; but having, by some indiscretion, drawn upon himself the enmity of the monks, he was compelled to quit that place, and seek a residence elsewhere. In 1520 we find him at Cologne, and in the year following, at Geneva. Francis I. now gave him the appointment of physician to his mother; but for not gratifying the curiosity of that lady in an astrological judgment, he received his dismissal. From France he went to Antwerp, and was taken into the service of Margaret of Parma, governor of the Low Countries. In 1535 he was at Lyons, where he was imprisoned for defaming the king's mother, his former mistress. B. at Cologne, 1486; D. at Grenoble, 1535.—Agrippa seems to have been emphatically a man born to many changes. He was either twice or thrice married, and had several children. He wrote a goodly number of works, but the one by which he is best remembered now, is that entitled "Vanity of the Sciences," which is a satire on the various kinds of learning in vogue during his age. All his works were collected and printed at Lyons in 1550, in three vols. 8vo. He also wrote, with a view of pleasing his first patroness, Margaret of Parma, a very ingenious and learned pamphlet to prove the superiority of woman over man, and makes good his argument by ample scriptural and physical references. A very excellent biography of this talented, but unfortunate, doctor, has been lately written by Mr. Henry Morley.

AGRIPPA I., Herod, grandson of Herod the Great, king of Judæa in the time of Augustus Cæsar. He was made by his grandfather governor of Tiberias, where he lived so extravagantly as to incur Herod's displeasure. He then went to Rome, and attached himself to Caius, the son of Germanicus, who succeeding Tiberius, made Agrippa tetrarch of Batanæa and Trachonitis; to which Claudius added the whole kingdom of Judæa, with that of Chalcis. In order to please the Jews, he now commenced to persecute the Christians, and put St. James the Apostle to death. Being soon after at Cæsarea, he instituted games in honour of the emperor Claudius, at which the Tyrians waited on him to sue for peace. Agrippa made a pompous appearance on his throne, and when he spoke, his flatterers exclaimed his voice was that of a god, which impious adulation he was weak enough to receive with pleasure. On this he was immediately smitten by the angel of the Lord with a disorder in his bowels. D. A.D. 44.

AGRIPPA II., Herod, son of the preceding, ascended the throne at the age of seventeen. This is the sovereign before whom St. Paul pleaded with so much eloquence that he exclaimed he had almost been persuaded to become a Christian. D. at Rome A.D. 94.

AGRIPPA, Marcus Vipsanius, the friend of Augustus; he accused Cassius to the senate, and distinguished himself greatly in the naval battle of Actium, by which Octavius obtained the empire. Previous to this, he had beaten the enemy at Mylæ and at Naulochus, on the coast of Sicily, and had completely broken the naval power of Sextus Pompeius. These victories procured him the reward of a naval crown, and he was, perhaps, the first who received that honour. He now rose to the highest dignities. In his third consulate he dedicated to Jupiter the Pantheon, which, to this day, is considered the most beautiful specimen of Roman architecture. It was erected to commemorate his victory near Actium, and is now called, from its form, Santa Maria della Rotondo, but it still bears the inscription, "M. Agrippa L. F. Costertum fecit." D. at Campania B.C. 12.—Agrippa was first married to Attica, daughter of Atticus, the friend of Cicero; and secondly to Julia, the daughter of the emperor, and the young widow of Marcellus. He had five children,—two by his first wife and three by his second, every one of whom, it has been observed, came to a premature end.

AGRIPPA, Menenius, a Roman consul, who is celebrated for having appeased a commotion among the Roman people by the fable of the belly and the limbs. D. in the year of the city 261.—He was buried at the public expense, and his daughters were so poor that the people gave them dowries, out of respect for the memory of their father.

AGRIPPINA, ăg-rip-e-na, the elder, was the wife of Germanicus Cæsar, whom she accompanied in his military expeditions, and when Piso poisoned him, she carried his ashes to Italy, and accused his murderer, who stabbed himself. She fell under the displeasure of Tiberius, who banished her to the island of Pandataria, where she starved herself to death, A.D. 33.—Four famous busts of this lady are in possession of the Cabinet of Antiquities at Dresden.

AGRIPPINA, the daughter of M. Agrippa and Marcella, and wife of the emperor Tiberius. She was much beloved by her husband, and it was with great reluctance that he divorced her, when obliged to marry Julia, the daughter of Augustus. Agrippina was afterwards married to Asinius Gallus, whom Tiberius, still retaining his affection for his former wife, condemned to perpetual imprisonment, in the spirit of a jealous rival.

AGRIPPINA, the younger, was the daughter of the preceding. After losing two husbands, she was married to her uncle Claudius, the emperor, whom she poisoned to make way for her son Nero. That monster caused her to be assassinated, and exhibited to the senate a list of all the infamous crimes of which she had been guilty. D. A.D. 59.—Agrippina was endowed with great natural gifts, but her ambition was boundless, and her disposition intriguing and dissolute. It is said that her son viewed her dead body with all the raptures of admiration, saying, that he never could have believed his mother was so beautiful. She left memoirs which assisted Tacitus in the composition of his Annals. The town built by her at the place where she was born, on the borders of the Rhine, and called Agrippina Colonia, is the modern Cologne.

AGRISOPE, ăg-ris'-o-pe, the mother of Cadmus.

AGRIUS, ag'-gre-us, the son of Parthaon, king of Ætolia, who deprived his brother Œneus of the crown. He was afterwards dethroned by Diomedes, the grandson of Œneus, upon which he killed himself.—One of Actæon's dogs.

AGROLAS, ăg'-ro-lăs, surrounded the citadel of Athens with walls, except that part which afterwards was repaired by Cimon.

AGRON, ag'-gron, a king of Illyria, who, after conquering the Ætolians, drank to such excess that he died instantly, 231 B.C.

AGEOPOLI, a-grop'-o-le, a town of Naples, 22 miles S.S.E. of Salerno.

AGROTERA, ăg-ro'-te-ra, an anniversary sacrifice of goats offered to Diana at Athens. It was instituted by Callimachus the Polemarch, who vowed to sacrifice to the goddess as many goats as there might be enemies killed in a battle which he was going to fight against the troops of Darius, who had invaded Attica. The quantity of the slain was so great, that a sufficient number of goats could not be procured: they were therefore limited to five hundred every year, till they equalled the number of Persians slain in the battle.

AGUA, Volcan de, a'-goo-a, a volcanic mountain of Central America, 25 miles S.W. of Guatemala. Its crater is 15,000 feet above the sea.

AGUADILLA, a-goo-a-de-la, a seaport town of the Antilles, in the island of Porto Rico, 65 miles W. of San Juan. Pop. about 3,000.

AGUAS CALIENTES, a'-goo-as cal-e-ain-tais, a city of Mexico, in the kingdom of New Galicia. Pop. about 8,000, chiefly Spanish. Noted for its warm springs. It is about 120 miles N.N.W. of Mexico.

AGUEDA, a'-goo'-ai-da, a river of Spain, in the province of Salamanca, falling into the Douro, and forming part of the frontier of Portugal on the N.E. of Beira.

AGUEIRA, a'-goo-air'-a, a small town of Portugal, in Beira, 21 miles E.N.E. of Lamego.

AGUESSEAU, Henry Francis d', a-gwes'-so, a chancellor of France, whose father was intendant of Languedoc, and devoted himself to the education of his son. In 1691 he was admitted advocate-general of Paris; and in 1700 was named procureur-general, in which he appeared to the greatest advantage, regulating those jurisdictions which were under the control of parliament, and preserving a strict discipline in the tribunals. He improved the proceedings in criminal matters, and introduced several excellent regulations; but what he plumed himself most upon was the administration of the hospitals. After the death of Louis XIV. the regent, duke of Orleans, appointed him chancellor; but in 1718 he was displaced, on account of his opposition to the financial system promulgated by John Law. In 1720 he had the seals restored to him, but two years afterwards he was again deprived of them. In 1737 he became once more chancellor, which office he held with the highest honour to himself and benefit to the nation till 1750, when infirmities obliged him to resign it. B. at Limoges, 1668. Died at Paris, 1751. His works make nine volumes quarto, and are held in great estimation. D'Aguesseau never passed a day without reading some portion of scripture, which he said was the balm of his life.—A statue of him was erected by Napoleon the Great in front of the Palais Législatif, and by the side of one erected in honour of L'Hôpital. According to Voltaire, Aguesseau was the most learned magistrate that France ever had.

AGUILAR, a'-goo-e-lar, a town of Spain, in the province of Cordova, 32 miles S. of Cordova. Pop. 600.

AGUILAR DE CAMPO, dai kam-po, a town of Spain, surrounded by ruined walls, in the province of Palencia. It stands on the Pisuerga, at about 60 miles from Palencia. Pop. 900.

AGUILAR DE CAMPOS, dai kam'-poss, a town of Spain, in the province of Valladolid, from which it is distant 35 miles. Pop. 800.

AGUILAR DE LA FRONTERA, dai la fron-tair'-a, a considerable town in Spain, situate on the Cabra, 22 miles from Cordova. It is distinguished for the salubrity of its air. Trade. Corn and wine. Pop. 12,000.

AGUILAS, a'-goo-e-lass, a Spanish town in the province of Murcia, on the Mediterranean. It is well built, and has a castle and fortress which it keeps garrisoned. It lies at a distance of 38 miles from Carthagena. Exp. Chiefly grain. Pop. 5,000.

AGUILLON, Francis, a-gwil'-on, a Flemish mathematician, of the order of Jesus, who produced a book on optics and spheric projections. B. 1556; D. at Seville, 1617.

AGUIRRA, Joseph, a'-goo-eer-ra, a Spanish Benedictine monk, who received a cardinalship from Innocent XI. B. 1630; D. at Rome, 1699.—He compiled a collection of the councils of Spain, in six vols. folio, and wrote some theological pieces.

AGUJARI, a'-goo-e-a-re, an Italian vocalist of great celebrity, who, for two songs a night, was engaged at a salary of £100 per night. D. at Parma, 1783.

AGULENITZA, a-goo'-le-nitz'-a, a Greek town in the Morea, 20 miles from Gastouni. Trade. Principally wine.

AGULHAS CAPE, Africa. (See CAPE COLONY.)

AGYLEE, or AGYLÆUS, Henry, a'-je-lai, a lawyer and general scholar, who translated the Nomocanon of Photius. B. at Bois-le-Duc, 1533; D. 1595.

AGYLEUS and AGYIEUS, ăj'-i-le'-us, ăj'-i-e'-us, from aguia, a street; a surname of Apollo, because sacrifices were offered to him in the public streets of Athens.

AGYLLA, ă-jil'-a, a town of Etruria, founded by a colony of Pelasgians, and governed by Mezentius when Æneas went to Italy. It was afterwards called Cære, by the Lydians, who took possession of it. It is now Cerveteri.

AGYLLÆUS, ăj-il-le'-us, a famous wrestler of Cleonæ, scarcely inferior in strength to Hercules, whose son he was said to be.

AGYRIUM, ă-jir'-e-um, a town of Sicily, where Diodorus the historian was born. The inhabitants were called Agyrinenses. It is now St. Filippo d'Argiro.

AGYRUS, ăj-i'-rus, a tyrant of Sicily, assisted by Dionysius against the Carthaginians.

AHAB, ai'-hab, king of Israel, and the son of Amri, whom he succeeded. He was married to Jezebel, whose wickedness instigated him to the commission of such acts of cruelty and idolatry, that he surpassed all his predecessors in impiety. He was slain by an arrow in a war with the Syrians, and his blood was licked by the dogs on the spot where he had caused Naboth to be murdered, about A.M. 3138.

AHADKOI, ă-hăd-koy, a village of Asiatic Turkey, in the province of Anatolia, 6 miles from Ellshak.—It contains some interesting remains, supposed to be those of the ancient Trajanopolis.

AHALA, ă-hai'-la, the surname of the Servilii at Rome.

AHANTA, ă-hăn-ta, a district on the Gold Coast of Africa, extending from the Ancobra to the Chaddah, bounded on the west by Apollonia and on the east by the Fantee territories. It is subject to the king of Ashantee, and has Boussao for its capital. It has three divisions,—Poho, Adoom, and Amanfoo, which, according to Bowditch, in his "Mission to Ashantee," abounds with fine gold. It is of no great extent, lying along the coast between Lon. 3° and 2° 10′ W., and occupying an inconsiderable space from north to south.

AHAR, a-har, a town of Persia, 60 miles from Tabriz. It numbers about 800 houses, and is partially encompassed by a dilapidated wall.

AHASCRAGH, ă-hăs-cra, a village and parish of Ireland, in Galway, 78 miles N.W. of Dublin. Pop. village and parish, 5,500.

AHASUERUS, ă-has-u-eer'-us, the Persian king whose decrees and extravagant mode of life are recorded in the book of Esther. He is called by Josephus Arthasastha, or Artaxerxes. The word Achashverosh has been applied to him as well as other Persian monarchs, because it means a noble, or excellent prince. It is doubtful whether he is the Artaxerxes Longimanus of the Greek historians; if so, his reign may be fixed to have commenced 465 B.C.

AHAVA, a-ha'-va, a river of Assyria or Babylon, where Ezra assembled the captives who were returning to Judæa.—Ezra viii. 15.

AHAZ, ai'-haz, king of Judah, who, at the beginning of his reign, defeated Rezin, king of Syria, according to the promise of Isaiah. Notwithstanding this, he abandoned the worship of God, fell into idolatrous practices, and became so impious that his body was not permitted to be buried in the royal sepulchres.—Reigned in the 8th century B.C.

AHAZIAH, ă-hă-zi'-ah, king of Israel. There are two kings of this name mentioned in Scripture: the first was the son of Ahab (1 Kings xxii.) and the other king of Judah. This last was slain by Jehu, 819 B.C.

AHDINGAR, a-din-gar, a town of Hindostan, on the Gogra, 40 miles S.S.E. of Goruckpore.

AHIAH, a-hi'-a, 'friend of Jehovah,' the son and successor of the high-priest Ahitub.

AHIEZER, a-hi-e'-zer, son of Ammishaddai, and hereditary chief of the tribe of Dan, who came out of Egypt at the head of his tribe, consisting of 72,000 men.

AHIJAH, a-hi'-ja, the prophet who dwelt at Shiloh, and spoke twice to Solomon from the inspiration of God. He wrote the history of Solomon's life.—Another who was the father of Baasha, king of Israel.

AHIMAAZ, a-him'-a-az, 'brother of anger,' the son of Zadok, and high-priest of Solomon. He rendered great service to David in his war with Absalom. Flourished in the 10th century B.C.

AHIMAN, a-hi'-man, a giant of the race of Anak, who with his brethren, Sheshai and Talmai, was driven out of Hebron when Caleb took that city.—Josh. xv. 14.

AHIMELECH, a-him-e'-lek, 'brother of the king,' the son of Ahitub, and the successor of Ahiah in the priestship of the time of David.

AHIO, a-hi'-o, 'brotherly,' he who, with his brother Uzzah, brought the ark to Jerusalem, from the house of Abinadab.

AHIOLO, or AKHIOLO, a'-he-o-lo, a seaport town of European Turkey, about 50 miles from Varna. It stands on the Black Sea, and is in the province of Roumelia. It trades in salt, which it obtains from some springs in its vicinity.

AHIRA, a-hi'-ra, chief of Naphtali, who came out of Egypt, at the head of 53,400 men.

AHITOPHEL, a-hit'-o-fel, 'brother of foolishness,' a native of Gillo, and the friend of David until the rebellion of Absalom, whose cause he espoused, and who, on foreseeing the probable issue of its failure, hanged himself to avert the certainty of a more ignominous death. B.C. 1023.

AHLEN, a'-len, a town of Suabia, 40 miles N.W. of Augsburg. Manf. Linen cloth. It also possesses some oil-mills and distilleries. Pop. 2,500.

AHLTEN, al'-ten, a town of Hanover, on the Aller, 7 miles from Hanover. It has an ancient castle. Pop. 1,000.

AHLWARDT, Peter, al'-vart, a learned German, who, from being the son of a shoemaker, rose to be professor of logic and metaphysics in his native place. B. at Griefswalde, 1710; D. 1791.—He wrote "On the Human Understanding," "The Immortality of the Soul," and "Thoughts on Thunder and Lightning." He was also the founder of the Abelite Society, which had for its object the promotion of sincerity.

AHMED BEN FARES, a'-med ben fair'-es, an eminent lawyer and lexicographer of Arabia, who was also named El Razi. Lived in the 10th century.

AHMED BEN MOHAMMED, a'-med ben mo'-ham-ed, a Moorish poet of Spain, whose effusions partook of the oriental style. He wrote historical annals of Spain. Flourished in the 10th century.

AHMED KHAN, a'-med kan, successor of Abaka Khan, and the first of the Moguls who professed Mahometanism, which gave great offence to his family. He was conspired against by his courtiers, who set up in his stead Argoun, his nephew. Put to death A.D. 1284.

AHMED RESMY HAJI, a'-med res'-me haj'-e, chancellor to the Sultan Mustapha III.

AHMED SHAH EL ABDALY, a'-med sha el ăb'-dă-le, the founder of the kingdom of Cabul and Candahar. He was a great warrior, and broke the power of the Mahrattas, by defeating them in the battle of Paniput, on the 7th January, 1761. In the latter part of his life he was engaged in continual warfare with the Sikhs, but ended his days the sovereign of an empire which he had conquered, and which extended from Sirhind on the east, to Herat on the west, and from the mouths of the Indus and the Arabian Sea on the south, to the banks of the Oxus and Cashmere on the north. D. 1773.

AHMEDABAD, a'-mai-da-bad', a district of British India, in the Bombay presidency, at the head of the Gulf of Cambay. Area, 4,356 square miles. Pop. 650,000.

AHMEDABAD, the 'abode of Ahmed,' capital of the above district. This city is situate in the province of Gujerat, and stands on the Sabermatty, 120 miles N. of Surat. Pop. about 100,000. Lat. 23° N. Lon. 72° E. —The magnificence of this city was considerable in former times, but an earthquake in 1822 nearly destroyed it. Sufficient of it remains, however, to bear testimony to its original grandeur, being six miles in circumference and defended by a massive wall. Here are to be seen the mosque and tomb of Ahmed, both remarkable for their splendour and costliness. It has hitherto been the head-quarters of the northern division of the Bombay army.

AHMEDNUGGUR, a'-med-nug'-ur, a district of British India, in the presidency of Bombay. It is bounded on the north by Candeish, on the south by Poona, on the east by the Nizam's territories, and on the west by Concan. Area, 9,931 square miles. Pop. 670,000.

AHMEDNUGGUR, the capital of the above district, standing on the Seena, 64 miles N. of Poonah. Pop. estimated at 20,000.—This city, like many more of the cities of India, is encompassed by a wall, and stands at a distance of about half a mile from the fort, which is constructed of stone and occupied by a British garrison. In its vicinity there is still to be seen a splendid palace of its former native princes. It was taken by the British under General Wellesley, August 12th, 1803, and is now the head station of a military, civil, and judicial establishment of Europeans.

AHMEDPOOR, a'-med-poor, a town of Hindostan, in the province of Orissa, 34 miles S. of Cuttack.

AHMEDPOOR Barra, or 'great,' another Indian town, 30 miles S.W. of Bhawlpoor. It has a large mosque and a fort, but is very meanly built. Manf. Cottons, silks, and scarfs; gunpowder and matchlocks. Pop. about 20,000.

AHMEDPOOR Chula, or 'little,' another town in Bhawlpoor, inclosed by a mud wall, on which are mounted a few cannon. It is near the Indus.—Another in the presidency of Bengal, 11 miles S. of Juggernaut.

AHUN, a'-hoon, a town of France, department of the Creuse, 11 miles S. of Guéret. In its neighbourhood are some extensive coal-mines. Pop. 2,500.—Formerly this was a place of some importance, and it still possesses a few interesting remains of the ancient Agedunum.

AHUS, or AHUIS, a'-hoos, a Swedish maritime town, 9 miles from Christianstadt, on the Baltic Sea. It stands at the mouth of the Helgeo, has a good harbour, and is the port of Christianstadt.

AHWAZ, a-waz, a town of Persia, standing on the Karum, 40 miles S. of Shuster. It has some vestiges of antiquity, interesting to the archæologist.

AI, ai-i, a city standing to the east of Bethel, noted as the scene of the defeat of Joshua, and his subsequent victory.—Josh. vii. 2-5, viii. 1-29.

AIAH, ai-i'-a, the concubine of Saul and mother of Rizpah. Her children were given up by David to the Gibeonites, to be hanged before the Lord.

AIAS, or AJASSO, ai-as, a seaport of Asiatic Turkey, in a bay of the Mediterranean, called the Gulf of Ajasso, 30 miles N. of Scanderoon.

AIASALUK, ai-as'-a-look, a village of Anatolia, Asia Minor, one mile from the ruins of Ephesus, out of which it has been raised. It retains the indications of former greatness, in a fine mosque, an aqueduct, and a fortress.

AICH, eishk, a small river of Wirtemberg, falling into the Neckar, not far from Groningen.

AICHACH, or AICHA, eish'-ak, a town of Upper Bavaria, on the river Par, 12 miles E.N.E. of Augsburg. Pop. 1,600.

AIDAN, ai'-dan, a British bishop, who successfully proselytized the people of the northern parts of England to Christianity. He was bishop of Lindisfarne, or Holy Island, in Northumberland, and a prelate of exemplary piety. Flourished in the 7th century.

AIDIN, ai'-din, a town of Asiatic Turkey, situate in the valley of the Meander, 70 miles from Smyrna. It is one of the termini of the Smyrna and Aidin Railway, now constructing, which is the first line that has been laid down in Turkey. Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, in returning from the East, was delayed at Smyrna, where on the 30th October, 1858, he laid, amidst an immense concourse of spectators, the foundation-stone of the station. Hitherto the traffic between Aidin and Smyrna has been carried on chiefly by camels, 5,000 of which, during the busy season, arrived daily at Smyrna, laden with fruit, &c.

AIDINJIK, ai'-din-jik, a town of Anatolia, Asia Minor, 60 miles from Brussa. It consists of about 500 houses, has six mosques and some relics of the ancient Cyzicus.

AIELONE, a'-ai-lon, a Sicilian town, 35 miles S. of Catania. Pop. 4,000.

AIELOS, ai'-e-los, a town of Roumelia, European Turkey. It has extensive ruins, and is situate on a river of the same name, at the foot of the Balkan, about 75 miles N. of Adrianople.

AIGLE, ai'-gl, a town of Switzerland, 21 miles from Lausanne. It has quarries of black marble. Pop. 2,000.

AIGLE, L', lai'-gl, a town of France, situate on the river Rille, which divides it into three parts. It is in the department of Orne, at about 80 miles W.S.W. from Paris. In the middle of the town is a castle built of brick, and surrounded by large lime-trees of great beauty. Manf. Cotton, linen, paper, cutlery, hardware, and leather. It has a good trade in cider, wood, and corn. It has also a reputation for producing large quantities of pins and needles. Pop. 6,000.—In its vicinity are the mineral waters of St. Santin.

AIGLE, L', a cape between Toulon and Marseilles.

AIGLE, L', a small island formed by the confluence of the St. Lawrence with the Rivière des Prairies, which forms the southern boundary of the island of Montreal, Lower Canada.

AIGNAN, ain'-yong, a town of France, in the department of Gers. Pop. 2,610.

AIGNAN, ST., a town of France, in the department of Loire-et-Cher, on the banks of the Cher, and 50 miles S.W. of Orleans. Manf. Gun-flints, of which about 40,000,000 are annually produced. The quarries of Meusne and Couffy are in its vicinity, and are the only flint-quarries worked in France. Cloth, saltpetre, and earthenware are also made, and it trades in wood and wine. Pop. 3,500.—Another, 38 miles from Mayence. Pop. 600.

AIGNAN, Stephen, an ardent French republican, a member of the French Academy, and a writer of considerable ability. At the early age of 19 his revolutionary zeal obtained him a situation of responsibility in the district of Orleans, and subsequently several official appointments under the régime of Napoleon I. B. 1773; D. 1825.—As an author, he is known by some poetical pieces and several dramas, and also by translations of the works of Pope and Goldsmith.

AIGNEAUX, Robert and Anthony, ain'-yo, two brothers, who composed some poems, and translated into French verse the works of Horace and Virgil. Flourished in the 16th century.

AIGUE-PERSE, aig'-pairse, a town of France, in Auvergne, which may be considered as no more than a single street along the river Beuron. Pop. about 3,000.—Another in the district of Villefranche, in the department of the Rhone. Pop. about 1,000.

AIGUES-MORTES, aig'-morts, a decayed town of France, situate near the mouths of the Rhone, at the junction of the canal de Beaucaire with that of Etangs. It is an unhealthy situation, although it forms an important military position for the defence of the coast on which it stands. Manf. Potash, and a trade is done in both fresh and salt fish. Pop. 4,000.—This town was founded in 1248, by St. Louis of France, who, in that year, embarked for the Crusades from this place. The walls and gates are still entire, but there is no trace of the ancient fosse remaining. At no great distance are the celebrated salt-lakes of Peccais, which yield salt of fine quality to the annual amount of £60,000.

AIGUILLE, L', laig'-oo-we, 'the needle,' a mountain of France, formerly held as one of the seven wonders of Dauphiny. It rises to a height of 6,562 feet above the level of the sea, nearly four miles from the town of Corps, on the left of the great road from Grenoble to Gap. Having been long supposed inaccessible, it is called Mons Inaccessus; but on Charles VIII. undertaking his expedition to Naples, he passed Grenoble, and sent the captain of his echeleurs to endeavour to reach the summit, in which he succeeded, 1492.

AIGUILLON, ai-gwil'-ong, a town of France, at the confluence of the Lot and Garonne, in Guienne, 6 miles from Agen. It was anciently a place of considerable strength, and has still two castles. Pop. 4,000.

AIJERBANGIS, ai'-jer-bang'-is, a town on the W. coast of the island of Sumatra. Also the capital of a district of the same name, 30 miles S.E. of Natal.

AIKIN, John, M.D., ai'-kin, an eminent physician, but more distinguished as a popular author. He was the only son of the Rev. John Aikin, D.D., for many years a tutor of divinity at a dissenting academy at Warrington, Lancashire. After finishing his studies at the university of Edinburgh, he became a pupil of Dr. William Hunter, and first settled as a surgeon at Chester. Thence he practised in Warrington, and ultimately succeeded in establishing himself in the metropolis of England. Here, with his sister, Mrs. Barbauld, he pursued literature with considerable success, producing several works, which aimed at making science popular amongst those classes who, without such works, would, in all probability, have never entered upon scientific studies of any kind. His "Evenings at Home" still commands a wide reputation, and is decidedly the most useful of all Dr. Aikin's works. To this, which extended to six volumes, Mrs. Barbauld contributed, but not to a greater extent than about half a volume. His "Natural History of the Year" is another work which has enjoyed considerable popularity. B. 1747; D. at Stoke Newington, 1822.

AIKIN, Arthur, eldest son of the above, inherited much of his father's literary talent, but chiefly applied himself to scientific pursuits. He was for several years editor of the "Annual Review," and in 1814 contributed to science a "Manual of Mineralogy." He also produced a "Dictionary of Arts and Manufactures," and another of "Chemistry and Mineralogy." B. 1784; D. in Bloomsbury, 1854.—Besides being the author of the above, Mr. Aikin was a large contributor to scientific journals, and was, for several years, the resident secretary to the Society of Arts.

AIKIN, Edmund, an architect, who wrote an account of St. Paul's Cathedral. D. 1820.

AIKMAN, William, aik'-man, a Scotch painter, was the only son of William Aikman, Esq., of Cairney, advocate, by Margaret, sister of Sir John Clerk, of Pennycuik, bart. He was intended for the profession of the law, but his passion for the fine arts was so great that he determined to cultivate it. Accordingly, he relinquished the law and applied himself assiduously to painting. After studying three years in Italy, he visited Turkey; thence he went to Rome, whence, after a short stay, he came back to England, and found a patron in the duke of Argyle. He excelled most in portrait-painting. B. 1682; D. 1731.

AIKTON, aik'-ton, a parish in Cumberland, 8 miles S. of Carlisle. Area, 5,270 acres. Pop. 900.

AILAH, ai'-la, a town of Arabia Petræa, on an arm of the Red Sea, 103 miles E. of Suez. Lat. 28° 55′ N. Lon. 40° 5′ E.—This town is the Eloth and Elath of the Scriptures. It was a seaport of the Edomites, from whom David took it; and hence Solomon sent ships to Ophir. It is now in a ruinous state.

AILLY, Peter d', dai'-le, a bishop of Cambray, and a zealous champion of popery. He presided at the council of Constance, where he condemned John Huss to the stake. Pope John XXIII. created him a cardinal. B. at Compiègne, 1350; D. 1420.

Ailly-sur-Somme, ai'-le-soor-som', a town of France, 3 leagues N.W. of Amiens. Pop. about 1,000.

Ailsa Craig, ail'-sa craig, an insulated basaltic rock, which forms an imposing object at the entrance of the Frith of Clyde. Height, 1,098 feet. Lat. 55° 15′ 2″ N. Lon. 5° 7′ W.—This rock is included in the county of Ayr, Scotland, and is the abode of thousands of birds—gulls and others. In passing it, the captains of steamers and sailing vessels frequently fire a gun, which, alarming the inhabitants of the craig, causes them to rise in countless swarms, presenting a mass which darkens the light of day.

Aimargues, ai-marg, a town of France, 12 miles from Nimes. Pop. 2,800.

Aime, aim, a Sardinian village, in the province of Tarantasia, 9 miles from Montiero. Pop. 900.—This is the Forum Claudii of the Romans.

Aimon, ai'-mong, a French Benedictine, who wrote a history of France, to be found in the third volume of Duchesne's collection. B. at Villefranche, in the province of Perigord. D. 1008.

Aimylus, ai-mi'-lus, son of Ascanius, was, according to some, the progenitor of the noble family of the Æmylii in Rome.

Ain, ăng, a river of France, rising near Nozeroy, in the Jura mountains, falling into the Rhone 18 miles above Lyons.

Ain, a department of France, which is formed out of the ancient districts of Bresse, Bugey, Dombes, and Valromey. It is bounded on the N. by Jura and Saône-et-Loire, on the E. by Switzerland and Savoy, on the W. by the departments of the Saône-et-Loire and the Rhone, and on the S. by the department of Isère. It has a length of about 54 miles, running north and south, and an average width of about 52 miles. Area, 2,224 square miles. Desc. In the northern and eastern divisions the mountainous scenery of Switzerland prevails in a lesser degree, the slopes being crowned with firs, and the valleys clothed with rich verdure, and yielding corn of all kinds, with fruits, amongst which the grape holds a prominent place. In the southern parts of the western division, the country is a dead flat, marshy, and full of ponds and lakes. In this region the ponds are so numerous as to cover a space of 50,000 acres. Climate. Variable. Pro. Corn, fruit, potatoes, hay, some hemp, and flax. The mulberry is cultivated as the food of the silkworm, some silk being produced here. Bees are generally kept, and in the east the rearing of sheep is extensively carried on. Goats are common, and mules and oxen are employed in the plough. Forests. These generally consist of the beech, the fir, and the oak. Wild Animals. Wolves, bears, foxes, wild cats,—and the boar is sometimes met with. Birds. In the neighbourhood of the lakes and ponds, ducks, geese, swans, cranes, storks, herons, and cormorants, are abundant. Towns. The principal are Bourg, Belley, Nantua, Gex, and Trevoux. Manf. Comparatively few, consisting of woollen cloths, hempen, cotton, and silk fabrics; paper, clocks, watches, leather, bricks, pottery, horn combs, and an inferior description of cutlery. Pop. about 400,000. Lat. between 45° 35′ and 46° 30′ N. Lon. between 4° 40′ and 6° 55′ E.

Ain, a country of Africa. (See Asben.)

Ainstable, ain'-sta-bel, a parish in Cumberland, 12 miles from Penrith. Area, 4,120 acres. Pop 600.

Ainsty, ain'-ste, a district in the West Riding of Yorkshire, annexed, in the time of Henry VI., to the jurisdiction of the city of York. Area, about 50,000 acres. Pop. 10,000.—The line of the Great Northern Railway runs through it.

Ainsworth, Henry, ainz'-worth, an ingenious and learned commentator on the Bible, who from a follower of the founder of the Brownists became an Independent, and proceeded to Amsterdam, where he grew so popular as to gather a congregation for himself. Quarrelling with some of the members of his church, he left them and went to Ireland for a time, but once more returned to Amsterdam. Flourished in the 17th century.—He is said to have been poisoned by a Jew, who had lost a diamond of great value, which was found by Ainsworth; and when the Jew offered him any reward, he only requested to have a conference with some of the rabbis on the prophecies respecting the Messiah. This the Jew promised to obtain for him, but being unable to accomplish it, he administered to him a deadly drug. Ainsworth was well versed in the Hebrew, and his commentary on the Pentateuch is both curious and valuable.

Ainsworth, Robert, a learned lexicographer, who was educated at Bolton, Lancashire, where he afterwards kept a school. Thence he removed to London, where, for many years, he followed the same profession. B. at Woodgate, Lancashire, 1660; D. in London, 1745. —He printed "A short Treatise of Grammatical Institution;" but he is best known by his "Dictionary, Latin and English," 4to and 8vo, in the compilation of which he spent twenty years.

Ainsworth, W. H., a writer of popular novels and romances, who first obtained notoriety by selecting for his heroes such characters as Jack Sheppard and Dick Turpin, noted robbers and highwaymen. Some of his later productions, however, as "Windsor Castle," "The Star Chamber," and "The Tower of London," exhibit heroes of a different kind.

Aintab, or Antab, aint'-tab, or ant'-tab, a town of Syria, about three miles in circumference, situate in a valley between two hills, and partly on them. The river Sejour runs by it. On the north side there is a castle garrisoned, and on the south an extensive cemetery, which has the appearance of being large suburbs. The town is inhabited by Mahometans, Armenians, and Greeks, and contains a church and several mosques. The chief trade is in coarse stamped calicoes, and various coloured woollens; also leather and raw hides; and skins are dyed red and yellow, into what is called Turkey leather. Pop. 20,000. Lat. 37° 1′ N. Lon. 37° 26′ E.—This town was in 1400 taken by Tamerlane, and in 1839 by Hafiz Pasha, shortly before the battle of Nizib.

Airaines, air'-aine, a town and district of France, 16 miles from Amiens. Pop. 2,061.

Airasca, air-a'-se-a, a Sardinian town in Piedmont, 5 miles from Pinerolo. Pop. 2,000.

Airay, Henry, air'-ai, an English divine, who from a fellow of Queen's College, Oxford, was, in 1600, elected provost; and in 1606 served the office of vice-chancellor. B. in Westmoreland, 1560; D. 1616.—He was a rigid Calvinist, and wrote a few theological pieces.

Airay, Christopher, a divine related to the above, who had the living of Milford, in Hampshire. D. 1678. —He wrote a few pieces in Latin and English.

Aird, Thomas, aird, an original poet of considerable power, a contributor to periodical literature, and author of the "Old Bachelor in the Old Scottish Village," "Religious Characteristics," and "The Devil's Dream," a poem pronounced "a wonderful piece of weird, supernatural imagination." He was editor of the "Edinburgh Weekly Journal," "The Dumfries Herald," and of an edition of the poems of Dr. Moir, the "Delta" of Blackwood's Magazine. B. at Bowden, Roxburghshire, 1802.

Airdrie, air'-dre, a town of Scotland, in the county of Lanark, consisting chiefly of one street a mile long. It has manufactures of cotton, and in its neighbourhood are large iron-works. 11 miles to the E. of Glasgow. Pop. about 15,000.

Airds, the, airds, a district in Argyleshire, Scotland. It lies between lochs Creran and Linnhe, and is remarkable for the grandeur of its scenery.

Aird's-Moss, airds-moss, a moorland tract between the rivers Ayr and Lugar, in Ayrshire, Scotland.—At its eastern extremity Cameron the Covenanter fell in 1680, and a monument is erected to his memory on the spot.

Aire, air, a river of England, in Yorkshire, which falls into the Ouse near Howden.

AIRE, a town of France, in the department of the Landes, on the Adour, 65 miles S. of Bordeaux. It is built on the declivity of a mountain. Pop. 5,009. Lat 43° N. Lon. 0° 16′ W.—This town was the capital of the Visigoths.

AIRE, or ARIEN, a strong town of France, department of the Pas de Calais, on the river Lys, 22 miles S. of Dunkirk, communicating with St. Omer by a canal from the river Aa. Pop. 9,009.—This town was taken by the duke of Marlborough, after a vigorous defence, in 1710.

AIREY, Sir Richard, air′-e, a brigadier-general engaged in the Crimea during the Russian war of 1854.

AIRLIE, air′-le, a parish in Forfarshire, Scotland, 8 miles W. of Forfar. Area, 6,000 acres, nearly all in a state of high cultivation. Pop. 900.—The beautiful ballad which celebrates "The Bonnie House o' Airlie" refers to the seat of the Ogilvies, which was destroyed in 1640, and which was in this parish.

AIROLA, air′-o-la, an Italian town 23 miles N. of Naples. Pop. 4,600.

AIROLE, air′-ol, a town in the province of St. Remo, Piedmont. Pop. 1,500.

AIROLO, air′-o-lo, a Swiss village 26 miles from Bellinzona, on the south side of Mont St. Gothard. Pop. 500.—On the 13th September, 1799, a battle was fought here between the French and the Russians, in which the latter were the victors, forcing the St. Gothard pass.

AIRON, air′-ong, a river of France, department of the Nièvre, which falls into the Loire.

AIRTH, airth, a small town of Scotland, in the county of Stirling, on the Forth, having an inconsiderable harbour, and about 3 miles from Stirling. Pop. 1,590.

AIRVAUX, air′-vo, a town of France, in the department of the Deux Sèvres, 23 miles N. of Parthenay, on the Thouet. Manf. Woollen stuffs. Pop. 2,000.

AIRY, George Biddell, air′-e, the present astronomer-royal, is by birth a Northumbrian. After being educated at several private schools, he entered Trinity College, Cambridge, as a sizar, at the age of 18. He took his degree of B.A., and in his 22nd year became a senior wrangler. In 1824 he was elected fellow of the college, and in 1826 was appointed to the Lucasian chair. Whilst holding this appointment, he delivered a course of admirable lectures in experimental philosophy. In 1828 he was chosen for the Plumian professorship of astronomy, for which he resigned his former appointment. He now earnestly devoted himself to astronomical studies, and in 1835, on the resignation of Mr. Pond, he had the honourable office of astronomer-royal conferred upon him. In this position he has been enabled to labour successfully for the advancement of science, and through his exertions the Greenwich Observatory stands second to none in the world. Mr. Airy has written much upon mechanics and optics; and has had his great abilities honourably recognized by various scientific societies. In 1828 he became a fellow of the Astronomical Society, and in 1835 was elected its president. In 1836 he was elected a fellow of the Royal Society, and is a member of various other scientific societies both in Europe and America. B. at Alnwick, 1801.—Mr. Airy has received two of the medals of the Astronomical Society, one for his "planetary observations," and the other for his "discovery of the inequality of Venus and the Earth." He has also received the Copley, and the Royal medals of the Royal Society, and the Lalande medal of the French Academy of Sciences.

AISLINGEN, ai′-sling-en, a town of Bavaria, 4 miles S. of Dillingen.

AISNE, aine, a department of France, consisting of portions of the Isle de France, Champagne, and Picardy, bounded on the N. by the department of Nord and the province of Hainault, W. by Oise and Somme, S. by Marne and Seine-et-Marne, and E. by Ardennes. Area, 2,840 square miles. Desc. Consisting chiefly of extensive plains undulated by numerous hills, which in no instance rise higher than 400 feet, except in the case of one whereon stands the city of Laon, which is nearly 600 feet above the level of the sea. The department is traversed by many canals and roads, twelve of the latter being supported by the state, and twenty-nine by the department. Climate. Temperate and healthy. Pro. Corn, fruit, hay, flax, and hops. In the lands which stretch along the Oise, horned cattle, sheep, and horses are reared in goodly numbers. Large quantities of artichokes and leguminous plants are grown in the district of Laon, whilst the hills of Marne are mostly planted with the vine. Forests. Extensive: those of Coucy, Samoussy, and Villequier occupy 60,000 acres; those of Retz and Villers-Cotterets, 30,000; and those of La Fère, Dole, and Ris, are still larger. The trees of which they mostly consist, are the beech, the plane, the oak, the poplar, and the birch. Towns The principal are St. Quentin, Vervins, Laon, Soissons, and Château-Thierry. Manf. Considerable. In and around St. Quentin, the population are supported by the production of muslins, fine cotton tissues of all kinds, linens, and Cashmere shawls. At Folembray, glass, decanters, and mirrors are made; and in other parts, hosiery, cotton twist, soap, paper, pottery, tiles, bricks, nails, &c. occupy the inhabitants. A good deal of beer and cider are made, and there are many beetroot-sugar factories. Of flour-mills there are upwards of 1,000, and a large corn-market is held in St. Quentin. Pop. over 600,000. Lat. between 48° 50′ and 50° N. Lon. between 2° 56′ and 4° 12′ E.

AISNE, a considerable river of the above department, joining the Oise near Compiègne. In length it is about 170 miles, 80 of which are navigable.

AISONE, ai′-zo-nai, an Italian town in the province of Cuneo, Piedmont. Pop. 1,200.

AISTULPH, or ASTOLPHUS, ais′-tulf, king of the Lombards, who succeeded his brother Rachis in 750. The commencement of his reign was signalized by his making an inroad on the territories of the Roman see; but Pepin, king of France, besieged him in Pavia, and compelled him to restore all the places he had taken. The treaty which had been entered into was afterwards violated by Astulph, who again invaded the Roman states. Pepin once more came to the assistance of the pope, and Aistulph retired to Pavia, where he was forced to sue for peace. He was killed in hunting, 756.

AIT, or EYOT, ait, signifies a small island in a river, as Twickenham Ait.

AITHSTING, aith′-sting, a maritime parish of Shetland, joined to Sandsting on the mainland, with a bay affording good anchorage. Pop. 2,800.

AITON, ai′-ton, an Italian town, in the province of Moriano, Piedmont. Pop. 1,200.

AITON, William, ai′-ton, a Scotch common gardener, who coming to London to seek employment, obtained it, and became superintendent of the botanical garden at Kew, which he greatly improved, and in 1783 was appointed to manage also the pleasure and kitchen gardens. B. near Hamilton, Lanark, 1731; D. 1793.—In 1789 he published his "Hortus Kewensis." King George III. appointed his son to succeed him in both his places.

AITRACH, ai′-trak, a tributary stream of the Iller.

AITZEMA, Leo, ait′-ze-ma, a resident representative of the Hanse Towns at the Hague, who became eminent as an historian. B. at Dorkum, Friesland, 1600; D. 1669.—His "History of the United Provinces" is written in Dutch, and extends to fifteen vols. 4to. It has been continued down to 1692 and published.

AIUS LOCUTIUS, ai′-yus lo-ku′-she-us, a deity to whom the Romans erected an altar on account of a supernatural voice having given Rome warning of its being about to be attacked by the Gauls. This divinity is ridiculed by Cicero.

AIX, aiks, an ancient city of France, formerly the capital of Provence, now in the department of the Mouths of the Rhone. It is built in a plain on the right bank of the Arc, 17 miles N. of Marseilles. Pop. 30,000.—Aix was founded by Caius Sextus Calvinus, a Roman general, 120 years before the Christian era, and received the name of Aquæ Sextæ, from its famous springs. On the adjoining plain, near Mont Victoire, Marius gained a complete victory over the Teutons, considerably improved the town and built aqueducts to supply its inhabitants with water. Cæsar colonized it with a draught from his 25th legion, and in A.D. 450 it escaped being ravaged by the Visigoths through the intercession of an archbishop of the name of Basilius. It was subsequently sacked by the Saracens, but was rebuilt in 796. Under the counts of Provence, it grew into a place of great importance, and about the beginning of the 13th century became the arena of the poetical contests of the troubadours. This gave it a literary celebrity, and tournaments which were held here in the reign of King René, filled it with strangers from all parts of Europe. Shortly after the death of Charles III., it was united to the crown of France, when it became the seat of the Provençal parliament. In the reign of Francis I. it was plundered by the Marseillais, and in 1535 seized by Charles V., who was here crowned king of Arles. It is still regarded as the literary and artistic capital of Provence, and its churches and cathedrals enjoy an architectural celebrity. The territory in which it stands is famous for the olive-oil which is produced from it. Five miles from Aix is the splendid aqueduct Roquefavour, 1,300 feet long and 270 feet high, carrying the canal of the Durance over the valley of the Arc.

Aix, a town of Savoy, 12 miles N. of Chamberry, noted for warm baths. It is situate in a fertile and beautiful valley, near the Lake of Bourget, and has many remains of antiquarian interest. Pop. 3,500.

Aix, a small island off the west coast of France, about equidistant from Rochefort and Rochelle. It is memorable from its being the last spot of French soil on which Napoleon Bonaparte stood, just prior to his embarkation on board the Bellerophon, July 15th, 1815. Its situation is about 14 miles N.W. of Rochefort, and it contains works for military culprits. Pop. 300.

Aix d'Anguillon, les, lais aiks dan'-gu-e-long, a town of France, department of the Cher.

Aixe, aiks, a town of France, department of Upper Vienne, 6 miles S. of Limoges. Pop. 3,000.

Aix-en-Othe, aiks'-on-ote, a town of France, in Champagne, department of the Aube, 15 miles from Troyes. Manf. Cotton twist. Pop. 2,500.

Aix-la-Chapelle, aiks'-la-sha-pel', which in German is called Aachen, is an ancient city of Prussia, the seat of a bishop, and the principal town in the government of Aachen, in the grand duchy of the Lower Rhine. It is encompassed by walls and defended by a citadel, which in former times was surrounded by a fosse, now filled up, planted with trees, and converted into public walks. Generally speaking, the city is well built, with open, wide, and regular streets, in which are many handsome buildings intermingled with the Gothic façades of antiquity, now fast passing into a state of decay. Its cathedral is an octagon structure in the Byzantine style, erected in 983 by Otho III., from a great portion of the materials which formed a part of an original chapel built by Charlemagne, and from which it took its name. The gallery of this edifice was formerly adorned with 32 pillars which Charlemagne took from the Exarchic palace at Ravenna, and which were of granite and porphyry. These were carried away by the French during the last war, and only part of them were afterwards returned. The city has, besides its cathedral, a town-hall, four parish churches, bath-houses, a theatre, several hospitals, and various other public buildings. Manf. Woollen cloth and needles. It has coach-factories and engineering establishments, and other kinds of mechanical workshops. Pop. about 50,000. Lat. 50° 47′ N. Lon. 6° 3′ E.—Charlemagne, who is supposed by some to have been born here, was the founder of the greatness of Aix-la-Chapelle, which was long his favourite residence, as it was the capital of his empire north of the Alps. He died here in 814, and was interred beneath the dome of the chapel of Notre Dame. The vault in which his remains reposed was opened in 997 by Otho III., when the body of the emperor was found seated in a marble chair, which is still to be seen in the gallery of the cathedral, and was long used at the coronations of the emperors of Germany. The skull and the arm-bone of Charlemagne are still preserved, with many other relics, in the cathedral, which are shown every seven years, from the 15th to the end of July, when the city is thronged with pilgrims, who have come to be present at the religious ceremonies of the time. Aix-la-Chapelle is noted for its baths and for being the scene of some celebrated treaties between contending powers. On May 2, 1668, one was concluded between France and Spain, by which Louis XIV. retained his conquests in the Spanish Netherlands, whilst he restored Franche-Comté to Spain. On the 18th October, 1748, was concluded another treaty, which brought to a close the war of the Austrian succession. By the peace of Paris the city was united to Prussia, and in 1818 a congress was held in it, to decide upon the terms upon which France should be evacuated by the allied army. This conference was attended by the emperors of Russia and Austria, the king of Prussia, and the ambassadors of all the great powers of Europe. In 1794 the French entered the city and held it for twenty years, making it the capital of the department of the Roer, till the fall of Napoleon.

Aizani, ai-za'-ne, the modern Tchaftcr Hissar, a city of Asia Minor, about nine hours' journey from Kutahia. Little is known of its history; but from the extensive remains of which it is composed, it is thought to have been a place of note.

Aizenay, aize'-nai, a town of France, department of La Vendée. Pop. 3,500.

Ajaccio, ă-jăs'-e-o (Ital. a-yat'-se-o), the principal town in the island of Corsica, protected by a citadel built by Marshal de Termes, the see of a bishop, and now a department of France. It is situate on the north side of the Gulf of Ajaccio, which forms below the town a secure and commodious harbour. It is remarkable for being the birthplace of Napoleon Bonaparte, and the house in which he was born is now the property of the municipality. This building, humble as it is, is the chief object of interest in the town, which consists of two principal streets, tolerably wide and well built, and of a few others which are both narrow and dirty. Manf. Leather and bricks. Its principal trade is in wine, olive-oil, oranges, citron, and coral, which is collected near the coast. Pop. 12,000. Lat. 40° 55′ N. Lon. 8° 44′ 11″ E.—Steamers ply regularly to Toulon, which lies 168 miles N.N.W.

Ajala, Martin Perez d', a-ja'-la, a Spanish ecclesiastic who was sent by Charles V. to the council of Trent, and afterwards made archbishop of Valentia. He discharged the duties of his station in an exemplary manner. B. at Carthagena, 1504; D. 1556.—The principal of his works is entitled "De Divinis Traditionibus." There were two others of the same name. 1. Balthazar of Antwerp, who wrote "De Jure et Officiis Bellicis, ac Militari Disciplina." 2. Gabriel, a physician at Louvain in the 16th century, and brother of the preceding. He wrote "Popularia Epigrammata," "De Lue Pestilenti," &c.

Ajan, ai'-jan, a country on the east coast of Africa, south of Abyssinia and the Straits of Babelmandeb: it extends from Port Darnford to Ras Hasoun, embracing about ten degrees of latitude. Desc. The eastern coast is sandy and barren, but to the north the country is more fertile, producing, more particularly, an excellent breed of horses, which the Arabian merchants, who come to trade in its ports, take, together with ivory, gold, Abyssinian slaves captured in war, &c., in exchange for silks, cottons, and other cloths. Inhabitants. These are not so dark-complexioned as those of the west coast, and their hair is rather long. They are accounted good Mussulmans. Farther from the sea, there are negroes, who intermarry with the Bedouins. Little, however, is known of this extensive strip of coast. Towns. The chief are Magadoxo, Brava, and Melinde.

AJAX, ai'-jăx, the son of Telamon, by Peribœa or Eribœa, daughter of Alcathous, and, with the exception of Achilles, the bravest of all the Greeks in the Trojan war. He encountered Hector, with whom at parting he exchanged arms. After the death of Achilles, Ajax and Ulysses each claimed the arms of the dead hero. When they were given to the latter, Ajax was so enraged that he slaughtered a whole flock of sheep—supposing them to be the sons of Atreus, who had given the preference to Ulysses—and stabbed himself with his sword. The blood which ran to the ground from the wound was changed into the flower hyacinth. It is affirmed by some that he was killed by Paris in battle, and by others that he was murdered by Ulysses. His body was buried at Sigæum, some say on Mount Rhœtus. His tomb was visited by Alexander the Great. Hercules, according to several authors, prayed to the gods that his friend Telamon, who was childless, might have a son with a skin as impenetrable as that of the Nemean lion, which he then wore. His prayers were heard, and when Ajax was born, Hercules wrapped him up in the lion's skin, which rendered his body invulnerable, except that part which was left uncovered by a hole through which Hercules hung his quiver. This vulnerable part was in the breast, or, according to some authorities, behind the neck.—Another, the son of Oileus, king of Locris, surnamed Locrian, in contradistinction to the son of Telamon. As one of Helen's suitors, he sailed with forty ships to the Trojan war. The night that Troy was taken he offered violence to Cassandra, who fled into the temple of Minerva. For this, as he was returning home, the goddess, who had obtained the thunders of Jupiter and the power of tempests from Neptune, destroyed his ship in a storm. Ajax swam to a rock, and exclaimed that he was safe in spite of the gods. Such impiety offended Neptune, who struck the rock with his trident, and Ajax fell with part of the rock into the sea, and was drowned. His body was afterwards found by the Greeks, and black sheep offered on his tomb.—According to the fanciful mythology of ancient Greece, these two heroes were supposed after death to be transported to the island of Leuce, a separate place, reserved only for the bravest of antiquity.

AJELLO, a-yel'-lo, a Neapolitan town in the province of Calabria Citra, 9 miles S. of Cosenza. Pop. 4,200. —This town is supposed to stand on the site of the ancient Tilesis.—Another town in the province of Principato Citra, near Salerno.—Another in Abruzzo, near Aquila.—Another in Illyria, 12 miles S. of Gorizia.

AJLTA, a'-ye-ta, a town of Naples, 8 miles from Scalea. Pop. 3,300.

AJISTAN, a-jis'-tan, a large straggling town of Persia, encompassed by gardens, and containing a royal palace. It stands 80 miles E. of Kashan.

AJMERE, adj'-meer, an Indian province belonging to the British, situate among the independent states of Rajpootana. Area, 2,029 square miles. Pop. 224,891.

AJMERE, the capital of the above province, built at the foot of a high mountain, on the top of which is a fortress of great strength, called Taraghur. It is 150 miles W. by S. of Agra. Pop. 25,000. Lat. 26° 35′ N. Lon. 75° 50′ E.—It was here that Sir William Rosse, as English ambassador, had an audience with the Great Mogul in 1716. In 1818 the city, with the surrounding district, was ceded to the British by Dowlut Rao Scindia, in exchange for a part of the territory of Malwa. Just above the city is a lake four miles in circumference during the dry, and six, during the wet season, well stocked with fish, and supplying the inhabitants with abundance of excellent water. It was formed by the emperors of Delhi, who dammed up the outlet of an extensive valley, which was watered by several streams, and which around the banks of this extensive basin is still plentifully irrigated.

AJOFRIN, a-jof'-rin, a town of New Castile, in Spain, 9 miles from Toledo. Pop. 3,000.

AJRA, aj'-ra, a town of India, in the native state of Kolapore, in the Bombay presidency. The district in which it stands is fertile, and abounds with lead and iron. Lat. 16° 8′ N. Lon. 74° 17′ E.

AJURNOCA, a-joor'-nok-a, a town and district of Brazil, 100 miles N. of Rio de Janeiro. Pop. 12,500.

AKABAH, Gulf of, ak'-a-ba, the smaller of the two arms into which the Red Sea is divided at its northern extremity, and about 100 miles long and 12 wide. It is generally about 200 fathoms deep, but its navigation is very unsafe, especially during the prevalence of north winds. The Straits of Tiran, less than half a mile wide, connect it with the Red Sea, and the small island of Tiran lies at its entrance.

AKABAH, a fortified village with an Egyptian garrison, situate on the east side of the above gulf. Lat. 29° 2′ N. Lon. 36° 6′ E.

AKAKIA, Martin, a-ka'-ke-a, a learned professor of physic at Paris. B. at Chalons, Champagne; D. 1551. —He translated into Latin "Galen de Ratione Curandi," and "Ars Medica."

AKAKIA, Martin, son of the above, and physician to Henry III. D. 1588.—He wrote a treatise "De Morbis Mulieribus, et Consilia Medica," to be published after his death.—There are several other persons of the same name and family, who acquired reputation in different professions.

AKALIGURH, a-kal-e-goor, a town situate between the rivers Ravee and Chenab, in the Punjab. Lat. 32° 17′ N. Lon. 73° 37′ E.

AKASCHANSK, a-kas-kansk, a town of Asiatic Russia, on the river Onan, in the government of Irkutsk.

AKBACH, ak-bak, a Moorish conqueror, who swept Northern Africa from Cairo to the Atlantic Ocean. He fell in a revolt among the Greeks and Africans.

AKBAR, ak'-bar, sultan of the Moguls, succeeded his father Humayun in 1556, and was the greatest of all the sovereigns who have reigned in Hindostan. He ascended the throne in his thirteenth year, when his country was torn by dissensions; but although possessed of superior intelligence, he was wholly unequal to the task of governing his kingdom. Accordingly he called in to his assistance a Turkoman nobleman named Bahram Khan, on whom he conferred the power of regent, and left the administration of affairs chiefly to him. By the severity of the measures adopted by this personage, the country was restored to comparative tranquillity; but the rigour with which he exercised his authority was felt by Akbar himself, who, in 1558, broke from his control, and took the reins of government into his own hands. Bahram now raised the standard of rebellion, and for two years endeavoured to create an independent province for himself in Malwa; failing in this, however, he submitted to Akbar, and was pardoned. The young monarch now turned his attention to the enlargement of his kingdom, which had been greatly reduced by the invasions of successful chiefs, who lost no opportunity of extending their own territories in a country in which the right of the sword was the only power recognized and acknowledged. At first his dominions were comprised in the Punjab, and the provinces of Agra and Delhi, but, by the fortieth year of his reign, his empire extended from the Hindoo-Coosh mountains to the borders of the Deccan, and from the Bramahputra to Candahar. B. 1542; D. 1605.—Great as Akbar was as a conqueror, his sway was characterized by general mildness, wisdom, and toleration. He laboured to abolish the most cruel superstitions rites of the Hindoos in their religion, and expressed his opinion, that God could only be worshipped by following reason, and not by yielding an implicit faith to any alleged revelation. The memory of the beneficence of his reign is still vividly impressed on the mind of the Hindoo, and not without reason, as is shown by the following extract from an address presented by the rajah of Joudpoor to the bigoted Aurungzebe a century after the reign of Akbar.—"Your ancestor Akbar, whose throne is now in heaven, conducted the affairs of his empire in equity and security for the space of fifty years. He preserved every tribe of men in ease and happiness, whether they were followers of Jesus or of Moses, of Brahma or Mahomet. Of whatever sect or creed they might be, they all equally enjoyed his countenance and favour, insomuch that his people, in gratitude for the indiscriminate protection which he afforded them, distinguished him by the appellation of 'Guardian of Mankind.'"

AKDASCH, ak'-dash, a town of Persia, province of Schirvan, on the Kur, numbering about 300 houses.

AK-DEYAVIN, ak-de-ya'-vin, a village of Asia Minor, 40 miles from Aleppo, where there are some interesting architectural remains.

AKEBALA, a-ke-ba'-la, a town of Turkish Armenia, 24 miles W.N.W. of Erzeroum.

AKEBAR, a'-ke-ba, a town of the Arabian Irak, on the Tigris, 30 miles N.W. of Bagdad.

AKEHAM, or ACOMB, aik'-ham, a parish in Yorkshire, 2 miles from York. Area, 2,320 acres. Pop. 1,000.—Tradition says that at Siver's Hill, in this parish, the body of the emperor Severus was burned.

AKENSIDE, Mark, ai'-ken-side, an English poet and physician, who, when young, was crippled by the falling of a cleaver on his foot in the shop of his father, who was a butcher. He had a singular weakness of being always ashamed of his origin, though the limp in his gait was such as to preserve it continually in his memory. His parents being dissenters, intended him for the ministry in their sect, and at the age of eighteen he was sent to Edinburgh to pursue his studies; but instead of following divinity, he devoted himself to physic. In 1741 he went to Leyden, where, in three years, he took his degree of M.D. In 1744 he published his "Pleasures of Imagination," a performance which at once attained celebrity, and proved him a true poet. He soon afterwards commenced practising as a physician at Northampton. Meeting with little success, he removed to Hampstead, and a Mr. Dyson generously allowed him £300 a year till he could fix himself in practice. Having obtained his doctor's degree at Cambridge, he was elected fellow of the College of Physicians, one of the physicians of St. Thomas's Hospital, and physician to the queen. In 1764 he printed a discourse in Latin on the dysentery, and was in a fair way of attaining considerable eminence in his profession, when he was carried off by a putrid fever. B. at Newcastle-on-Tyne, 1721; D. in London, 1770.—His remains were interred in the church of St. James's, Westminster. The poem on the "Pleasures of Imagination" was published in an elegant form, with a preface by Mrs. Barbauld, in 1795.

AKERBLAD, John David, ak'-er-blad, a learned Swede, who, being appointed secretary to the Swedish embassy at Constantinople, had an opportunity of pursuing researches into Phœnician literature. He was not only able to read but to converse in several European and Oriental languages. D. at Rome, 1819.

AKERMANN, o'-ker-man, a fortified town in the province of Bessarabia, Russia. It stands on the southern shore of the Dniestrovskoi lake, through which the river Dniester flows into the Black Sea. The harbour is well defended by a citadel on an eminence, and is commodious for shipping. The town, however, is ill built, and the streets dirty. Pop. above 26,000, and consisting chiefly of Armenians, Greeks, and Jews. Lat. 46° 12′ N. Lon. 30° 22′ E.—In September, 1826, a treaty was concluded here between Russia and Turkey, by which it was stipulated that the former should govern by native boyars, elected by the divans of each of the principalities of Wallachia and Moldavia; that the Servians should have their former privileges restored; that Russia should be refunded for losses sustained at the hands of the Barbary corsairs; and that the liberty of navigation and free commercial intercourse with all the states of the Porte, and especially free passage of the Straits of Constantinople, should be allowed.

AKHALZIKH, ak'-hal'-zik, a fortified town of Russian Armenia, situate on a feeder of the Kur, between the Black Sea and the Caspian. It trades chiefly in silk and honey. Pop. 15,000, principally Armenians. Lat. 41° 40′ N. Lon. 43° 10′ E.

AKHALZIKH, a province of Asiatic Turkey, in Armenia, on the S.W. confines of Georgia. It derives its name from the above town.

AK-HISSAR, ak-his-sar', a town of Anatolia, Asia Minor, standing on a slight eminence, containing several bazaars and khans, a Greek school, and interesting remains of antiquity. Exp. Cotton goods. Pop. about 6,000, consisting of Turks, Greeks, and Jews. It is about 60 miles N.E. of Smyrna.

AKHLAT, or ARDISH, ak-lat', a town of Asiatic Turkey, 35 miles N.W. of Vari. Pop. 6,000. Lat. 38° 35′ N. Lon. 41° 22′ E.

AKHMYN. (See EKMIN.)

AKHTIAR. (See SKBASTOPOL.)

AKHTYRKA. (See ACHTYRKA.)

AKIBA, ă-ki'-ba, a Jewish rabbi, who was at first a shepherd, but at the age of forty devoted himself to learning, and became a teacher. He was flayed alive by the Romans, A.D. 135.—Akiba was one of the first compilers of the cabalistic traditions of the Jews.

AKKA, ak-ka, a town in the Sahara, on the borders of Morocco, and a caravan-station between Timbuctoo and Morocco. Lat. 28° 30′ N. Lon. 0° 10′ W.

AKKAR, or AKKEB, ak'-kar, a town of Syria, in the pashalic of Tripoli, on the river Akker, 66 miles N.W. of Damascus. Lat. 34° 32′ N. Lon. 36° 10′ E.

AKNUR, ak-nur, a town of the Punjab, Hindostan, 100 miles N.E. of Lahore. It stands on the river Chenab, and, although mostly in ruins, has recently had a new fort erected in it.

AKREYRI, ak-ray'-re, a Danish town, on the Eyiasfiord, Iceland, possessed of a good harbour, and the most important place for trade, after Reykiavik, in Iceland. Lat. 65° 40′ N.

AK-SER, ak-seer, a town of Chinese Turkestan, 250 miles N.E. of Yarkand. Manf. Woollen stuffs and jasper. Pop. 6,000, besides a garrison of 3,000. Lat. 41° 7′ N. Lon. 79° E. It is a resort of trading caravans from all parts of Asia.

AKSERAI, ak'-se-rai, a town of Asiatic Turkey, in Karamania, consisting of 150 houses, 80 miles N.E. of Konieh. Pop. about 5,000. Lat. 38° 57′ N. Lon. 34° E.

AK-SHEHER, ak'-sher, 'white city,' a town of Asiatic Turkey, in Karamania. It exports to Smyrna fine carpets, wool, wax, gum tragacanth, and galls. 60 miles S.S.E. of Karahissar. It is the ancient Philomelion of Strabo. Ak-sheher was taken by Tamerlane in 1402.

AK-SHESHEHR, ak'-shesh-er, a town of Natolia, on the Black Sea, 90 miles E. of Constantinople.

AKSU, ak'-soo, 'white river,' the name of several rivers in Asia, the chief of which runs through Chinese Turkestan.

ALA, a'-la, a market-town on the Adige, in the principality of Trent. Pop. 4,000, chiefly employed in the manufacture of velvets and silks.

ALABA, or ALAVA, a-la'-va, a district of Spain, in the province of Biscay, and once the seat of a kingdom. It is about 20 miles long and 17 wide, and has some rich iron-mines. The capital of the district is called Vittoria.

ALABAMA, ă'-la-ba'-ma, one of the United States, bounded, N. by Tennessee, E. by Georgia, S. by Florida and the Gulf of Mexico, W. by Mississippi. Ext. 317 miles from north to south, and 174 miles from east to west. Area, 46,000 square miles. Desc. In describing this state, the "American Encyclopædia" says,—"In the south it is generally sandy and barren, and a part of the high hills are unfit for cultivation. A large portion of the country which lies between the Alabama and Tombigbee, of that part watered by the Coosa and Talapoosa, and of the Tennessee valley, consists of very excellent land. On the margins of the rivers in the southern part there is a quantity of cane-bottom land, of great fertility, generally from one half to three quarters of a mile wide; on the outside of this is a space which is low, wet, and intersected by stagnant water. Next to this river swamp, and elevated 10 or 15 feet above it, succeeds an extensive body of level land, of a black rich soil, with a growth of hickory, black oak, post oak, poplar, dog-wood, &c. After this come the prairies, which are wide-spreading plains, or gently-waving land, resting on a soft limestone rock, abounding in shells, clothed with grass, herbage, and flowers, and exhibiting, in the month of May, the most enchanting scenery." Rivers. The chief are the Alabama, from which the state is named, the Mobile, the Tombigbee, Tuscaloosa, Talapoosa, Coosa, Tennessee, Perdido, Cahawba, Conecuh, and the Chattahooche. Wild Animals. The bear, wolf, panther, fox, &c. The rattlesnake abounds. Climate. Variable, but healthy, except on the borders of the rivers and the coast. June is the hottest month of the year, and in winter the rivers are rarely frozen. Pro. Cotton, corn, barley, rye, rice, tobacco, sugar, fruits, and silk. Horses, sheep, and neat cattle are numerous, and large quantities of pigs are killed for exportation. Manf. Few and chiefly those of necessity. There are several iron-foundries, and there are great numbers of distilleries, and corn and flour mills. Minerals. Iron, coal, marble, and some gold. Pop. According to the last census, there were 771,671, of whom 342,892 were slaves, and 2,293 free coloured. Lat. between 30° 10′ and 35° N. Lon. between 85° and 88° 30′ W.—Originally Alabama belonged to Georgia; but in 1798, with the state of Mississippi, it was formed into a territory, with a part of Florida taken possession of by the United States in 1812. In 1817 the western portion of this territory was made the "State of Mississippi," and the eastern the "Territory of Alabama," which, in March, 1819, was admitted into the Union as a separate state. Formerly the Creek Indians occupied the south-east part of the state; the Cherokees the north-east; the Chocktaws the south-west; and the Chickasaws the north-west. These various tribes have been driven to the west of the Mississippi, where they live upon a large tract of country ceded to them by the United States, for what was once their own.

ALABAMA RIVER, a river of the United States, in Alabama, formed by the union of the Coosa and Talapoosa, flowing S.S.W., uniting with the Tombigbee to form Mobile river, 45 miles from the head of Mobile Bay.

ALABANDA, ă-la-băn′-da, an inland town of Caria, near the river Meander. Its inhabitants were called Aabandi, Alabandeni, and Alabandenses. It was built by Alabandus, who was on that account worshipped there.

ALABASTER, or ELEUTHERIA, ă-la-bas′-ter, one of the Bahama or Lucaya islands.

ALABASTER, William, ă-la-bas′-ter, an English divine, of considerable attainments, who was educated in Trinity College, Cambridge, and who accompanied the earl of Essex to Cadiz, where he turned papist. On his return to England, he again became a Protestant, and had some church preferment. Applying himself to the study of the Hebrew language, he became enthusiastically fond of the Cabala, or Jewish traditions. B. at Hadleigh, Suffolk; D. 1640.—He wrote a Latin tragedy called "Roxana," acted at Cambridge by the students; on which occasion a lady, hearing the words sequar, sequar, pronounced in a terrible manner, was so affected as to lose her senses. He was also the author of a Lexicon Pentaglotton, folio, 1637.

ALABUS, a-lai′-bus, a river of Sicily.

ALACRANES ISLANDS, a-la-kra′-ness, a cluster in the Gulf of Mexico, on one of which, called Perez, the steamer Tweed was wrecked in March, 1847. Lat. 22° 23′ 1″ N. Lon. 89° 42′ W.

ALÆA, a-le′-a, a surname of Minerva in Peloponnesus. Her festivals are also called Alæa.

ALÆI, a-la′-i, a number of islands in the Persian Gulf, abounding in tortoises.

ALÆSA, a-le′-sa, a city on a mountain of Sicily.

ALÆUS, a-la′-us, the father of Auge, who married Hercules.

ALAGOA, a-la′-go-a, a district and town on the south shore of the islar I called St. Michael, one of the Azores. Pop. of district, about 8,000.

ALAGOAS, a-la′-go-as, a province of Brazil, which, up to 1840, formed a part of Pernambuco. Ext. From E. to W. about 150 miles, having a probable average width of about 60. Area, 9,000 square miles. Desc. Mountainous and well wooded over two-thirds of its surface. About 10 miles inland from the seacoast, the country is covered with a deep alluvium, deposited, from time to time, by the numerous small streams which descend from the eastern mountain region. Here swamps and lagunes prevail. Pro. Tobacco, which is the staple, cotton, sugar, rice, maize, plantains, beans; in roots, yams and sweet potatoes; in fruits, pine-apples, oranges, and cocoa-nuts. The mamona-tree is cultivated for its oil, and the timber trees of Algoas are the best in Brazil. Some of these are very durable; but from the quantity of tanin they possess, they affect iron to such a degree as to render bolts of it useless in a few years. Other trees produce mastic, caoutchouc, copaiba, dragon's blood, and ipecacuanha. Others, amongst which is the Brazil-wood, are used for dyes; and an inferior kind of Jesuit's bark, or quinine, is readily obtained. Wild Animals. The ounce, the deer, and monkeys of all kinds. The tapir and the peccary are found, and armadillces and ant-eaters are plentiful. Land tortoises abound, and alligators infest the rivers and lakes. Birds. Parrots of every description, with the most beautifully plumed humming-birds. Of insects, bees are the most abundant, and of reptiles, there are several kinds of snakes that are poisonous. Domestic Animals. With the exception of the ass and the mule, which are numerous, there are few of the other sorts of European domestic animals. Pop. estimated at 200,000, and chiefly agricultural. Lat. between 9° and 10° S. Lon. between 36° and 38° 30′ W.

ALAGOAS, the capital of the above province, stands on the western margin of the Lake of Manguaba. It is situate in a fertile district, abounding in orange and jack trees, and producing large quantities of sugar and tobacco. Pop. 12,000. Lat. 9° 40′ S. Lon. 35° 50′ W. —This town contains a grammar-school and several convents.

ALAGON, a′-la-gon, a town of Spain, 15 miles N.W. of Saragossa. Pop. 2,000.

ALAGON, a river of Spanish Estremadura, which falls into the Tagus near Coria.

ALAGORE, a′-la-gor, a town of Hindostan, in the Mysore, 23 miles E. of Seringapatam.

ALAIN, John, a′-lain, a Danish author, who wrote "On the Origin of the Cimbri," and other subjects. B. 1569; D. 1630.

ALAIN DE L'ISLE, a′-lain de-leel′, surnamed the universal doctor, and a divine of great reputation in the university of Paris. D. 1294.—His works were printed in 1653, folio.

ALAIN, Nicholas, a French dramatic author, whose fame rests upon the production of some trifling comedies. Flourished at the beginning of the 18th century.

ALAIN, Chartier, a French writer, who produced several pieces, the most esteemed of which is his "Chronicle of Charles VII." to whom he was secretary. Flourished at the beginning of the 14th century.

ALAIS, a′-lai, a town of France, in the arrondissement of Alais, department of Gard, built in a plain at the foot of the Cevennes mountains. Manf. Silk, serges, thread, gloves, and ribands. It has glass, pottery, and chemical works, and does a considerable trade in wine, corn, and cattle. There are large coal and iron mines in the neighbourhood, and blast-furnaces and iron-foundries are numerous. Pop. 16,000. Lat. 44° 7′ 26″ N. Lon. 1° 1′ 14″ E.—With the exception of a handsome Gothic church, and the citadel, built by Louis XIV., there is no other structure worth noting in the town. In former times, however, Alais was a stronghold of the Protestants, from whom it was taken by Louis XIII.

ALAJUELA, a′-la-ju-ai′-la, a city of Costa Rica, Central America, situate to the S. of Cartago. Pop. with environs, 8,000.

ALAKANANDA, a′-la-ka-nan′-da, a river of Hindostan, considered sacred by the Hindoos. It rises in the Himalaya mountains, flows through the province of Gurwal, and at Devaprayuga unites with the Bhagirathi, when it receives the name of the Ganges.

ALALA, ă-lai′-la, the goddess of war, sister to Mars.

ALALCOMENÆ, ar′-lal-kom′-e-ne, a city of Bœotia, where some suppose that Minerva was born.

ALALIA, ă-lai′-le-a, a town of Corsica, built by a colony of Phocæans. L. C. Scipio destroyed it in the first Punic war, B.C. 562.

ALAMANES, ă-la-mai′-nes, a statuary of Athens, and disciple of Phidias.

ALAMANNI, or ALEMANNI, ăl-ă-măn′-i, a powerful people of Germany, who dwelt near the Hercynian forest, and who were great enemies of the Romans.

ALAMANNI, Lewis, a-la-man′-e, a Florentine, who, conspiring against Julius de Medici, was compelled to quit his native country, until Charles V. captured Rome, when he returned and was employed in public affairs, till the re-establishment of the Medici family obliged him to leave Florence again. He finally settled in France, and became a favourite of Francis I., who in 1544 sent him ambassador to the imperial court. B. at Florence, 1495; D. 1556.—Alamanni was of a noble family, and wrote many beautiful poems in the Italian language. His son Baptiste became almoner to Queen Catherine of France, and successively bishop of Bazar and Maion. D. 1581. A collection of his letters is extant, but in MS.

ALAMAS, REAL DE LOS, a'-la-mas, a Mexican town in the department of Sonora, 135 miles N. of Sinaloa. Pop. about 8,000.

ALAMOS, Balthazar, a'-la-mos, a Castilian, educated at Salamanca. He entered into the service of Anthony Perez, secretary of state to Philip II., and when that minister fell into disgrace, Alamos was cast into prison, where he lay eleven years. On the accession of Philip III. he obtained his liberty, and was employed by the duke of Olivarez in several important situations. Lived in the 16th century. B. at Medina del Campo; D. in his 88th year.—He translated Tacitus into Spanish, and left other works.

ALAN, or CAMEL, al'-an, a river of Cornwall, England, which rises a few miles north of Camelford, and joining the Bristol Channel near Bodmin, forms the estuary of the harbour of Padstow.

ALAN of Tewkesbury, author of the "Life and Banishment of Thomas à Becket, Archbishop of Canterbury." D. 1291.

ALAN, ALLEN, or ALLEYN, William, was educated at Oriel College, Oxford, and in 1550 became one of its fellows. In 1556 he was chosen principal of St. Mary's Hall, and two years afterwards was made canon of York; but on the accession of Elizabeth he went to Louvain, and was appointed head of the English college. Here he wrote, in defence of the Romish church, some treatises, which raised his reputation as a controversialist to such a degree, that he obtained several valuable preferments. In his own country, however, he was considered a traitor, and a man was hanged for bringing over from the continent some of his books. In 1586 he published a defence of the Pope's bull for excommunicating Queen Elizabeth, to which he added an exhortation to her subjects to revolt against her in favour of the Spaniards. For this he obtained the archbishopric of Mechlin, with the dignity of a cardinal. B. at Rossal, in Lancashire, in 1532; D. at Rome, in 1594.

ALAN of Lynn, so called from the place of his nativity. He became famous for his theological writings. Lived in the 15th century.

ALAND, Sir John Fortescue, al'-änd, an English judge, who took the name of Aland, in compliment to his lady, who was the eldest daughter of Henry Aland, esq., of Waterford, in Ireland. He was educated at Oxford, whence he removed to the Inner Temple, and was called to the bar about 1690. In 1714 he was appointed solicitor-general to the prince of Wales, and afterwards to the king. In 1717 he was created a baron of the Exchequer, and, next year, one of the justices of the court of King's Bench. On the accession of George II. he was removed from that office, but for what cause does not appear. In 1728 he was made one of the justices of the Common Pleas, which situation he resigned in 1746, and was created a peer of Ireland, by the title of Baron Fortescue of Creden. B. in Devonshire, 1670; D. 1746.—Baron Fortescue belonged to the ancient family of Fortescue, in Devonshire, and was an able lawyer, an impartial judge, and versed in the Northern and Saxon literature. He published, in 1714, 8vo, his ancestor Sir John Fortescue's treatise on "Absolute and Limited Monarchy."

ALAND, o'-land, the principal island, which gives the name to a group in the Baltic, not far from the point of meeting of the gulfs of Bothnia and Finland, and lying between the coasts of Finland and Upland, in Sweden. Of the group there are about eighty inhabited, although the population on the whole is exceedingly sparse,—not more than 15,000. They were ceded, in 1809, by Sweden to Russia, and have become the usual station of the Russian fleet in the Baltic. The chief island is a place of considerable importance, its length being about 18 miles from north to south, and 14 from east to west. Area, 28 square miles. Desc. Mountainous, with a deeply indented coast-line with several excellent harbours, one of which—that of Lytternais—is large enough to give shelter to the whole of the Russian fleet. The island has a vast citadel, with fortifications capable of protecting 60,000 men. Pro. Barley, rye, potatoes, hops, and flax. A number of cattle are pastured, and many of the inhabitants are employed in fishing. Pop. 9,000. Lat. 60° 15′ N. Lon. 20° E.—The neighbourhood of Aland is remarkable as being the scene of the first great naval action in the annals of the Russian marine. It was fought between the Swedes and Peter I., who obtained a complete victory, in 1714. On August 16, 1854, Bomarsund, on the W. side of the principal island, was captured and its fortifications destroyed by the British fleet. Steamers plying between Abo, in Finland, and Stockholm take in wood at these islands.

ALANI, ä-lan'-ni, the collective name of several distinct and independent nations, who passed a nomadic existence in the countries north of the Euxine and the Caspian seas. They long preserved their independence, and fought several battles with the Romans. Gregory of Tours states that they were deprived of their independence by Thorismund, king of the West Goths.

ALARA, a-la-ra, a town in the island of Majorca, 12 miles from Palma, in the vicinity of which there are some excellent marble-quarries. Pop. upwards of 4,000.

ALARCON, Don Juan Ruiz de, a-lar'-kon, a Spanish theatrical writer of the reign of Philip IV. Some of his productions are so excellent as to have been attributed to Lope de Vega and Montalvan. His drama of "La Verdad sospechosa" (suspicious truth) was imitated by Corneille in his "Le Menteur," which, in fact, is founded upon it. None of the Spanish dramatists, taken as a whole, merit a higher place in the drama than Alarcon, who is said to have written thirty plays, and whose verse glows with high, chivalrous sentiment, and is marked by those nice discriminating qualities which indicate an honourable mind. B. at Tlasco or Tlacheo, in the province of Mexico, towards the end of the 16th century.

ALARD, a'-lar, a Romish divine, who wrote a great number of theological pieces now little known or regarded. B. at Amsterdam; D. at Louvain, 1541.

ALARD, Lambert, the inspector of the public schools in Brunswick, a theological writer and the compiler of a Greek Lexicon. D. 1672.

ALARIC I., al'-a-rik, king of the Visigoths, was descended from an illustrious family, and served in the wars between the Goths and Romans, when his countrymen submitted to Theodosius. He afterwards served in the imperial army, but being refused a chief command, he revolted, and entering Greece, devastated several of its provinces with fire and sword. Whilst thus engaged, he was encountered by the famous Stilicho, who compelled him to retire into Epirus. About this time, A.D. 400, he was acknowledged king of the Visigoths, and entered Italy, whence he carried away a large amount of plunder and a great many captives. Two years afterwards, he again entered that country, but was opposed by Stilicho, his former enemy, and after a well-contested battle, lost his wife and children, who were taken prisoners. He then entered into a treaty, and retired across the Po. He now submitted to the emperor Honorius, who was then reigning, and into whose service he entered, and, for three years, seems to have served that prince in Epirus. For this he demanded an extravagant reward, which being refused, he raised the standard of revolt, and advanced upon Rome, and laying siege to it, the Romans were ultimately compelled to comply with such terms as the conqueror chose to dictate. Having achieved this success, he withdrew into Tuscany; but finding that Honorius failed to fulfil the objects of the treaty into which he had entered, Alaric again attacked the "Eternal city," and compelled its submission. He himself now appointed Attalus, prefect of the city, to be emperor in the room of Honorius; but the imbecility of that personage rendered him unfit for the responsibilities of his station. He was therefore deprived of his regal honours, and Honorius once more enthroned. These measures, however, had hardly been completed, when a treacherous attack made by the Romans upon the soldiers of Alaric roused his indignation against the imperial city, which he gave up for six days to his soldiers. An indiscriminating pillage was the result of this act; but Alaric, to his honour, ordered his troops to spare unnecessary bloodshed, to respect female chastity, and preserve the buildings devoted to the purposes of religion. Having sufficiently satiated his vengeance, he withdrew into the southern provinces of Italy, where he died during the siege of Cosenza, in Calabria. D. A.D. 410.—Alaric was a skilful warrior, and exhibited the qualities of promptitude and courage in a high degree. During his first siege of Rome, the inhabitants intimated to him that if they were driven to take up arms, they would fight with the utmost determination. "Do so," said the barbarian soldier; "but the closer hay is pressed, the more easily it is cut." On being further asked what he would leave to the besieged if they surrendered, "Their lives," was his laconic reply; and at the same time he demanded all their wealth.

ALARIC II., king of the Visigoths, ascended the throne in 484: he was slain in a battle which he fought with Clovis, king of France, near Poitiers, in 507. This monarch was of a much more pacific disposition than the first Alaric. He left behind him a regularly drawn up system of legislation, which is known as the Code Breviarium Alaricianum.

ALASCO, John, a-las'-ko, a Polish Roman Catholic bishop, who, having embraced the Protestant religion, came to England in the reign of Edward VI., and became pastor to a Dutch church in London. On the accession of Mary, he returned to his own country, where he distinguished himself so greatly in the cause of the Reformation, that he received the title of Reformer of Poland. B. 1199; D. at Frankfort, 1560.—Alasco was the uncle of Sigismund, king of Poland, and was greatly esteemed by the leading men among the Reformers; particularly by Erasmus, whose library he purchased.

ALASSAC, a-las'-ak, a town of France, department of the Corrèze. Pop. 3,160.

ALASSIO, a-las'-se-o, a seaport town of the Sardinian states, on the Mediterranean, in the province of Albenga. It is in the division of Genoa, and is 4 miles from Albenga. Pop. about 7,000.

ALASSONA, a-las-o'-na, a town of European Turkey, 35 miles from Tricala. Pop. 3,000.

ALASTOR, a-las'-tor, an armbearer to Sarpedon, king of Lycia, killed by Ulysses.

ALA-TAGH, a-la-taw, a mountain-chain of Asiatic Turkey, dividing the two heads of the Euphrates as it runs westward from Mount Ararat. Lat. between 39° and 40° N. Lon. between 39° and 44° E.

ALATAMAHA, al'-ta-ma-haw', a river of Georgia, United States, which, after a course of 500 miles, falls into the Atlantic, 60 miles from Savannah.

ALATRI, a-la'-tre, an Italian town, built on a mountain, 6 miles from Frosinone. Manf. Chiefly woollens. Pop. 10,000.

ALATYR, a-la'-tir, a Russian town in the government of Simbirsk, from which town it is distant about 80 miles. Manf. Glass and leather. Pop. 5,000.

ALAVA, a-la'-va, one of the three Basque provinces of Spain, included in the new province of Vascongadas, mountainous and rich in iron-mines. Pop. 80,000. Lat. between 42° 20' and 43° N.

ALAVA, Diego Esquiesel, a-la'-va, a bishop of Cordova, in Spain, who was at the Council of Trent, and wrote a book on "General Councils." D. 1562.

ALAYA, a-la-ya, a town of Asiatic Turkey, standing on a promontory in the Mediterranean, 100 miles from Konieh. It has fallen into comparative decay. Pop. 2,000.

ALAZON, a-la-zon, a river of Georgia, uniting with the Kur 125 miles from Tiflis. Its course is in a south-easterly direction for 140 miles.

ALBA, al'-ba, a Sardinian province in the division of Coni, bounded on the N. by Asti and Torino; E. by Acqui and Alessandria; W. by Saluzzo; and S. by Mondovi. Area, 408 square miles. Desc. Generally hilly, and watered by an affluent of the Po, called the Tanaro. Pro. Silk, corn, pulse, fruit,—and wine is made. In many places truffles are dug up and made an article of export. Horned cattle are numerous. Pop. about 120,000.

ALBA, capital of the above, is situate on the right bank of the river Tanaro. Pop. about 9,000.—Alba was the Alba Pompeii of the Romans, and figures in the Middle Ages as one of the principal towns of the marquisate of Montferrat. In 1631 it was annexed to the dominions of the house of Savoy. The learned Vida, author of the "Christiad," was for many years its bishop.

ALBA DE TORMES, al'-ba dai tor-mess, a town of Spain, on the Tormes, 14 miles from Salamanca. Pop. 2,300. Here, on the 26th November, 1809, the French, under Kellermann, defeated the Spaniards commanded by the Duque del Parque.

ALBA LONGA, al-ba lon'-qa, a city of Latium, built by Ascanius, B.C. 1152, on the spot where Æneas found, according to the prophecy of Helenus and of the god of the river, a white sow with thirty young ones. Fourteen descendants of Æneas reigned there, down to Numitor and Amulius. Alba was destroyed by the Romans 695 B.C., and the inhabitants were carried to Rome.—A city of the Marsi, in Italy.

ALBA SYLVIUS, al'-ba sil'-ve-us, son of Latinus Sylvius, succeeded his father in the kingdom of Latium, and reigned 36 years.

ALBACETE, al'-ba-thai'-tai, a trading town of Spain, in the province of the same name, 80 miles from Valencia. Pop. 11,000;—of province, 19,000. Manf. Principally steel wares.

ALBANESE, al-ba-nai'-sai, an Italian musician of high reputation. D. at Paris, 1800.

ALBANIA, al-bai'-ne-a, or al-ba'-ne-a, a country of Asia, between the Caspian Sea and Iberia. All the inhabitants are said to have blue eyes. Some maintain that they followed Hercules from Mount Albanus, in Italy, when he returned from the conquest of Geryon.—The Caspian Sea is called Albanum Mare, as being near Albania.

ALBANIA, a large province in European Turkey, which stretches along that part of the Mediterranean called the Ionian Sea, and comprehends, in its widest acceptation, the ancient Illyria and Epirus. The limits of this country are not very exactly defined, but, to serve general purposes, it may be said to be bounded on the N. by Servia, Bosnia, and Montenegro; on the E. by Roumelia; on the S. by Greece; and on the W. by the Mediterranean Sea, along the coast of which it extends for upwards of 200 miles. Area, estimated at about 14,000 square miles. Desc. Extremely mountainous, cut up into deep ravines, and presenting all the characteristics of sublimity, in a scenic point of view. The mountains of the Khimára,—the former ALBANIANS.

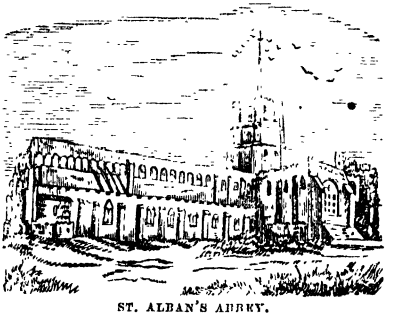
Acroceraunian,—running in a north-western direction parallel to the coast, attain an elevation of 4,000 feet above the level of the sea, as also does the southward chain of the Tzumerka. Rivers. Although there are many streams in Albania, they are neither so large nor important as to require particular notice. They take their rise mostly in the eastern parts of the country, and after a winding and tortuous course, fall into the Mediterranean or Adriatic Sea.

The Garla, or river of Suli (the ancient Acheron), falls into the Gulf of Arta, and the Calamas (the ancient Thyamis) disembogues itself into the sea opposite Corfu. Lakes. The principal are Okhrida, Scutari, Butrinto, and Joánnina, which is estimated at 3 miles wide and 12 miles long. Climate. Variable, but healthy on the whole. Spring cannot be said to commence before the middle of March; but the heat of the months July and August is excessive. September is the vintage season, and the December rains are succeeded by sharp frosts in January. Wild Animals. The wolf, the bear, and the jackall. The lakes swarm with water-fowl of almost every description. Domestic Animals. Horses, asses, oxen, sheep, and goats. The horses are small, but active and spirited. There is a breed of dogs not unlike the English shepherd dog, although larger and sharper in the head, with a bushy tail. Pro. Barley, maize, oats, cotton, and tobacco. In fruits, the grape, orange, lemon, fig, pomegranate, and mulberry are grown. Inhabitants. The Albanians, or Arnauts, are supposed to have sprung from the Illyrians. They are an active, muscular race, seldom exceeding five feet six inches in height, and capable of undergoing great fatigue. Like the mountaineers of Scotland, they have high cheek-bones, with lofty foreheads. Their faces are long and oval, their noses sharp, thin, and straight; their mouths small; their eyes a lively blue or hazel, but rarely a black. They shave off all the beard but the mustachios. In walking they take long steps, and exhibit a freedom of action, which seems to spring from a feeling of conscious independence. Their attachment to their mountains is great, and, as they all carry arms, it is difficult to distinguish the peasant from the soldier. They are mostly robbers, a profession, amongst themselves, not considered disgraceful. Their women are tall and strong; but as they are kept in great subjection, and viewed in the light of cattle, they are made to labour as such, and often unmercifully used. Manf. Capotes, embroidered velvets, cloths, and stuffs. The wild character of their country, and the imperfect state of their civilization, however, render them foes to the arts of peace generally. Their trade principally consists of exchanging the natural productions of their own for the manufactured goods of other countries. Gov. Supposed to be governed by pashas; but in a community of robbers the power of these is necessarily small. Rel. The inhabitants are, generally, Christians of the Greek church, but many are Mahometans. Pop. 1,300,000. Lat. between 38° and 43° N. Lon. from 18° 49′ to 21° 50′ E.—Albania was formerly an independent kingdom, governed by its own princes, the last of whom, the famous John Castriot, known better by the name of Scanderbeg, bequeathed it at his death to the Venetians. (See TURKEY.)

ALBANI, al-ba'-ne, the name of a Roman patrician family, who have supplied the Romish church with several cardinals.

ALBANI, Francis, an Italian painter, whose first master was Denys Calvert, who left him to the instructions of his pupil Guido, whom he accompanied to the school of the Caracci. Having finished his studies at Bologna, Albani went to Rome, where his first wife died. He married again, and his second wife was very beautiful. This lady became the mother of several fine boys, and Albani painted pieces in which his wife and children served as models for his Venuses and Cupids. He was fond of representing the fair sex, and his compositions on love-subjects are held in high esteem. B. at Bologna, 1578; D. 1660. His brother and disciple, John Baptiste, was an eminent historical and landscape painter. He died in 1668.

ALBANI, John Jerome, a civilian and cardinal, who wrote some books in vindication of the papal power. B. at Bergamo; D. 1591.



ALBANI, Alexander, an Italian, created a cardinal by Innocent XIII. B. at Urbino, 1692; D. 1779. This personage was a great virtuoso, and possessed a collection of drawings and engravings, which, at his death, was purchased by George III. for 14,000 crowns.

ALBANI, John Francis, also a cardinal, and nephew of the above, distinguished as a patron of the fine arts. Although he endeavoured to prevent the suppression of the Jesuits, he was in other respects liberal and enlightened. His palace was plundered by the French invading army of 1798, when he made his escape to Naples, stripped of all his possessions. In 1800 he returned to Rome, where he took up his abode in private lodgings. B. at Rome, 1720; D. 1803.

ALBANO, al-ba'-no, a small well-built town of Italy, in the Campagna di Roma, 14 miles S.S.E. of Rome. Pop. 6,000.—On the site of this town stood the villa of Pompey.

ALBANO, a well-built town of Italy, in the kingdom of Lombardy, 11 miles from Potenza. Pop. nearly 3,000.

ALBAN'S, ST., saint al'-bins, a town of England, in Hertfordshire, on the river Ver. It consists principally of three streets, divided into three parishes, with as many churches; namely, St. Alban's, St. Michael's, and St. Helen's. It has a good trade, and carries on a considerable manufacture of straw-plaiting for hats and bonnets, and Berlin wool canvas: there is also a silk-mill. Rope-making, brewing, and iron-founding are also pursued, and there are numerous corn-mills in its neighbourhood. Pop. between 7,000 and 8,000. Distant from London 21 miles N.N.W.—St. Alban's arose from the ruins of the ancient Verulam. In the ancient abbey church are the funeral monuments and effigies of King Offa on his throne. Of the former abbey, erected by Offa (796), in honour of St. Alban, the first martyr in Britain, not the least vestige remains, except the gateway, a large square building. The present abbey is an object worthy the attention of the antiquary and the student of architecture. It is built in the form of a cross, running 547 feet from east to west, and having a breadth of 206 feet at the intersection of the transept. Its tower has an elevation of 146 feet, crowned with battlements, and is amongst the most perfect parts of the building. Every style of architecture, from the time of the Normans to that of Henry VII., may be traced in it; and although it is constructed mostly of bricks, flints, and tiles, its appearance is, in the highest degree, imposing; whilst the antique air which it preserves, imparts to it a venerable aspect in the eyes of those lovers of antiquity who delight in architectural structures. The abbot of St. Alban's was mitred, and as a peer of the realm had a seat in Parliament. He took precedence of all other English abbots from the time of Pope Adrian IV., who was Nicholas Breakespere, and the only Englishman who rose to the pontificate. (See ADRIAN IV.) In 1451 and 1461 two fierce battles were fought in the neighbourhood of St. Alban's, between the partisans of the houses of York and Lancaster. In the former Henry VI. was taken prisoner by the Yorkists, and in the latter he was recovered by his wife, Margaret of Anjou. A monument to Francis Bacon, Viscount St. Alban's, is to be seen in the church of St. Michael. This town was disfranchised in 1852, on account of the corrupt practices which prevailed among the electors in sending their representatives to Parliament.

ALBAN, ST., the proto-martyr of Britain, who served in the Roman army, and became a convert to Christianity, through one Amphilabus, a monk. B. at St. Alban's, in the 3rd century; D. for his religion in the persecution under Diocletian, 303.

ALBAN'S HEAD, ST., a cape of England, on the coast of the county of Dorset. Lat. 50° 4′ N. Lon. 2° 10′ W. —Height, 441 feet above the level of the sea. On its summit are still to be traced the ruins of a chapel of the 12th century.

ALBAN, ST., sänt al'-banng, the name of several towns in France.—1. In the department Côtes-du-Nord. Pop. 1,490.—2. In the department Isère. Pop. 1,200.—3. In the department Lozère. Pop. 2,300.—4. In the department Tarn. Pop. 700.

ALBANUS, al-bā'-nus, the modern Albano, a mountain with a lake in Italy, 13 miles from Rome. The lake is 6 miles in circumference, and is the crater of an extinct volcano. In its neighbourhood is the village of Castel Gandolfo, the summer residence of the Pope. The mountain is 2,016 feet above the lake; it commands a splendid view of the scenes immortalized in the Last six books of the Æneid of Virgil.

ALBANY, Louisa, Countess of, äl'-ba-ne, daughter of Prince Stolberg, of Gedern, in Germany, and wife of Charles James Edward, the grandson of James II., and whose adventurous spirit led him to enter Scotland with a few followers in 1745 to endeavour to recover the lost crown of his ancestors. Their marriage took place in 1772, but the countess being much the younger, the match was ill-assorted, and she retired to a convent. Subsequently she went to France, but on the death of her husband in 1788, returned to Italy, and finally settled in Florence. Here she secretly allied herself by marriage to Count Alfieri, the poet, taking the title of Countess of Albany, as the relict of the last of the Stuarts. B. 1753; D. at Florence, 1824.—When this lady and her husband, called the young Pretender, resided at Rome, they held a little court, and were addressed as king and queen. She was possessed of a refined mind, loved literature and the arts, and whilst in Florence her house was the resort of the most cultivated and distinguished persons. Alfieri died in her house, and in 1810 she erected to his memory, in the church of Santa Croce, a monument executed by Canova. (See CHARLES EDWARD STUART.)

ALBANY, awl'-ba-ne, a city of the United States, in Albany, a county of the same name, New York, on the W. bank of the Hudson, 160 miles N. New York, 30 N. Hudson, 170 W. Boston, and 230 S. Montreal. It is the legislative capital of New York, and in population, wealth, and commerce, the second city in that state. It is built on a narrow alluvial tract, running along the side of the river, and standing at the head of the sloop-navigation on the Hudson. Among the public buildings are a stone state-house, and a marble city hall with a gilded dome, which when illumined by the rays of the sun, is seen from a great distance, producing a dazzling effect, as it seems to hang in the blue vault of the sky. Most of the private buildings are built of stone or brick, and from the structure of some of the more antiquated houses, the Dutch origin of the place is at once recognized. Manf. Tobacco, sheet-iron, ropes, carriages, hats, soap, and copper-ware. It has both iron-furnaces and type-foundries; saw-mills, malting-houses, and breweries; and it exports large quantities of flour and agricultural produce. Pop. about 55,000. Lat. 42° 39′ N. Lon. 73° 44′ 39″ W.—From a Dutch fort erected in 1612, the present city of Albany has arisen. In 1623 it was founded by the Dutch, and was called Beaver-wyck, then Williamstadt; by which it was known down to 1664, when it came into the possession of the English, who gave it its present name, after James II., to whom, when duke of York and Albany, the proprietorship of the colony was granted by Charles II.

ALBANY, a river of North America, which falls into James's Bay, Lat. 51° 30′ N; Lon. 81° 30′ W. Runs N E. through a chain of small lakes, from the S. end of Winnipeg Lake.

ALBANY, a district of the Cape of Good Hope, bounded on the N. by Caffraria, E. and S. by the Indian Ocean, and W. by the river Zondag. Ext. about 70 miles from E. to W., with an average breadth of 25. Area, 1,792 square miles. Desc. Beautifully undulated by hill and dale, here and there studded with huge timber trees, which give it all the appearance of a succession of immense parks. Rivers. The Great Fish River, Zondag, Karuka, Bosjesmans, Buffalo, and Kasowka. Wild Animals. Lions, leopards, wolves, elephants, and buffaloes. Manf. The settlers are labouring to improve the growth of wool, and have established several woollen manufactories. The principal trade at present consists in ivory, horns, hides, and live stock.—Lat. between 33° and 35° N. Lon. 27° E.—The former inhabitants of this district were a tribe of the Ghonagua Hottentots, but they have gradually given place to European settlers, who may now be considered the sole possessors of the country.

ALBANY, one of the districts in the territories of the Hudson's Bay Company. Lat. between 49° and 55° N. Lon. between 81° and 93° W.

ALBANY, a seaport town of Western Australia, built on the western shore or King George's Sound. Lat. 31° 55′ S. Lon. 117° 55′ E.

ALBARRAZIN, al'-bar-ra'-thene, a strong town of Spain, in the province of Aragon, on the Guadalaviar. Pop. 1,800. 100 leagues E. of Madrid.

ALBATEGNI, al'-ba-ten'-ye, an Arabian astronomer, who lived in Mesopotamia, and who wrote a book on the knowledge of the stars and the obliquity of the zodiac, which was printed at Nuremberg in 1537, 4to, and at Bologna in 1545. Flourished in the 10th century.—He was the first who substituted sines for chords, and who may be said to have determined the length of the tropical year. He is considered to have had a larger number of methods in spherical trigonometry than the Greeks, and to be the greatest of the Arabian school, which connects Greek science with that of our own times.

ALBAY, al-bai, a town of Luzon, one of the Philippine Islands, situate in a fertile volcanic district, and the residence of a governor. Pop., town and district, 13,000.

ALBAZIN, al-baz'-zin, a town of Great Tartary, with a strong fortress to defend it against the Chinese and Mogul Tartars. It is on the road from Moscow to Pekin. Lat. 54° N. Lon. 103° 30′ E.

ALBEMARLE, Duke of, George Monk, äl'-be-marl, a military commander, who, being a younger son of a good family, entered the army as a volunteer, and served in the Netherlands under his relation, Sir Richard Grenville. On the breaking out of the war between Charles I. and the Scotch in 1639, he obtained a colonel's commission, and attended his majesty in both his expeditions to Scotland. At the commencement of the rebellion in Ireland, in 1641, he was sent to that country, where his services were so important as to obtain for him the favour of the Lords Justices, who appointed him governor of Dublin. At the time of his return to England, the town of Nantwich was invested by the Parliamentary forces, against whom he was despatched; but he was taken prisoner and confined in the Tower. Here he remained till 1646, when, on the ruin of the royal cause, he was released on condition of accepting a command in the army of the Parliament, to which he consented. He was now despatched to Ireland to subdue the rebels there; but concluding an unsatisfactory peace with them, he drew upon himself the indignation of the Parliament, who passed a vote of censure upon his conduct. Cromwell, however, had discovered the great military talents which he possessed, and, raising him to the rank of a lieutenant-general, conferred upon him the chief command of the army in Scotland. Whilst here, his conduct was such as to excite the suspicions of the Protector, who, not long before his death, wrote him a letter to which he added this post-script:—"There be that tell me that there is a certain cunning fellow in Scotland, called George Monk, who is said to be in wait there to introduce Charles Stuart: I pray you use your diligence to apprehend him and send him up to me." On the death of Cromwell, the position of Monk was one of extreme difficulty; but having a powerful army at his command, he determined to march into England. That he was favourable to the restoration of the Stuart dynasty, the sagacity of the late Protector had already discovered; but as he acted with extreme caution, no one could positively decide as to what were the real objects he had in view. Accordingly, when he arrived in England, he was courted by the republicans, whilst the royalists feared that he would set up for himself. The moderate party, however, pressed him to call a free parliament, to which, being in accordance with his own desires, he acceded. When this assembly met, they voted the restoration of the king, with whom General Monk had carried on a secret correspondence, and who was consequently restored to his throne without violence or bloodshed. Thus was this great event effected by the prudence of one man, who became an object of the highest esteem, both with the people and the king. Wealth and honours were now heaped upon him. He was created duke of Albemarle, with a pension of £7,000 a year, and subsequently was appointed, in conjunction with Prince Rupert, admiral of the fleet, and gained a great victory over the Dutch, in an engagement which lasted three days, off the mouth of the Thames. Whilst the plague ravaged the city of London, he remained among the inhabitants, many of whom regarded his presence at such a period as a great consolation. B. at Potheridge, near Torrington, Devonshire, 1603; D. in London, 1670.—The character of Monk, as represented by Macaulay, is that of a prudent and cautious rather than a bold and far-seeing man; and hence the impenetrable secrecy with which he veiled his policy on the death of the great Cromwell. In private life he was possessed of many virtues; and although it is said that he never feared the shot of a cannon, he had a wholesome dread of his wife, who was a mistress of the language of Billingsgate, the daughter of a common blacksmith, and had been bred a milliner. She bore him a son, who was named Christopher, duke of Albemarle, and who, in 1688, died governor of Jamaica. The general was the author of a work on military and political affairs, which was published in 1671, and a collection of his letters was printed in 1715. He was interred in the chapel of Henry VII. in Westminster Abbey.

ALBEMARLE, a central county of the United States, in Virginia. Area, 700 square miles. Desc. Diversified with hill and dale, and irrigated principally by the head-waters of the Rivanna. Pro. Wheat, rye, Indian corn, oats, potatoes, and tobacco. Vast herds and flocks of cattle, sheep, and swine are raised. Manf. These consist of cotton and leather; there are many flour, grist, and saw mills, and some distilleries. Pop. from 35,000 to 40,000, of whom more than two-thirds are slaves. Chief town, Charlottesville.

ALBEMARLE SOUND, an inlet in the United States, on the coast of North Carolina, in the N.E. part of the state. It is 60 miles long from E. to W. and from 4 to 15 wide, and communicates with Pamlico Sound and the ocean by several narrow inlets, and with Chesapeake Bay by a canal cut through Dismal Swamp.

ALBEMARLE, or AUMALE, a town of France, in the department of Lower Seine, situate on the Bresle, 13 miles from Neufchâtel. Manf. Earthenware, woollens, and serges. Pop. upwards of 2,000.—In 1592 a combat was here fought with the Spaniards, and Henry IV. wounded.

ALBENDORF, al'-ben-dorf, a village of Prussian Silesia, 8 miles from Glatz. Pop. 1,300. In its neighbourhood is the sanctuary of New Jerusalem, said to be annually resorted to by 80,000 pilgrims.

ALBENGA, al-bain'-ga, a province belonging to the continental dominions of the king of Sardinia, situate on the southern slope of the Apennines, near where they join the maritime Alps. Ext. Thirty miles, with an average breadth of 18, along the coast of the Mediterranean Sea. Area, 263 square miles. Desc. Diversified with mountains and valleys. Of the few plains in the Genoese territories, that of Albenga is remarkable for its fertility. Pro. Oil, corn, hemp, wine, and fruit. Many of the inhabitants pursue a seafaring life. Pop. about 60,000.

ALBENGA, chief town of the above, is the see of a bishop, and distant 42 miles S. from Genoa. Pop. 5,000, mostly agricultural.—This is the Albingaunum of the ancients, and in the Middle Ages figured as a municipal town under the supremacy of Genoa. In 1796 it was, for a short time, the head-quarters of Napoleon.

ALBERBURY, al'-ber-ber'-re, a parish of England and Wales, 8 miles from Shrewsbury. Pop. 2,000.—In this parish old Parr was born in 1483.

ALBERCHE, al'-ber-chai, a river of Spain, province of Toledo, which joins the Tagus, near Talavera de la Reyna.

ALBERGATI CAPACELLI, the Marquis Francis, al'-bair-ga'-te ca'-pa-chel'-le, an Italian senator as well as a comic writer, who spent his early youth in every kind of dissipation, and did not apply himself to study before he had attained his thirty-fourth year. At forty, however, he had not only become a powerful dramatist, but such an excellent performer, as to merit the title of the Garrick of the Italian nobility. B. at Bologna, 1730; D. 1802. The works of this man have been pronounced unrivalled for wit, humour, facetious sallies, and knowledge of the world. A complete edition was published at Venice in 1783, in 12 vols. 8vo.

ALBERGOTTI, Francis, al'-bair-got'-e, an Italian civilian, the disciple of Baldi, and who, after exercising his profession as an advocate at Arezzo, removed to Florence, where he received the honour of nobility. His character for veracity was so great, that he had the title of teacher of solid truth. Flourished in the 14th century.

ALBERIC, al'-be-rik, a French historian, and canon of AIX, who, not being able to take an active part in the first crusade, wrote its history from the year 1095 to 1120. Lived in the 13th century. His Chronicle was printed at Helmstadt in 1584.

ALBERIC DE ROSATE, dai ro-sa'-te, of Bergamo, a lawyer, who wrote Commentaries on the Decretals. Lived in the 14th century.

ALBEROBELLO, al'-ber-o-bel'-o, a Neapolitan town in the province of Terra di Bari. Pop. 4,000.

ALBERONA, al'-be-ro'-na, a Neapolitan town in the province of Capitanata, 22 miles from Foggia. Pop. 2,500.

ALBERONI, Julius, al'-bai-ro'-ne, who, having entered into orders, became curate of a village near Parma, where he happened to relieve the wants of the secretary of the duke of Vendôme, who had been robbed. Some time afterwards the duke entered Italy with his army, for which there was no means of providing, as the peasantry had taken the precaution to conceal their corn. He happened to be in the neighbourhood of the village, in which the poor curate, who had formerly relieved the necessities of his secretary, resided. Recollecting this circumstance, he was sent for in the present distress of the duke, to whom he revealed the secret places in which the peasantry had concealed their grain. This service was so great, that the duke, on returning to Madrid, took him with him, and procured him the favour of the princess of Urfias, the favourite of Philip V. By her recommendation, he was appointed agent for the duke of Parma at the Spanish court, and greatly advanced the interests of his sovereign, by obtaining Elizabeth Farnese, princess of Parma, for his second wife. For this, Alberoni was made a privy counsellor, then was created prime minister, and finally had a cardinalship conferred on him. Having thus obtained the highest honours, he engaged himself with schemes for the benefit of the Spanish nation; but, being undermined by foreign influence, he was deprived of his posts and banished to Rome. B. at Placentia, 1664; D. at Placentia, 1752.

ALBERT, ăl'-bert, Duke of Austria, and subsequently Emperor of Germany, was the son of Rudolph of Hapsburg, who founded the Austrian imperial dynasty. He was crowned in 1298, after defeating and slaying his competitor, Adolphus of Nassau, and was assassinated in 1308, by his nephew John, son of the duke of Suabia, whose paternal estates he had seized.—On the bank of the Reuss, where Albert was murdered, Agnes, his eldest daughter, and queen of Hungary, built a monastery, and called it Königsfelden. Here, after taking a dreadful vengeance, not only on the assassins of her father, but on many innocent families whom she supposed implicated in their crime, she shut herself up and ended her days. Her apartments are still shown in the dilapidated building, which stands on the high road from Basle to Baden and Zurich, and in the vicinity of the fortress of Hapsburg, whence originally sprung the house of Austria.

ALBERT II., Emperor and Duke of Austria, who, having married the daughter of Sigismund, emperor and king of Hungary, had bequeathed to him by that monarch his dominions of Hungary and Bohemia. D. 1439.

ALBERT, Archduke of Austria, was the sixth son of the emperor Maximilian II. He adopted the ecclesiastical profession, and obtained a cardinalship and the archbishopric of Toledo. In 1584 he was made viceroy of Portugal, in which capacity his conduct was so satisfactory to his uncle, Philip II., king of Spain, that he sent him into the Low Countries to endeavour to quell the insurrection which had risen in the seven United Provinces. In this, however, he had little success. In 1598 he married the daughter of Philip, on which he renounced the ecclesiastical character, and in 1600 encountered Prince Maurice of Nassau at Nieuport, and was defeated. This battle decided the independence of Holland. Albert afterwards directed his energies against Ostend, to which he laid siege, and after the loss of 100,000 men on both sides, the place fell before his arms. A twelve years' truce was now concluded with the Dutch, and, before the termination of that period, Albert expired. B. 1559; D. 1621.

ALBERT, Prince of Mecklenburg, was elected king of Sweden in 1364 by those nobles who had become dissatisfied with the reign of Magnus II., and by whom that monarch was deposed. The result of this measure was a war between the partisans of Albert and Magnus, which lasted several years, and which was finally closed in 1371, by Magnus making a formal resignation of the crown to Albert. The new monarch, however, was little less fortunate in pleasing his nobles than the former king. Accordingly, those disaffected chiefs offered the crown to Margaret, queen of Denmark and Norway, who marched into the country, and after a fierce battle at Talkoping, in 1388, took Albert prisoner. Albert was kept in confinement till 1394, when he recovered his liberty on condition of ceding Stockholm to Margaret. He attempted again to recover his crown, but failing, spent the remainder of his life in Mecklenburg. D. 1412.

ALBERT, Margrave of Brandenburg, the first duke of Prussia, was elected grand-master of the Teutonic order in 1511, and entered into a war with Sigismund, king of Poland, in defence of the independence of that order. A peace was concluded at Cracow in 1525, by which it was stipulated that the grand-master should possess Prussia as a fief of Poland. Not long after this, Albert avowed himself a Protestant, and married a princess of Denmark. In consequence of this act he fell under the ban of the empire. B. 1490; D. 1568.—A descendant of this prince threw off the allegiance of Poland, and his son, Frederick I., relinquished the title of duke for that of king of Prussia, in 1701.

ALBERT, Margrave of Brandenburg, called the Alcibiades of Germany, was the son of Casimir, margrave of Culenbach, who, dying when he was an infant, left him in the care of his uncle. In 1511 he took possession of his hereditary estates, and in the disturbances of Germany during the reign of Charles V., entered into the confederacy formed by Maurice, elector of Saxony, and other princes, against that monarch. He committed many excesses in this war, burning towns, and levying heavy contributions wherever he marched. Subsequently a league was formed against him, at the head of which was his old ally the elector of Saxony. Between these princes a great battle was fought at Siverhus, in 1553, in which Maurice was slain and Albert wounded. He was afterwards put under the ban of the empire, and deprived of his possessions. B. 1522; D. 1558.

ALBERT, Charles d' daarl dal'-bair, duke of Luynes, a favourite of Henry IV. and Louis XIII. He rose to the highest honours, caused the fall of the Marshal d'Ancre, and ruled the kingdom as he pleased; so that even his master was jealous and afraid of his power. He fomented the war with the Huguenots, and in 1621 laid siege to Montauban, where he was seized with a fever, of which he died. B. 1578.

ALBERT, Jeanne d', djän' dal'-bair, daughter of Margaret, queen of Navarre. At the age of eleven she was united to the duke of Cleves, but the marriage was afterwards annulled by the pope. In 1548 she espoused Antoine de Bourbon, duke of Vendôme. In 1553 she was delivered of a son, who was afterwards Henry IV. of France, and on the death of her father, in 1555, became queen of Navarre. In 1562 she lost her husband, when, although opposed by the kings of France and Spain, she eagerly began to establish the Reformation in her kingdom. Being invited to the French court to assist at the nuptials of her son with Margaret of Valois, she suddenly expired, not without suspicion of having been poisoned. B. 1528; D. 1572.

ALBERT, Erasmus, a German divine, who was educated under Luther, and who is known as the author of a book entitled the "Koran of the Cordeliers," ridiculing the impiety of the Franciscans, who compare the actions of St. Francis with those of Jesus Christ. D. 1571.—His book was printed in German, with a preface by Luther, in 1531, and in Latin in 1542. The last edition of it is that of Amsterdam, in 2 vols. 12mo, 1734.

ALBERT, Joseph d', of Luynes, prince of Grimberghen, and ambassador from the emperor Charles VII. of Germany to the French court. B. 1671; D. 1758.—He was the author of—1. "Timandre instruit par son Génie." 2. "Le Songe d'Alcibiade," 1759, 8vo.

ALBERT, Krantz, a German professor of divinity. B. at Hamburg; D. 1517.—He wrote the "History of Saxony, and of the Vandals;" a Chronicle from the time of Charlemagne to 1504, &c.

ALBERT, of Stade, a Benedictine monk, who wrote a Chronicle from the creation to 1256. Lived in the 13th century.

ALBERT, of Strasburg, who compiled a Chronicle from 1270 to 1378. Lived in the 14th century.

ALBERT DURER. (See DURER.)

ALBERT, PRINCE, Albert Francis Charles Emmanuel, prince of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, and consort of Queen Victoria, is the second son of Duke Ernest I., and younger brother of the present duke of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha. He received the rudiments of his education under the consistorial councillor Florschutz, and completed it at the University of Bonn. A few days previous to his marriage with the queen, on the 10th of February, 1840, he was naturalized by an act of Parliament, and by another act, passed on the 4th of August of the same year, it was provided that he should assume the responsibility of regent should the queen die before the next lineal heir to the throne should have attained the age of eighteen. Besides assisting in many other noble undertakings, he took an active part in the Great Exhibition of 1851, and contributed not a little to its success. The tendencies of the Prince Consort's mind are entirely of a pacific character, and all his pursuits aim at exalting and refining the sentiments, whilst ameliorating the condition, of the subjects of the amiable sovereign whose husband he is. B. 1819.

ALBERT EDWARD, Prince of Wales, and heir to the British throne, merits a place in this work on account of the high responsibilities which he is, in all probability, destined to fulfil as sovereign of the British empire. On the 10th of November, 1858, he was gazetted as having been invested with the rank of a colonel in the army. Speaking of this circumstance, the Times said,—"The significance of this event is, that it marks the period when the heir to the British throne is about to take rank among men, and to enter formally upon a career, which every loyal subject of the queen will pray may be a long and a happy one, for his own sake and for the sake of the vast empire which, in the course of nature, he will one day be called to govern. The best wish that we can offer for the young prince is, that in his own path he may ever keep before him the bright example of his royal mother, and show himself worthy of her name." There are few in these realms who will not give a fervent response to these sentiments. B. November 9th, 1841.

ALBERT, a town of France, department of Somme, 18 miles from Amiens. Manf. Woollen, cotton, leather, and paper. Pop. 5,000.

ALBERT, a division of Cape Colony, South Africa, annexed in 1848. It has the Orange river on the N., the Kraäi river on the E., and the Storm-beg mountains on the S. and E.

ALBERT LAKE, in Russell county, South Australia, and united to Victoria Lake by a strait at its northern extremity.

ALBERT TOWN, a shipping port of South Australia. (See ADELAIDE.)

ALBERTET, al'-bair-tai, a poet and mathematician of Provence, who flourished in the 13th century.

ALBERTI, Cherubino, al-bair'-te, an eminent historical painter and engraver of Italy. B. 1552; D. 1615.

ALBERTI, Aristotile, an ingenious Italian mechanic, who, it is said, removed the entire tower of Maria del Tempio at Bologna to a distance of thirty-five paces.—He went to Hungary, where he erected various works, and obtained the title of chevalier.—Lived in the 16th century.

ALBERTI, Andrew, author of a Latin book on perspective, printed at Nuremberg, 1678, folio.

ALBERTI, John, a German lawyer, who abridged the Koran, with notes, for which he was knighted. D. 1559. He published in 1556 the New Testament in Syriac, the whole edition of which, with the exception of 500 copies, were sent to the East: he also wrote a Syriac grammar.

ALBERTI, Leander, provincial of the Dominicans, and distinguished for his literary attainments. B. at Bologna; D. 1552.—He wrote,—1. "A History of Illustrious Dominicans," folio. 2. "A Description of Italy," 4to. 3. Various Biographical Memoirs. 4. "The History of Bologna."

ALBERTI, Leoni Baptista, an eminent architect, who was employed by Pope Nicholas V., and who was the architect of several excellent works in Florence. D. 1485.—He wrote upon painting, sculpture, and architecture, and also on morality and arithmetic.

ALBERTI, Giovanni, a brother of the above, who excelled in perspective and in historical subjects. B. near Florence, 1558; D. 1601.

ALBERTI, Dominico, a Venetian musician, who was for some time in London, but who afterwards went to Rome, where he attained great eminence as a singer and a performer. He excelled on the harpsichord, and invented a new style of playing on that instrument. Lived in the 18th century.—In 1737 he set to music Metastasio's "Endimione," and published some other fine pieces of his composition.

ALBERTINELLI MARIOTTO, al'-ber-te-nel'-e mar-e-ot'-o, a pupil of Roselli, an imitator of Fra Bartolomeo, and one of the finest of the early Florentine painters. His chef d'œuvre is in the Imperial Gallery of Florence, and is known as the Visitation of Elizabeth, mother of John the Baptist, to the Virgin. He was a man of singularly dissipated habits, to which he fell a victim at the early age of 35. B. at Florence, 1475.

ALBERTINUS, Francis, al-ber-ti'-nus, an Italian Jesuit, who wrote a system of theology, and a book in which he maintained that brutes have their guardian angels. D. 1619.

ALBERTINUS, Mussatus, an Italian, who wrote the history of the emperor Henry VII., and several poetical pieces. Lived in the 14th century.

ALBERTON, al'-ber-ton, a small settlement in Victoria, Australia. Lat. 38° S. Lon. between 144° and 145° W.

ALBERTRANDT, John Christian, al'-ber-tran'-de, a Pole, who, under the educational care of the Jesuits, rose to be bishop of Zenopolis. He subsequently became keeper of the medals of King Stanislaus, who, on account of his great merit as a numismatist, presented him with the order of St. Stanislaus, the great medal of merit, besides the bishopric of Zenopolis. In the 70th year of his age, he was called upon to preside over the newly-instituted Royal Society of the Friends of Science at Warsaw, of which he continued an active member until his death. B. at Warsaw, 1731; D. 1808.

ALBERTUS, al-ber'-tus, an archbishop of Mentz, who conspired against the emperor Henry V., for which he was imprisoned. B. at Lorraine; D. 1137.

ALBERTUS MAGNUS, a learned Dominican, who became successively vicar-general and provincial of his order, and whom Pope Alexander IV. made master of the sacred palace, and bishop of Ratisbon. These honours he soon resigned, and retired to his cell to enjoy his studies. His knowledge of nature and science was so great, that he was accounted a magician. B. at Lauingen, in Suabia, 1205; D. at Cologne, 1280. Albertus was the first to give to the students of the Middle Ages an encyclopædia of knowledge, for which, with his other performances, he has been styled "the Great." His works, in 21 vols. folio, were printed at Lyons in 1615.

ALBERTVILLE, al'-bair-veel, the capital city of Upper Savoy, in the Sardinian states, situate near the junction of the Isère with the Arly. Pop. 4,000. This town is in Italian called Alberto Poli, and has been formed by the union of the towns Conflans and Ospitale.

ALBEZI, Bartholomew, al'-bait'-se, or Bartholomew of Pisa, a Franciscan monk, who wrote several books, the most noted of which is that on the conformity of St. Francis with Jesus Christ; in which he makes the saint equal, if not superior, to the Saviour. D. 1401.

ALBI, or ALBY, al'-be, the capital city of the department of Tarn, in France. It is situate on an eminence above the river Tarn, and is the see of an archbishop. Manf. Coarse woollen cloths, cotton and hosiery goods, small wares, and candles. It has bullet-foundries and copper and iron works; several oil and paper mills; and in the neighbourhood coal-mines are worked. Anise, and other seeds, in considerable quantities, are grown in the vicinity. Pop. about 14,000. Lat. 43° 55′ 4″ N. Lon. 2° 8′ 39″ E.—During the reign of Louis XIV. this town was one of the strongholds of Protestantism, and, according to some, the sect called the Albigenses derive their name from it. It has a very fine cathedral, called Sainte-Cécile.

ALBI, Henry, a learned Jesuit, who wrote a history of illustrious cardinals. Flourished in the 17th century.

ALBICUS, an archbishop of Prague, whose attention to Huss and other reformers has caused many writers to attack him violently. Lived in the 15th century.—He wrote some medical pieces, which were printed at Leipsic in 1484.

ALBINEN, al-be'-nen, a village of Switzerland, in the canton of Vallais, about 5 miles from the Rhone, on its north side. Lat. 46° 23′ N. Lon. 7° 38′ E. This village stands on the brink of a precipice overlooking a valley, whence there is no access to it, but by ladders placed against the face of the perpendicular rock. Notwithstanding this, the inhabitants, men, women, and children, ascend and descend often with heavy burdens, without fear, and with comparatively few accidents.

ALBINI, al-bi'-ni, two Roman orators of great merit, mentioned by Cicero. This name is common to many tribunes of the people.

ALBINO, al-be'-no, a town of Austrian Lombardy, in the neighbourhood of which alabaster is found of surpassing beauty. Pop. 2,500.

ALBINO, the name given to a variety of the human species, distinguished by an unnatural whiteness of skin, white hair, red or blue eyes, and a feeble constitution. They are most numerous in Africa amongst the blacks.

ALBINOVANUS CELSUS, al'-be-no-vai'-nus sel'-sus, a Latin poet, who was intimate with Ovid. He wrote elegies, epigrams, and heroic poetry; but only two of his pieces are extant, one, an elegy on the death of Drusus, and another on that of Mecænas. Flourished A.D. 16.

ALBINUS, al-bi'nus, a Roman general, who was made governor of Britain by Commodus. After the murder of Pertinax, he was elected emperor by the soldiers in Britain. Severus had also been invested with the imperial dignity by his own army; and these two rivals, with about 50,000 men each, came into Gaul to decide the fate of the empire. Severus was victorious, and he ordered the head of Albinus to be cut off, and his body to be thrown into the Rhone, A.D. 198. B. at Adrumetum, in Africa.—A prætorian, sent to Sylla as ambassador from the senate during the civil wars. He was put to death by Sylla's soldiers.—A Roman plebeian, who received the Vestals into his chariot in preference to his family, when they fled from Rome, which the Gauls had sacked.

ALBINUS, Bernard, whose real name was Weiss, i.e. White, studied physic at Leyden, where, in 1702, he became professor in that faculty. B. at Dessau; D. 1721.—He wrote several valuable treatises on medicine.

ALBINUS, Bernard Sigfred, son of the above, became professor of medicine at Leyden. B. at Leyden, 1683; D. 1771.—His anatomical plates, in 3 vols. folio, 1744, 1749, and 1753, prove him to have been one of the greatest anatomists that ever lived. His younger brother, Christian Bernard, distinguished himself also as medical professor at Utrecht.

ALBINUS, Eleazar, a writer who published a natural history of birds, a French translation of which appeared at the Hague in 1750, 2 vols. 4to.

ALBINUS, Peter, professor of poetry and mathematics at Wirtemberg, and secretary to the elector at Dresden. He published the "Chronicles of Misnia" in 1580, and other pieces.

ALBION, al'-be-on, son of Neptune by Amphitrite, came into Britain, established a kingdom, and first introduced astrology and the art of building ships.—He was killed at the mouth of the Rhone, with stones thrown by Jupiter, because he opposed the passage of Hercules.

ALBION, the largest island of Europe, now called Great Britain. The etymology of the name is very uncertain. The Greek alphon, 'white,' the Phœnician alp, 'high,' or alpin, 'high mountain,' and the Hebrew alben, 'white,' have each been said to furnish its origin, from the height of the chalky cliffs on the coasts of the island. Some, however, have derived it from King Albion. The ancients compared the shape of this island to a long buckler, or to the iron of a hatchet.

ALBION, a name given to several post townships in the United States. The population of none of them exceeds 2,000.

ALBION, NEW, a large indefinite tract of the N.W. coast of America. This name was given by Sir Francis Drake to California, with part of the adjoining coast, when he took possession of it. But recent geographers, and among others Humboldt, limit the denomination of New Albion to that part of the coast which extends from Lat. 43° to 48° N. Captain Cook landed on this coast in 1778, and found the natives more tenacious of their property than any of the savage nations he had hitherto met with. They would not part with wood, water, grass, or the most trifling article, without a compensation, and were sometimes very unreasonable in their demands. At first they seemed to prefer iron to every other article of commerce, but at last gave the preference to brass. Desc. Full of mountains, the tops of which are covered with snow, whilst the valleys and the seacoast abound with trees, forming a beautiful prospect, as of one vast forest.

ALBIS, al'-bis, a mountain-range in the canton of Zug, Switzerland, running in a southerly direction nearly parallel with the Lake of Zurich. Huthberg, attaining a height of 2,792 feet, is its loftiest summit.

ALBITTE, Antome Louis, al'-beet, one of those fierce Jacobins who distinguished themselves by the force and violence with which they advocated their principles during the great French revolution. In 1791 he was elected, with Sers for his colleague, a member of the Legislative Assembly, representing the department of the Lower Seine, whilst following, at the same time, the profession of an advocate at Dieppe. In this assembly he seems to have been actuated by a desire to annihilate every vestige that might be supposed to recall the recollection of a king. He and Sers obtained the passing of the resolution which decreed destruction to every statue of a sovereign, and placed a representation of Liberty in its stead. He now became a member of the National Convention, and was among those who first voted against allowing Louis XVI. counsel at his trial, and next that he should be put to death. In 1793 he carried the measure for massacring prisoner emigrants in foreign countries, whether found with or without arms. He seems to have been characterized by a wolfish ferocity, and to have gloated over the cruelties which he had been the means of inflicting upon his fellow-beings. He became commissioner to the armies of the republic, and rose to the military rank of adjutant-general. In this capacity he was present at the siege of Lyons, and afterwards at Toulon, where he became acquainted with Napoleon. Although his career was, as that of a wild beast, tracked with blood, he was still successful, and plunged into the greatest excesses of extravagance. At Bourg, he bathed every morning in the milk which was brought to supply the inhabitants of the town, and in his private hours would amuse himself by guillotining in effigy the king of England and the Pope. Although in great danger, and voted to be arrested by the Convention, after the 20th May, 1795,—amongst the most dreadful days of the revolution,—he was so fortunate as to make his escape, and subsequently, after the general amnesty of the 26th October, 1795, was appointed by the Directory municipal commissary at Dieppe. When the Directory fell, he became a warm partisan of Napoleon, who made him his sub-inspector of reviews. As such he accompanied the emperor in his invasion of Russia, and during the retreat from Moscow died of cold, hunger, and fatigue, 1812.—This wretch is said to have preserved his existence for three days on the remains of a flask of brandy, which in his dying moments he shared with one of his companions; and this is the only act of benevolence recounted in his history.

ALBIUS, al'-be-us, a man, father to a famous spendthrift. A name of the poet Tibullus.

ALBLINGEN, al'-bling-en, a considerable village of Switzerland, in the canton of Friburg.

ALBO, Joseph, al'-bo, a Spanish rabbi, whose learning was considerable, and who, in 1412, assisted at a conference between the Jews and the Christians. Lived in the 15th century.—He wrote a book against the Gospels, and called it "Sepher Hikkarim."

ALBOIN, al-boin, a king of Lombardy, who on ascending the throne, demanded Rosamond, the daughter of Curimund, in marriage, and being refused, commenced hostilities against Curimund, whom he slew, and whose skull he converted into a drinking-cup. Rosamond also fell into his hands, and Alboin made her his wife. In 567 he conquered Italy, and removed the seat of his government to Pavia, where, at a feast, he sent some wine to Rosamond in her father's skull, at the sight of which her resentment was so great, that she caused him to be assassinated in 570.

ALBOLADREY, al-bo-la'-dre, a town of Andalusia, in Spain, on the banks of the Almeria, and about 20 miles from the town of Almeria. The inhabitants are chiefly occupied with agricultural pursuits, and some of them are employed in the lead-mines of the Sierra de Gador. Pop. 2,100.

ALBON, Jacques d', djak dal'-bon, marquis of Fronsac, and marshal of St. Andre, a French nobleman, who in 1547 was made gentleman of the bedchamber by Henry II. In 1550 he was deputed to bear the collar of his order to Henry VIII. of England, by whom he was invested with that of the Garter. On his return, he was appointed to the command of the army in Champagne, where he greatly distinguished himself; but at the battle of St. Quentin was taken prisoner. On the death of Henry II. he was chosen one of the regency. Killed at the battle of Dreux, in 1562.—The Huguenots called Albon "the harquebusier of the West."

ALBONA, al-bo'-na, a town of Austria, in the province of Illyria, 20 miles from Fiume. Its neighbourhood abounds with excellent fruit, especially olives, grapes, and chestnuts. Pop. 1,600.

ALBONI, Signora Marietta, al-bo'-ne, a charming and popular contralto singer, who made her début in England as Arsace, in "Semiramide," in the spring of 1847, the same season which introduced Jenny Lind to a London audience. From the time of her first appearance, she has maintained a great and deserved reputation as a vocalist of very considerable talent. B. at Citta di Castello, in Romagna, 1826.—In 1853, Alboni was married to Count Pepoli, an Italian nobleman.

ALBOR, al'-bor, a small island of the North Atlantic Ocean, one of the Bahamas.

ALBORAN, al'-bor-an, a small island belonging to Spain, off the Mediterranean coast, the resort of smugglers, pirates, and fishing-vessels. It is not more than 2 miles long and 1 broad. Lat. 35° 58′ N. Lon. 31′ 1′ W.

ALBORNOZ, Giles Alvarez Carillo, al-bor'-noth, archbishop of Toledo, was born in New Castille. On being raised to the dignity of cardinal, he resigned the archbishopric. He was of a very bold spirit, and taking up arms in favour of Pope Urban V., he brought all Italy into subjection, and then retired to Viterbo. B. at Cuença, in Spain; D. at Viterbo, 1364.—Albornoz was a man of chivalrous spirit, and a successful military commander, although an ecclesiastical teacher. He was the instrument of saving the life of his sovereign, Alphonso XI., whilst engaged with the Moors at Tarifa. After he had subdued Italy, Urban sent for him to give an account of the manner in which he had conducted the administration of the country; when he loaded a cart with old locks and keys, and bringing them before the pontiff, said, "Here are the locks and keys of the towns and castles I have taken for you, and put into your possession, and with which I now present you." Urban was satisfied with his conduct, and remained his friend ever afterwards. He founded the grand college at Barcelona.

ALBOSTAN, al-bos'-tan, a town of Asiatic Turkey, 64 miles from Merash. Pop. estimated at 9,000.

ALBOURN, al'-born, a town and parish of England, in the county of Sussex, 2½ miles from Hurst Pierpoint. Area, 1,280 acres. Pop. 500.

ALBOUZEME, al'-bou-zeme, a small seaport of Morocco. Lat. 35° 10′ N. Lon. 2° 54′ E.

ALBOZ, al'-both, a Spanish town of Andalusia, 40 miles from Almeria. Manf. Blankets, coarse linen fabrics, and earthenware. It has several oil and corn mills. Exp. Corn and oil. Imp. Brandy and wine. Pop. 8,000.

ALBRECHT, Wilhelm, vil'-helm al'-brecht, a distinguished German agriculturist, who taught the science of rural economy in Fellenberg's school at Hofnyl. B. 1786; D. in Franconia, 1848.—He wrote much on agricultural subjects, and edited a weekly journal which was devoted to the science of rural economy. He also edited "Annals of the Agricultural Society of Nassau," to which society he was perpetual secretary.

ALBRICHTON, al-bri-ton, a parish in the county of Salop, 5 miles from Shiffnal. Area, 2,970 acres. Pop. 1,500.

ALBRICUS, ăl-bri'-kus, a philosopher and physician, who received his education at the University of Oxford. Flourished in the 13th century.—He was the author of various works written in Latin.

ALBUCASA, or ALBUCASIS, al-bu-ka'-sa, an Arabian physician, who composed many excellent works, excelled in surgery, and has described many instruments and operations. Lived in the 11th century.

ALBUCILLA, ăl-bu-sil'-la, an immodest woman, mentioned by Tacitus.

ALBUERA, al'-boo-air'-a, a village of Spain, in the province of Estremadura, 13 miles from Badajoz. Pop. 500.—Here the Anglo-Spanish army, under Lord Beresford, defeated the French, under Marshal Soult, after a sanguinary conflict, on the 16th May, 1811. In this battle the allies lost 7,000 and the French 8,000 men, within four hours.

ALBUFEIRA, al'-boo-fair'-a, a Portuguese seaport town in the province of Algarves, 40 miles E. of Cape St. Vincent. Pop. 3,000.—Its harbour is defended by a citadel.

ALBUFERA, al'-boo-fair'-a, a lake of Spain, 7 miles S. of Valencia. It communicates by a narrow strait with the Mediterranean, abounds with fish, and is the haunt of numberless sea-fowl. Ext. 11 miles long and 4 broad.

ALBULA, al-boo'-la, a mountain-pass in Switzerland, Grisons. It crosses Mount Albula from the valley of Bergun. Highest point 7,713 feet above the level of the sea.

ALBULA, ăl'-bu-la, the ancient name of the river Tiber.

ALBUMAZAR, al'-bu-ma'-za, an Arabian physician and astronomer. Lived in the 9th century.—His work entitled "De Magnis Conjunctionibus, Annorum Revolutionibus, ac eorum Perfectionibus," was printed at Venice in 1526, 8vo; and his "Introductio ad Astronomiam" in 1489.

ALBUNEA, ăl-bu'-ne-a, a wood near Tibur and the river Anio.

ALBUQUERQUE, al'-boo-kerk'-ai, a town and castle in Spanish Estremadura, on the frontiers of Portugal, 26 miles from Badajoz. Manf. Woollen and cotton goods. Pop. 6,000.

ALBUQUERQUE ISLANDS, or S.W. KEYS, a group in the Caribbean Sea, 110 miles E. of the Mosquito coast. Lat. 12° 4′ N. Lon. 81° 50′ W.

ALBUQUERQUE, Alphonso, an eminent Portuguese commander, who, in 1505, was sent with a squadron to India, by King Emanuel. In the same year that monarch despatched another, under Francis Albuquerque, who was either a cousin or an uncle to Alphonso. Francis arrived first, and having restored the king of Cochin to his capital, was joined by his relation; when they built a fort, and compelled Zamorin, prince of Calicut, to sue for peace. The two Albuquerques soon after sailed for Portugal, where Alphonso arrived in safety, but the other was lost. In 1508 he sailed for Ormuz, and attacked and subdued Zeifaclin, its king; but he was soon obliged to relinquish this conquest and return to India. Here, in a rash attack on Calicut, he was wounded, and compelled to retreat. In 1510 he took Goa, but was forced to re-embark, on account of a mutiny on board his fleet. He afterwards captured the strong city of Malacca, and projected other enterprises, when he was taken ill at Goa, where he died. B. in a country villa about 20 miles from Lisbon, 1453; D. at Goa, 1515.—This man has been surnamed the "Great," and called the "Portuguese Mars," from the magnitude and extent of his military exploits. He was the first to lead a European fleet into the waters of the Red Sea. That he was a great and enlightened man there can be no question; and this is testified in the rare fact of both Moors and Indians, after his death, repairing to his tomb as to that of a father, to implore redress from the cruelty and wrong which they were doomed to suffer from his successors. Fifty years after his death, his remains were conveyed to Portugal. His last enterprise was against Ormuz, which he took in 1507, and which remained in the hands of the Portuguese until 1622, when, in conjunction with Shah Abbas, it was retaken by the English. (See ABBAS.) The son of Albuquerque was ennobled by Emanuel, king of Portugal, who commanded him to take the name of Alphonso. He wrote a history of his father's enterprises, and died in 1580.

ALBUQUERQUE CORELHO, Edward d', a noble Portuguese, who distinguished himself as a soldier, and wrote a "History of the Wars of Brazil." D. 1658.—His work was printed at Madrid in 1654, 4to.

ALBUS PAGUS, ăl'-bus pai'-gus, a place near Sidon, in Syria, where Antony waited for the arrival of Cleopatra.

ALBUTIUS, ăl-bu'-she-us, a prince of Celtiberia, to whom Scipio restored his wife.

ALBUTIUS, a sordid man, father of Canidia. According to Horace, he beat his servants before they were guilty of any offence, "lest," said he, "I should have no time to punish them when they offend."

ALBUTIUS, Titus, a Roman philosopher, and proprætor of Sardinia, who for corruption was banished by the senate. On account of his attachment to the Grecian language and customs, he is ridiculed by Cicero. D. at Athens.

ALBY, al'-be, a town in Savoy, Sardinian states, 9 miles from Annecy. Pop. 1,100.

ALBY, or ALDBY, al'-be, a parish in the county of Norfolk, 5 miles from Aylsham. Area, 840 acres. Pop. 300.

ALBY, a village of England, in Yorkshire, 10 miles from York.

ALCÆUS, ăl-se'-us, a celebrated lyric poet, of Mitylene, in Lesbos, who fled from a battle, and whose enemies hung up, in the temple of Minerva, the armour which he left in the field. He was a contemporary of the famous Sappho, to whom he paid his addresses. Flourished about 600 B.C.—Of all his works, nothing but a few fragments remain: they are found in Athenæus.

AL-CA-LA, al-ka-la'. There are a great number of towns of this name in Spain, but they are mostly small and unimportant.

ALCALA DE CHIVERT, dai she'-vairt, a town in the province of Valencia, Spain, 29 miles from Castellon. Pop. 5,000.

ALCALA DE LOS GAZULES, al-ka-la' dai los ga'-thoo-less, a town and district of Spain, 30 miles E. of Cadiz. Pop. upwards of 6,000, chiefly agricultural.

ALCALA DE GUIDARA, dai ge-da'-ra, a town and district of Spain, 7 miles from Seville. Pop. 7,000.

ALCALA DE HENARES, dai hai-nar'-ess, a walled New Castilian town of Spain, situate on the right bank of the Henares, 17 miles from Madrid. Pop. 5,000.—This town is the birthplace of Cervantes, who was born in 1547; of Ferdinand, the brother of Charles V.; of the poet Figuerroa; and of Antonio de Polis, the historian of the conquest of Mexico. The polyglot Bible of Alcala, by Cardinal Ximenes, was printed here. It took 12 years to complete it, namely, from 1502—1517, and the cost exceeded £11,000.

ALCALA DEL RIO, dail re'-o, a town of Spain, standing on the right bank of the Guadalquiver, 10 miles from Seville. Pop. 3,000.

ALCALA LA REAL, lai rai-al', a town of Spain, in Andalusia, 27 miles from Jaen, with a rich abbey. It has a trade in wool and wine. Pop. 12,000.—The Spaniards were here defeated in 1810 by the French.

ALCAMENES, al-ka-me'-nes, one of the Agidæ, king of Sparta, known by his apothegms. He succeeded his father Teleclus, and reigned thirty-seven years. Lived 900 years B.C. The Helots rebelled in his reign.

ALCAMENES, a Greek sculptor, the disciple and rival of Phidias. He was one of the three greatest statuaries of ancient Greece, the others being Phidias and Polycletus. Flourished in the 5th century B.C.

ALCAMO, al-ka'-mo, a town and district of Sicily, the town being 25 miles from Trapani. Near it are the ruins of of the ancient Segesta. Pop. town and district, 16,000.

ALCANDER, ăl-kăn'-der, a Lacedæmonian youth, who accidentally put out one of the eyes of Lycurgus, and was generously forgiven by the sage, though the people were clamorous for his punishment.

ALCANEDE, al'-ka-nai-dai, a town of Portuguese Estremadura, 12 miles from Santarem. Pop. 3,000.

ALCANIZ, al'-ka-neeth, a walled town of Spain, on the right bank of the Guadaloupe, 60 miles from Saragossa. Pop. 6,000.

ALCANTARA, al'-kan-ta'-ra, a town of Portuguese Estremadura, on the Tagus, near Lisbon.

ALCANTARA, the Arabic name, signifying the 'bridge,' of a fortified town in Spanish Estremadura, on the Tagus, which is crossed by an old Roman stone bridge. It is 35 miles from Caceres, and trades principally in cloth, wool, wheat, barley, rye, and oil. These it sends to Zarza, Ceclavin, and Portugal, receiving in return, linen, wearing apparel, and colonial produce. Its vicinity abounds with fruits and vegetables, and its inhabitants gather a great deal of honey and wax. Pop. 4,500.—The bridge from which Alcantara takes its name, was erected by Trajan A.D. 105, and has outlived the wrath of the elements and the violence of men for seventeen centuries. In 1809 it was partly blown up by Colonel Mayne; from which time it has remained in a partially ruinous state.

ALCANTARA, or ALCANTARILLA, a town of Spain, in Seville, near the Guadalquiver.

ALCANTARA, a thriving town of Brazil, in Maranhao, opposite the island of Maranhao.

ALCARAZ, al-ka'-rath, a town of Spain, in the province of New Castile, 34 miles from Albacete. Manf. Chiefly woollens; and there are in the neighbourhood mines of zinc and copper. Pop. 7,500.

ALCATHOUS, ăl-kăth'-o-us, a son of Pelops, who being suspected of murdering his brother Chrysippus, came to Megara, where he killed a lion which had destroyed the king's son. He succeeded to the kingdom of Megara, and, in commemoration of his services, festivals, called Alcathoia, were instituted there.

ALCEDO, Antonio de, an-to'-ne-o dai al-thai'-do, a native of Spanish America, who has distinguished himself as a geographer. Little or nothing is known of his history, more than that he was an officer in the royal army, and an ardent geographical student. He spent twenty years of his life in compiling a "Dictionary of American Geography," which in 1786 was published in Madrid.

ALCENOR, ăl-se'-nor, an Argive, who, alone, with Chromius, survived the battle between 300 of his countrymen and 300 Lacedæmonians.

ALCESTE, or ALCESTIS, ăl-sest'-te, daughter of Pelias, married Admetus. She, with her sisters, put to death her father, that he might be restored to youth and vigour by Medea, who, however, refused to perform her promise. Upon this, the sisters fled to Admetus, who married Alceste; but being pursued by an army headed by their brother Acastus, Admetus was taken prisoner, and redeemed from death by the generous offer of his wife, who was sacrificed in his stead to appease the shades of her father. Some say that Alceste, with an unusual display of conjugal affection, laid down her life for her husband, when she had been told by an oracle that he could never recover from a disease except some one of his friends died in his stead. She had many suitors while she lived with her father.

ALCESTER, ăl'-ses-ter, commonly pronounced aulster, or auster, a town of England, in Warwickshire, at the confluence of the Aln and Arrow; from the former of which it takes its name. It is 16 miles from Warwick, and 103 from London. Pop. 2,300.—The antiquity of Alcester is very great, and its name indicates it to have been a Roman station. In its neighbourhood, coins and other Roman remains have been found.

ALCHABITIUS, al'-cha-bit'-e-us, an Arabian astrologer, who lived in the 12th century. He wrote "On the Judgment of the Stars," "The Conjunction of the Planets," and "Optics," printed at Venice in 1491, and at Seville in 1521.

ALCHINDUS, al-chin'-dus, an Arabian astrologer and physician, some of whose works are extant; one of which, upon the art of magic, is full of superstition and absurdity. Lived about the 12th century.

ALCIAT, Andrew, al'-se-a, a famous lawyer, who in 1529 was chosen professor of law at Anjou. He subsequently removed to Bourges, to discharge the same office, at the desire of Francis I. The duke of Milan prevailed upon him to return to his native country, where he was created a senator. B. at Milan, 1492; D. at Pavia, 1550.—His most esteemed work is his "Emblems." He left his fortune to Francis Alciat, who succeeded him in the professorship at Pavia, and acquired great eminence in his profession; he was made cardinal, and died at Rome in 1580.

ALCIBIADES, ăl'-se-bi'-a-des, the son of Clinias, an Athenian captain, the disciple of Socrates, and possessed of great versatility of talent. He traced his ancestry, on the father's side, up to the heroic ages, through Ajax to Jupiter. On the mother's side, he proclaimed himself descended from the Alcmæonidæ; and as he was possessed of one of the greatest fortunes in Athens, so he took a wife who brought him the largest dowry that had been given in Greece. These advantages concurred with the vivacity of his temper and the generosity of his disposition to render him acceptable in society. By degrees he fell into excesses, and, in pursuing the flowery paths of pleasure, too often forgot the admirable lessons of virtue taught him by the greatest of moral philosophers. His profusion and ambition seemed to go hand in hand in stimulating his desire to become famous. "He contended at Olympia," says Mr. Thirlwall, in his History of Greece, "with seven chariots in the same race, and won the first, second, and third or fourth crown—success unexampled as the competition. He afterwards feasted all the spectators; and the entertainment was not more remarkable for its profusion and for the multitude of the guests, than for the new kind of homage paid to him by the subjects of Athens. The Ephesians pitched a splendid Persian tent for him; the Chians furnished provender for his horses; the Cyzicenes, victims for the sacrifice; the Lesbians, wine and other requisites for the banquet." At the age of 18, according to the Athenian law, he attained his majority, and in 332 B.C., whilst serving with Socrates at the siege of Potidæa, his life was saved by that philosopher. For the valour he displayed on this occasion, he was rewarded with the crown and suit of armour given by the Athenians, at the instance of Socrates, to whom, however, it appears to have been more justly due. Subsequently, at Delium, he, in his turn, saved the life of the philosopher. The friendship of these two distinguished personages may be regarded as one of the most extraordinary instances of mutual respect and affection which history has recorded as having existed between two celebrated men of entirely opposite natures. The virtuous teachings of the philosopher, however, were inadequate to subdue the violent passions of the statesman and soldier. In the Peloponnesian war, Alcibiades was appointed to command with Lysimachus, under Nicias, in an expedition against Syracuse; but while he was thus employed, a charge of impiety was preferred against him at home. One morning all the Hermæ, or half-statues of Mercury, which abounded at Athens, were found defaced; and on a reward being offered for the discovery of the offenders, some slaves gave information that it was done by Alcibiades and his drunken companions. For this he was ordered home; but, fearful of the consequences, he withdrew to Sparta, and stirred up the Lacedæmonians to declare war against Athens. Soon after this, however, his friendship for the Spartans declined, when he went over to the king of Persia. Subsequently, he was recalled by the Athenians, when he obliged the Lacedæmonians to sue for peace, made several conquests in Asia, and was received in triumph at Athens. His popularity was of short duration: the failure of an expedition against the island of Andros exposed him again to the resentment of the people, and he fled to Pharnabazus, whom he almost induced to make war upon Lacedæmon. This was told to Lysander, the Spartan general, who prevailed upon Pharnabazus to murder Alcibiades. Two servants were sent for that purpose, and they set on fire the cottage where he was, and killed him with darts as he attempted to make his escape. D. in the 46th year of his age, 404 B.C., after a life of perpetual difficulties.—His character has been cleared from the aspersions of malevolence by the writings of Thucydides.

ALCIDAMAS, ăl-sid'-a-mŭs, a Greek rhetorician, who was the disciple of Gorgias, the orator and sophist. He wrote a discourse in praise of death. Flourished in the 5th century B.C.—There are two orations extant under his name; the first printed by Aldus in his edition of the Greek orators, 1518, and the second in the same printer's edition of Isocrates, 1518.

ALCIDAMIDAS, ăl'-se-dăm'-e-dăs, a general of the Messenians, who retired to Rhegium, after the taking of Ithome by the Spartans.

ALCIDES, ăl'-sĭ'-dez, a name of Hercules, either from his strength (ulke), or his grandfather, Alcæus.—Also a name of Minerva.

ALCIMUS, ăl'-se-mus, surnamed Jachim, a high-priest of the Jews, who obtained that office from Antiochus Eupator, king of Syria, but rendered himself odious to his countrymen by his avarice and cruelty. He died two years after his election. Lived in the 2nd century B.C.

ALCINOUS, ăl-sin'-o-us, a son of Nausithous, king of Phæacia, praised for his love of agriculture. He entertained and listened to the wonderful adventures of Ulysses when shipwrecked on his coast; whence arose the proverb of the stories of Alcinous for improbability.

ALCINOUS, a Platonic philosopher, who wrote an "Introduction to the Philosophy of Plato," which has been translated into English by Stanley. Lived in the 2nd century A.D.

ALCIPHRON, ăl'-se-fron, a Grecian philosopher, who lived in the time of Alexander the Great.—A sophist of the same name, whose epistles give a curious picture of Grecian manners. An English translation of them was published in 1791. Lucian is supposed to have imitated him.

ALCIPPUS, ăl-sip'-pus, a reputable citizen of Sparta, banished by his enemies.

ALCIRA, al-thē'-ra, an ancient walled town of Spain, on an island in the Xucar, in the province of Valencia. Pop. 13,000.

ALCITHOE, ăl'-sith'-o-e, a Theban woman who ridiculed the orgies of Bacchus. She was changed into a bat, and the spindle and yarn with which she worked into a vine and ivy.

ALCKMAAR, or ALKMAAR, alk'-mar, the chief town in North Holland, neat, clean, well built, and strongly fortified, on the great North Holland or Helder Canal, 19 miles from Amsterdam. It has a good trade in corn, flower-roots, seeds, and butter. It is the greatest cheese-mart in the world, upwards of 4,000 tons of that article being sold every year. Pop. 10,000. Lat. 52° 38′ N. Lon. 4° 43′ E.—In 1573 this town was besieged by the Spaniards, who failed to take it after persevering for ten years in the attempt. In 1799 it was taken by the British and Russian troops under the duke of York. It is the native place of Drebbel, the inventor of the thermometer, and of Paschier Lammartyn, who, in 1595, invented damask-weaving.

ALCMÆON, ălk-mē'-on, a philosopher of Crotona, and the disciple of Pythagoras. He was the first writer on natural philosophy, and believed in the theory that the stars were animated beings.

ALCMÆON was son of the soothsayer Amphiaraus and Eriphyle. When his father went to the Theban war, where, according to an oracle, he was to perish, he charged him to revenge his death upon Eriphyle, who had betrayed him. As soon as he heard of his father's death, he murdered his mother; for which crime the furies persecuted him till the river god Phlegeus purified him, and gave him his daughter Alphesibœa in marriage. Alcmæon presented her with the fatal collar which his mother had received to betray his father, and afterwards divorced her, and married Callirhoe, the daughter of Achelous, to whom he promised the necklace he had given to Alphesibœa. When he attempted to recover it, Alphesibœa's brothers murdered him, on account of his treatment of their sister, and left his body a prey to dogs and wild beasts. Alcmæon's children by Callirhoe revenged their father's death by killing his murderers.

ALCMÆON, a son of Syllus, driven from Messenia, with the rest of Nestor's family, by the Heraclidæ. He came to Athens, and from him the Alcmæonidæ were descended.

ALCMÆONIDÆ, ălk-me-on'-e-de, a noble family of Athens, descended from Alcmæon. They undertook, for three hundred talents, to rebuild the temple of Delphi, which had been burnt; and, finishing the work in a more splendid manner than was required, they gained popularity, and by their influence, the Pythia prevailed on the Lacedæmonians to deliver their country from the tyranny of the Pisistratidæ.

ALCMAN, ălk'-man, of Lacedæmon or Sardis, one of the earliest Grecian writers, of whose poems only some fragments remain in different authors. He is said to have been the first writer of amorous poetry. Flourished 672 B.C.—Müller, in his "Literature of Greece," says, "that he is remarkable for simple and cheerful views of life, connected with an intense enthusiasm for the beautiful in whatever age or sex, especially for the grace of virgins."

ALCMENA, ălk-mē'-na, daughter of Electryon, king of Argos, by Anaxo, whom Plutarch calls Lysidice, and Diodorus, Eurymede. Her sire promised his crown and daughter to Amphitryon, if he would avenge the death of his sons, who had been all killed, except Licymnius, by the Teleboans, a people of Ætolia. Amphitryon going against the Ætolians, Jupiter, who was enamoured of Alcmena, resolved to visit her. The more effectually to accomplish this, he assumed the form of Amphitryon, declared that he had obtained a victory over Alcmena's enemies, and even presented her with a cup, which he said he had preserved from the spoils for her sake. Alcmena was overjoyed in clasping her lover to her arms, and Jupiter, to delay the return of Amphitryon, ordered his messenger, Mercury, to stop the rising of Phœbus, or the sun; so that the time he passed with Alcmena was considerably prolonged. Amphitryon returned the next day, and after complaining of the coldness with which he was received, Alcmena acquainted him with what had taken place, and even showed him the cup which she had received. Amphitryon was perplexed at the relation, and more so upon missing the cup from among his spoils. He went to the prophet Tiresias, who told him of Jupiter's intrigue, when he returned to his wife, proud of the dignity of his rival. Alcmena became pregnant by Jupiter, and afterwards by her husband; and when the time drew near, Jupiter boasted, in heaven, that a child was to be born that day to whom he would give absolute power over his neighbours, and even over all the children of his own blood. Juno, who was jealous of Jupiter's love for Alcmena, made him swear by the Styx, and immediately prolonged the travail of Alcmena, and hastened the bearing of the wife of Sthenelus, king of Argos, to whom a son was born, called Eurystheus. Ovid says that Juno was assisted by Lucina to put off the labour of Alcmena, and that Lucina, in the form of an old woman, sat before the door of Amphitryon with her legs and arms crossed. This posture was the cause of infinite torment to Alcmena, till her servant, Galanthis, supposing the old woman to be a witch, and to be the cause of the sufferings of her mistress, told her that she had given birth to a child. Lucina changed her posture, and then the twins, Hercules the son of Jupiter, and Iphiclus the son of Amphitryon, were born. Eurystheus was, however, already born; and therefore Hercules was subjected to his power. After Amphitryon's death, Alcmena married Rhadamanthus, and went into Bœotia. This marriage, according to some authors, was celebrated in the island of Leuce. The people of Megara say that she was buried in their city, near the temple of Jupiter Olympus. (See AMPHITRYON, HERCULES, EURYSTHEUS.)

ALCOBAÇA, al'-ko-ba'-za, a town of Estremadura, Portugal, standing on the small river Alcoa, 20 miles from Leiria. Pop. 2,000.—Here, in the vaults of an ancient abbey, many of the Portuguese monarchs are entombed.

ALCOCK, John, al'-kok, an English prelate, educated at Cambridge. He became dean of Westminster, and master of the Rolls, and in 1471 was preferred to the see of Rochester; whence he was translated to Worcester, and finally to Ely. Henry VII. made him lord president of Wales and chancellor of England. B. at Beverley, Yorkshire; D. 1500.—He endowed a school at Kingston-upon-Hull (now Hull), built the hall at the palace in Ely, and founded Jesus College, Cambridge. He was buried in the chapel which he built at Hull.

ALCON, ăl'-kon, a famous archer, who, on seeing his son attacked by a serpent, took his aim with such precision that he killed the reptile, without hurting his offspring.

ALCONBURY, al'-kon-ber'-e, the name of two parishes in England, one 4 miles and the other 5 miles N.W. from Huntingdon. Area of the first, 3,700 acres. Pop. 1,000. Area of the second, 1,540 acres. Pop. 520.

ALCORA, al-kor'-a, a town of Spain, 45 miles from Valencia. Trade. Chiefly fruit. Pop. 6,000.

ALCORAN, ALKORAN, or KORAN, ko-rawn', the Scripture or Bible of the Mahometans. In the original Arabic, it means—al, 'the,' koran, 'reading, or book;' that is, the Book, or 'Book of Allah,' as it is usually called, and supposed by the followers of Mahomet to be. It is generally agreed amongst Mussulmans that its contents were revealed to Mahomet by the angel Gabriel, partly at Mecca, partly at Medina. One tradition has it that it was sent by God, through the agency of the angel, to the prophet, written on parchment made of the skin of that ram which was so providentially sent to Abraham. There is little doubt that it was originally preserved by oral tradition, or handed about, having been written on different fragments of parchment, or on palm-leaves, by the prophet's slave or scribe, Said ben Thabet, and that these were collected into a volume by Mahomet's successor, Abubeker, about two years after Mahomet's death. It is held in the greatest veneration among Mahometans, and they never touch it, it is said, with unwashed hands; and on the cover of it is written, "Let none touch but they who are clean." They swear by it, take omens from it, carry it in war, write its verses on their banners, and make it their companion throughout all troubles and dangers. The doctrine of the Koran is as ancient, they say, as the first prophets since God chastised Adam's children; that Noah repaired what the first had lost; then Abraham succeeded, then Joseph, then Moses; that Christ established, and Mahomet confirmed it. The principal articles of belief are, that there is but one God, eternal and all-powerful, and that his divine law was fully declared by his prophets, and by Christ himself. Mahomet, however, is the last, and by far the most illustrious apostle; and as the Gospels have been maimed and altered, the Koran is to be revered as the only genuine revelation. Man is immortal, and will be judged at the last day. Sinners will be cast into hell. Moslems, true and virtuous, will be rewarded with everlasting happiness in a paradise enlivened by beautiful virgins. The hope of salvation, however, is not confined to the Mussulman; for all who believe in God, and do good works, will be saved. With reference to the description of the Mahometan heaven, an old writer informs us that there are described in the Koran seven paradises: the first, they say, is of fine silver; the second of gold; the third of precious stones, where there is an angel, between whose one hand and the other is 70,000 days' journey, and that he is always reading on a book; the fourth is of emerald; the fifth of crystal; the sixth of the colour of fire; and the seventh a delicious garden, watered with fountains, and rivers of milk, honey, and wine; with divers sorts of trees, always green, and apples, whose kernels are changed into girls, so handsome and sweet, that if one of them should spit in the sea, the waters thereof would be no more bitter. They add, that this paradise is guarded by angels, of which one has a cow's head with horns, which have 40,000 knots, and that there are 40 days' journey betwixt each knot. There are others which have 70 mouths, and every mouth 70 tongues, and each tongue praises God 70 times a day in 70 different idioms. Before the throne of God there are 14 wax-candles lighted, which contain 50 years' journey from one end to the other: that all the apartments of heaven are garnished with what may be conceived most pompous, rich, and magnificent; that the blessed are there fed with the most rare and delicious messes, and that they marry women who continually renew their beauty. They add, that their wives do not enter Paradise, but behold the happiness of their husbands at a distance. One of the most weighty obligations imposed by the Koran is to propagate Islamism, i.e., Mahometanism; and besides this, many practical duties are pointed out. Prayers at appointed periods, fasting, and charity, are indispensable. Cleanliness and religious ablutions are strongly urged, and, once in a man's life, a pilgrimage to Mecca, Mahomet's birthplace. In many usages the Koran restricts, whilst it indulges, the prejudices of Mahometans; as for instance, instead of unlimited polygamy, four wives are at most by it allowed. Murder, adultery, calumny, perjury, and pork, are sinful, and prohibited; and usury, gaming, and wine are forbidden. The Koran is, doubtless, the offspring of fraud and imposture; but its religion must surely have been a blessing to the Eastern world, substituting, as it did, the exercise of prayer and charity for the sacrifice of human victims, and breathing a spirit which was purity itself when placed in juxtaposition with the bloodthirstiness, rapine, and discord which prevailed when Mahomet produced his Koran. At this period, when our rulers and the public are so much occupied with the question of the education of Mahometans and others in India, this article will be read with interest.

ALCOUTIM, al'-koo-teem, a town and castle of Portugal, province of Algarve. It is situate on the Guadiana, 25 miles from Tavira. Pop. 2,000.

ALCOY, al'-ko-e, a town of Spain, in Valencia, 22 miles from Alicante, situate among hills near the source of a river of the same name. Manf. Principally woollen stuffs and paper; and is famous for its papelitos, or paper cigars, and its peladillos, or almond sugar-plums. Pop. 27,000.

ALCOY, a river in the province of Valencia, running an E.N.E. course for 35 miles, and falling into the Mediterranean near Gandia.

ALCUDIA, al-koo'-de-a, an ancient fortified town of Majorca, opposite Minorca. Pop. about 1,100.

ALCUDIA DE CARLET, al-koo'-de-a dai kar'-lait, a town of Spain, in Valencia. Pop. 2,000.

ALCUESCAR, al-koo-ais'-kar, a town of Estremadura, Spain, 28 miles from Caceres. Pop. 3,600.—In 1812 the allied troops here assembled, before the battle of Arroyo de Molinos.

ALCUIN, or ALCUINUS, Albinus Flaccus, ăl'-ku-in, an English divine, was born in Yorkshire, educated first by the Venerable Bede, and then by Edwin, archbishop of York, who made him his librarian. He afterwards became abbot of Canterbury, and in 793 went to France, at the request of Charlemagne, who gave him several rich abbeys: he attended that prince to the council of Frankfort. B. probably in York, about 735; D. at Tours, in France, 804.—Alcuin was the most learned and accomplished man of his age, a great public teacher, and the principal instrument in reviving the extinguished elements of literature and science. His works were published, in 1 vol. folio, at Paris, in 1617.

ALCYONE, or HALCYONE, ăl-si'-o-ne, daughter of Æolus, married Ceyx, who was drowned as he was going to consult the oracle. The gods apprised Alcyone in a dream of her husband's fate; and when she found, on the morrow, his body lying on the shore, she threw herself into the sea, and was, with her husband, changed into birds of the same name, who keep the waters calm and serene while they build, and sit on their nests on the surface of the ocean.

ALCYONE, one of the Pleiades, daughter of Atlas and Pleione. She had Arethusa by Neptune, and Eleuthera by Apollo. She, with her sisters, was changed into a constellation. (See PLEIADES.)

ALCYONE, the daughter of Evenus, carried away by Apollo after her marriage. Her husband pursued the god with bows and arrows, but was not able to recover her. From this, her parents called her Alcyone, and compared her fate to that of the wife of CEYX.—A town of Thessaly, where Philip of Macedon, Alexander's father, lost one of his eyes.

ALCYONEUS, ăl-se-o'-ne-us, a giant, brother to Porphyrion. He was slain by Hercules. His daughters, mourning his death, threw themselves into the sea, and were changed into halcyons, by Amphitrite.

ALCYONIA PALUS, ăl'-se-o'-ne-a pai'-lus, a lake in Corinth, whose depth the emperor Nero attempted in vain to fathom. Its banks were grassy, and covered with rushes. Nocturnal orgies were annually celebrated there in honour of Bacchus.

ALCYONIUM MARE, ăl-se-o'-ne-um mair'-e, a name given to that portion of the Sinus Corinthiacus, or Gulf of Lepanto, which lay between the promontory of Antirrhium and the coast of Megaris.

ALCYONIUS, Peter, ăl'-se-o'-ne-us, an Italian writer and corrector of the press to Aldus Manutius, and afterwards professor at Florence. He resigned that position, and went to Rome, where he perished during the troubles excited by the Colonnas about 1527.—He wrote some ingenious pieces in Latin; and among the rest, a treatise on banishment, which he is said to have taken from a MS. on glory by Cicero, which he found in a monastery, and which, after copying as much as was sufficient for his purpose, he burnt.

ALD, or ALDE, ald, a river of England, in Suffolk, rising near Framlingham, and joining the North Sea at Orford.

ALDABRA, al-da'-bra, an island in the Indian Ocean, composed of three separate parts, having a connection by coral rocks, and abounding in land turtles. Lat. 9° 26′ S. Lon. 46° 35′ E.

ALDAN, al-dan, a river of Siberia, which rises on the confines of China, and joins the Lena in Lat. 63° 12′ N.; Lon. 129° 40′ E.—There are several towns upon its banks, and, in a course of 300 miles, it is fed by various tributaries.

ALDAN MOUNTAINS, an E. Siberian chain of mountains, terminating at Behring Straits. Average height, 4,000 feet. A branch which traverses Kamtchatka reaches an elevation of 10,548 feet, and in Kliutshewskaja attains 15,763 feet. The lower limit of perpetual snow is at a height of 4,475 feet.

ALDAY, John, al'-dai, a popular English writer, and translator of the work of Peter Boaistuan, entitled "Theatrum Mundi," &c. Lived in the 16th century.

ALDAYA, al-da-'ya, a town of Spanish Valencia, 7 miles from Valencia. Pop. 2,100.

ALDBOROUGH, or ALEBOROUGH, ald'-bur-o, a seaport town and parish of England, in Suffolk, on the Alde, 9½ miles from Dunwich. Area, 1,130 acres. Pop. 1,627.—This town has a coasting trade, and many of its inhabitants are engaged in fishing. It is a sea-bathing resort, and is the native place of the poet Crabbe, who was born in 1754, and of whom there is a bust placed in the church, which is the largest in the county.

ALDBOROUGH, a market-town and parish on the river Ouse, in the West Riding of Yorkshire. Area, 8,750 acres. Pop. town and parish, 2,438.—The town is supposed to stand on the site of the ancient Isurium Brigantium.—A parish in Norfolk, 4 miles from Aylsham. Area, 590 acres. Pop. 380.

ALDBOURN, or AUBOURNE, ald'-born, a parish of Wiltshire, 6 miles from Marlborough, possessed of several ancient remains. Area, 8,060 acres. Pop. 1,622.

ALDBURY, or ALBURY, ald'-ber-e, a village and parish in the county of Hertford. Area, 2,028 acres. Pop. 800.—The North-Western Railway has a station at Tring, which is 3 miles from the village.

ALDEA, al-dai'-a, the name of several places in Spain, with different prefixes; of which these are the principal:—DEL REY, dail rai, in New Castile, 12 miles from Ciudad Real. Manf. Lace. Pop. 1,700. DAVILA DE DUERO, da-ve'-la dai doo-air'-o, 43 miles from Salamanca, on the Duero, has a fair export trade. Pop. 1,500. DEL CANO, dail ka'-no, in Estremadura, 15 miles from Caceres. Pop. 1,300.

ALDEA, the name of several villages and towns in Brazil: at one of them, in the province of Espirito Santo, the Indians build canoes, their squaws make a kind of coarse cloth, and spin cotton and thread for lamp wicks for the inhabitants of Rio de Janeiro, Bahia, &c.

ALDEA GALEGA, al-dai'-a gal-ai'-ga, a town of Estremadura, Portugal, standing 10 miles from Lisbon, on the estuary of the Tagus. Pop. 4,000.—It makes a ferry-station between Badajoz and Lisbon.

ALDEBERT, or ADALBERT, al'-de-bair, a French impostor, who pretended to be inspired, and exercised the episcopal functions without authority: he was condemned by a council at Rome, and thrown into prison, where he died—Lived in the 8th century.

ALDEGONDE. (See ST. ALDEGONDE.)

ALDEGREVER, Heinrich, hine-rish al-de-grai'-vair, a German painter and engraver, who was both a pupil and a successful imitator of the performances of Albert Durer. B. at Soest, Westphalia, 1502; D. 1562.

ALDENHAM, al'-den-ham, a village and parish of Hertfordshire, between 2 and 3 miles from the Watford station on the North-Western Railway. Area, 5,830 acres. Pop. 1,656.

ALDERBURY, al-der-ber'-e, a town and parish in the county of Wilts, 3 miles from Salisbury. Area, 3,950 acres. Pop. 1,438.—Reached by the South-Western Railway. At about the distance of a mile from this town is Clarendon, where formerly stood a mansion, of which there are still some remains, and which was a frequent residence of the early English monarchs. In this mansion Parliament assembled, and Henry II. enacted the celebrated "Statutes of Clarendon," framed to check the encroachments of popery.

ALDERETTE, Bernard and Joseph, al'-de-ret, two brothers of the Society of Jesus, who wrote two learned works on the origin of the Castilian languages and the antiquities of Spain. B. at Malaga, and flourished in the 17th century.—They were so perfectly alike as to be frequently mistaken for each other.

ALDERSHOTT, or SHOLT, al'-der-shot, a parish in Hants, 3 miles from Farnham. Area, 4,070 acres. Pop. Before the establishment of the camp at this place, the population was little over 1,000; but it has now immensely increased, whilst the military depôt has become one of the best known in England. As the first permanent camp established in the country for masses of troops, on the continental plan, Aldershott merits attention. Barracks, of solid structure and immense extent, have been erected, at great cost, and the whole of Aldershott Common is gradually assuming the appearance of a soldiers' city.

ALDERNEY, or AURIGNY, al'-der-ne, an island of Great Britain, in the English Channel, 7 miles from Cape la Hogue, in Normandy. The intermediate channel, called the Race of Alderney, is of dangerous navigation in stormy weather. The island forms part of a chain extending to the Caskets, whereon there is a lighthouse. Pop. about 4,000. Lat. 49° 45′ N. Lon. 2° 13′ W.—In May, 1692, after the defeat of Tourville by the combined navies of Holland and England, under Admiral Russell, the French fleet made its escape through the Race of Alderney. Since the commencement of the government works in 1847, when the habitants on the island were little more than 1,000, the population has increased to the above number; and when the extensive fortifications which are at present being carried on are completed, it will be one of the strongest outlying posts of England.

ISLE OF ALDERNEY.

ALDERTON, al′-der-ton, the name of several English parishes, none of which have populations exceeding 1,000.

ALDHELM, or ADELM, ST., ăld′-helm, bishop of Sherborne, and consecrated at Rome by Sergius I. He is said to be the first Englishman who wrote in Latin, and the first who introduced poetry into England. The people in his time being extremely illiterate, paid little regard to prosaic discourses, which suggested to Aldhelm the idea of entertaining them with ballads of his own composition, in which he blended religious subjects with those of a lighter kind, and thus induced numbers to listen to his addresses. B. at Malmesbury; D. in 709.

ALDHUN, ald′-hun, the founder of the see of Durham. In 990 he became bishop of Lindisfarne, or Holy Island, which place he left on account of its being infested by the Danes. Taking with him the body of St. Cuthbert, he went to Durham, where he built a church. D. 1018.

ALDINGTON, al′-ding-ton, a parish of Kent, 7 miles from Ashford. Area, 3,420 acres. Pop. 1,000.—Reached by the South-Eastern Railway.—Erasmus was once rector of this parish.

ALDINI, Giovanni, al-de′-ne, a nephew of Galvani, the discoverer of galvanism. His great merit was in endeavouring to give publicity to such discoveries as he thought would be useful to mankind. He delighted in philosophical pursuits, and at his death bequeathed his philosophical instruments and a large sum of money to found a public institution at Bologna, to instruct artisans in chemistry and physics. B. at Bologna, 1762; D. 1834.

ALDINI, Count Antonio, a brother of the above, who distinguished himself as an Italian statesman.

ALDOBRANDINI, Sylvester, al′-do-bran-de′-ne, a Florentine writer, who was appointed advocate of the treasury and apostolic chamber by Pope Paul III. D. 1558.

ALDOBRANDINI, Clement, a son of the above, who became pope, as Clement VIII.

ALDRED, ald-red, abbot of Tavistock, and bishop of Worcester, who became ambassador to the emperor of Germany, and was the first English bishop to visit Jerusalem, which he did in 1058. On his return he was made archbishop of York, with leave to hold his former see; but the pope refused him the pallium (archbishop's robe) unless he resigned the bishopric. On the death of Edward the Confessor, Aldred crowned Harold II., and afterwards assisted in the coronation of William the Conqueror. D. in 1069.

ALDRIC, ST., al′-drik, a bishop of Mans, who held a distinguished station in the court of Charlemagne and Louis the Debonair. He renounced it, however, for the ecclesiastical state, and in 832 was made bishop of Mans. He convoked an assembly of bishops for the reformation of abuses in the church, and compiled a body of canons. D. 856.

ALDRICH, Robert, ald′-rich, an English prelate, who was educated at Eton and King's College, Cambridge. He was afterwards appointed provost of Eton, and in 1534 made canon of Windsor, and register of the order of the Garter. In 1537 he was consecrated bishop of Carlisle. B. at Burnham, in Buckinghamshire; D. 1555.—He was the writer of several works which evince considerable learning.

ALDRICH, Henry, a divine who from Westminster school went to Christchurch, Oxford, where he was elected student. In 1681 he was installed canon of Christchurch, and in the same year took the degree of D.D. He wrote, in the reign of James II., two able tracts, "On the Adoration of our Saviour in the Eucharist." After the Revolution of 1688, he was made dean of Christchurch, in which station he behaved in the most exemplary manner, and every year published a Greek classic, or part of one, as a gift to the students of the college. He was appointed one of those persons who were intrusted with the publication of Lord Clarendon's history. His knowledge of architecture and music was considerable, as appears by Peckwater Square, in Oxford, the chapel of Trinity College, and the church of All Saints, which were designed by him; and the numerous services and anthems which he composed. He was also the composer of two catches; viz., "Hark, the bonny Christchurch Bells;" and the other, "A smoking Catch." He held the rectory of Wem, in Shropshire, and in the convocation of 1702 sat as prolocutor. B. in Westminster, 1647; D. 1710. Besides the above works, he printed "Artis Logicæ Compendium," and the Elements of Architecture, in Latin.

ALDRIDGE, ald′-ridg, a parish of Staffordshire, 3 miles from Walsall. Area, 7,980 acres. Pop. 2,500. Reached by the South Staffordshire Railway.

ALDRINGER, al′-dring-er, a general of the German empire. Though a servant to some young students at Paris, he acquired a knowledge of the languages and sciences, and then went to Italy, and had an appointment under Cardinal Madrucci; of this, however, he was deprived, and going to Germany, he entered the army as a common soldier. His merits were soon recognized, and he was raised to the rank of captain. After passing through several gradations, he was made a field-marshal, and was also employed as ambassador. He distinguished himself on many occasions as a brave commander; but his avarice and cruelty were extreme. B. at Luxembourg; slain near Landshut, in 1634.

ALDROVANDUS, Ulyssus, al-dro-van′-doos, an Italian, distinguished as a natural historian. After passing a life devoted to the most exalted pursuits, and bringing together, at vast labour and expense, a magnificent collection of minerals, plants, and animals, he died in an hospital, to which he was compelled to resort on account of his poverty. B. at Bologna, 1522; D. 1607. —In 1590 he published his first work on natural history, which was devoted to birds; in 1603 his work on insects appeared; and in 1606 that on the lower animals. The remainder of his works were published after his death, and are a monument of his industry and zeal.

ALDRUDE, al′-droo-dai, Countess of Bertinoro, in Romagna, who was celebrated for her beauty and magnanimity, and who, in conjunction with William degli Adelardi, a citizen of Ferrara, compelled the Venetians and Imperialists to raise the siege of Ancona. The growing opulence of that port having excited the jealousy of the Venetians and the emperor of Germany, they united their forces, and laid siege to it in 1172. On this occasion, the citizens distinguished themselves by the bravery of their resistance; but, being closely pressed, they were driven to the greatest necessities by the want of provisions. When their distress was at its height, they applied to William degli Adelardi and the countess of Bertinoro, who assembled their vassals, and marched to the relief of the Anconians. Aldrude, by her presence and exhortations, inspired the troops with courage, and the besiegers fled in confusion. On her return homeward she encountered several parties of the enemy, and in every action was victorious. William, having disbanded his troops, went to Constantinople, where he was received by the emperor with distinguished honours. Lived in the 12th century.

ALDSTONE, or ASTON MOOR, ŏs'-ton moor, a town and parish of England, in Cumberland, on a hill, at the bottom of which is the river Tyne, crossed by a stone bridge. This parish is famous for its lead-mines, which, till 1715, belonged to the earls of Derwentwater, but which are now possessed by Greenwich Hospital. Area, 35,060 acres. Pop. of town and parish, 10,000.—Upwards of 1,000 persons are employed in the lead-mines, from which about 5,000 tons of pure lead are extracted annually.

ALDUS. (See MANUTIUS.)

ALEA, ă-lē'-a, a surname of Minerva, from her temple built by Aleus, son of Aphidas, at Tegæa, in Arcadia. The ivory statue of the goddess was carried by Augustus to Rome.

ALEA, a town of Arcadia, built by Aleus. It had three famous temples—that of Diana Ephesia, of Minerva Alea, and of Bacchus. At the annual festival held here in honour of the latter deity, women were beaten with scourges, in accordance with a command of the Delphian oracle.

ALEANDER, Jerome, al'-e-an-der, a cardinal, who taught the belles-lettres at Paris, and afterwards entered into the service of Pope Leo X., who, in 1515, sent him nuncio to Germany, and next year appointed him librarian of the Vatican. At the diet of Worms he displayed his eloquence against Luther, causing the works of the great reformer to be burned, and himself proscribed. Clement VII. made him archbishop of Brindisi, and appointed him his nuncio to France. In 1531 he was despatched to Germany in the same capacity, and vainly endeavoured to prevent Charles V. from making a truce with the Protestants. In 1536 he was made a cardinal by Paul III. B. 1480; D. 1542.

ALEANDER, Jerome, nephew of the above, was distinguished for his abilities and learning. He first held the appointment of secretary to Cardinal Octavio Bandini, and lastly to Cardinal Barberini. B. at Friuli; D. of a surfeit, 1631.—In the republic of letters he is known by several works on antiquarian subjects.

ALEGAMBE, Philip, al'-e-gamb, a Jesuit, who took the religious habit in Sicily, and afterwards became professor of philosophy and divinity at Gratz, in Austria. In 1638 he went to Rome, and was retained there by the general of his order as secretary for Germany and president of spiritual affairs. B. at Brussels, 1592; D. 1652.—His works are but few, and relate to the history of his order.

ALEGRINUS, John, ăl-e-gri'-nus, a cardinal and patriarch of Constantinople, who was appointed legate to Spain and Portugal. B. at Abbeville, in Picardy; D. 1240.

ALEMAN, Lewis, al'-e-man, a Roman cardinal, who, in 1422, being archbishop of Arles, was sent legate to Sienna by Pope Martin V. The object of his mission was to procure the removal of the council of Pavia to that city. Afterwards the pope made him a cardinal, and he was appointed subsequently president of the council of Basil, in which he opposed Eugenius IV., who excommunicated him. Nicholas V. restored him to his dignities, and sent him as legate into Germany. B. 1390; D. 1450; and was afterwards canonized.

ALEMAN, Lewis Augustine, a lawyer of Grenoble, who, in 1690, published the posthumous remarks of Vaugelas, with a preface and notes of his own. B. 1653. —Besides the above work, he wrote the "Journal Historique de l'Europe," and some other works.

ALEMAN, Mateo, al'-ai-man, a Spanish writer, who satirized the manners of his countrymen in a work entitled "Guzman de Alfarache," which was published at Madrid in 1599.—Lived in the 16th century.

ALEMBERT, D', John le Rond, da-lam'-bair, a French philosopher, whom his foster-mother, the wife of a glazier, defined to be "a fool, who plagues himself all his life, that he may be spoken of after his death." He was named John le Rond from the church near which he was exposed as a foundling, and where he was discovered by the overseer of the district, who gave him in charge of the glazier's wife. His father hearing of his abandonment by his mother, came forth and claimed him, charging himself with his maintenance and education. Accordingly, he was placed in the college of Mazarin, where he composed a commentary on the Epistle to the Romans, which the Jansenists read with astonishment. He then engaged in the study of mathematics, in which he made a surprising progress. On leaving the college, he went to live with his nurse, with whom he resided forty years, contented with an annual fortune of 1,200 francs, which had been left him. His friends advised him to endeavour to better his condition by studying the law, in which he subsequently took his degrees, but soon quitted the profession, in order to apply himself to the more congenial study of the physical sciences. Whatever progress he may have made in these, however, he abandoned them for mathematics, and in 1741 was elected a member of the Academy of Sciences. Two years after this event, he produced his treatise on dynamics. In 1746 he obtained the prize medal from the Academy of Berlin for a discourse on the theory of winds. In 1749 he solved the problem of the precession of the equinoxes, ascertained its quantity, and explained the rotation of the terrestrial axis. In 1752 he published an essay on the resistance of fluids, and soon after obtained a pension from Louis XV. He next engaged with Diderot in compiling the celebrated "Encyclopédie," for which he wrote the preliminary discourse, which was so excellent, that it drew from Condorcet the compliment that in a century only two or three men appeared capable of writing such. While engaged on mathematical subjects, his name was not much known; but now he became celebrated by works of an historical and miscellaneous character; such as his "Philosophical, Historical, and Philological Miscellanies," "The Memoirs of Christiana, Queen of Sweden," and his "Elements of Philosophy." Frederick, king of Prussia, offered him the office of president of his academy, and Catharine, the empress of Russia, invited him into her dominions as tutor to the grand duke; but Alembert refused both. In a letter of the latter, again pressing him to comply with her wishes, she says, "I know that your refusal springs from your desire to pursue your studies and to cultivate your friendships in peace. But this is of no consequence. Bring all your friends with you, and I promise you that both you and they shall have all the accommodation it is in my power to give." In 1765 he published his dissertation on the destruction of the Jesuits. He also published nine volumes of memoirs and miscellaneous pieces, and the "Elements of Music." In 1772 he was elected secretary to the French Academy, and wrote the history of seventy of its members, who died between 1700 and 1771. B. at Paris, 1717; D. 1783.—D'Alembert enriched the science and literature of his country by the publication of a great many more works, which, after his death, were collected by M. Bastien, and published in 18 vols. 8vo.—His religious opinions have always been conceived to be the same as those held by Voltaire, Diderot, and other professed infidels, who made the followers of Christianity a butt for their ridicule. But if this were the case, he was generous enough to praise Massillon, Fleury, Fénélon, Bossuet, and Flechier, not only as writers, but as priests. For ourselves, we do not think he comes quite under the category of the school of Voltaire, from whom a visit was refused by the same empress of Russia who pressed D'Alembert to come to her dominions. "There is no Parnassus in my dominions," said she of Voltaire on this occasion, "for those who speak disrespectfully of religion."

ALEMOUTH, ail'-mouth, a seaport town of Northumberland, situate at the mouth of the Aln, in the North Sea. Pop. 500. It is a sea-bathing place, and has a small trade with Holland.

ALEN, John Van, fon al'-len, an eminent Dutch painter, who, in birds, landscapes, and representations of still life, enjoyed a distinguished reputation. B. at Amsterdam, 1651; D. 1698.

ALENÇON, a-len'-son (Fr. a-lan'-song), a city of France, and capital of the department of the Orne, in a plain on the Sarthe, 105 miles from Paris. The suburbs are St. Blaise, Casau, Montsor, La Barre, and Lancret. The town is pleasantly situate and well built, having wide and open streets. Manf. Cloth, coarse and fine linen; and a few houses still make the celebrated lace, pointe d'Alençon. It has extensive tanneries, glass-houses, and smelting-houses. Pop. about 14,000.—The Alençon diamonds are crystals of smoke quartz found in neighbouring granite quarries.

ALENIO, Julius, a-laï'-ne-o, a Venetian Jesuit, who, during thirty-six years, propagated Christianity in China with great success. D. 1649.—He wrote several books on religious and mathematical subjects in the Chinese language.

ALENQUER, a-lain'-kair, a fortified town of Portuguese Estremadura, on a river of the same name, 25 miles from Lisbon. It has extensive paper-mills, which are the principal support of the working population. Pop. 3,300.

ALENTEJO, a-lain-taï'-sho, a province of Portugal. Area, 10,255 square miles. Desc. Beautifully diversified with hill and dale, watered by the Tagus in the N., the Sado in the S., and the Guadiana in the E. Pro. Chiefly corn and rice, with which it mostly supplies Lisbon. Manf. Earthenware and woollen cloths. Pop. 290,000. Lat. between 37° 20′ and 39° 40′ N.

ALEOTTI, Jean Baptiste, al'-e-ot'-e, an architect, who, from a common labourer, by great diligence and application to the study of geometry and architecture, rose to considerable eminence. D. 1630.—He produced several works on the subject of his profession.

ALEPPO, a-lep'-o, a city of Asiatic Turkey, capital of a pashalic of the same name, in the north of Syria, and one of the chief emporiums of commerce in the Ottoman empire. The city is built on eight small hills, and is intersected by the river Koeik. It is, of itself, not above three miles and a half in circumference, and is surrounded by an ancient strong stone wall and ditch; but including the suburbs, it embraces seven or eight miles. The wall is flanked by several towers, but the fosse is partly filled up with rubbish or occupied by kitchen-gardens. In general, the city is regularly built, the houses of the opulent being of white stone. The streets are for the most part broader than usual in the East, though appearing gloomy, from the height of the walls on each side. They are well paved, and have two commodious footpaths raised six inches high. Almost all the houses are surmounted by terraces,—the sleeping-places of the inhabitants during the summer months,—separated by parapet walls, except those having domes. The seraglio or palace of the pacha is spacious, with magnificent gates. A distinct quarter of the city is allotted to Jews, and the Europeans have another. Mosques are numerous, but none have more than a single minaret or steeple. The members of the Greek, Armenian, Syrian, and Maronite communions have each a church; and the Europeans formerly had four small convents; but in the year 1807 there was only one, containing nine Italian monks. Many caravanseries or inns, spacious quadrangular edifices, one story high, are scattered over the city, besides coffee-houses with a fountain in the middle, and a gallery for musicians. Women are not seen in the streets of Aleppo after dusk. Manf. Silk, cotton, and gold and silver threads, with which it supplies the Turkish provinces. There are also extensive cloth-factories, dye-works, soap-factories, and rope-walks. Imp. Chiefly wool, goat's hair, silk and India piece-goods, cotton yarns and fabrics, with sugar, cochineal, indigo, woollens, and colonial goods, steel, paper, velvets, glass, coral, and some dye-woods. Large caravans arrive from Bagdad, Bosra, Diarbekir, Kurdistan, Mosul, and Armenia. Pop. about 80,000; but before an earthquake, which happened in 1822, it is said to have been upwards of 200,000; consisting of Turks, Arabs, Christians, and Jews. Lat. 36° 11′ N. Lon. 37° 10′ E.—Aleppo contains a multitude of mercantile houses, and is favourably situate for trade; hence most of the European powers have consuls residing in it.

ALER, Paul, a'-lai, a French Jesuit, whose work, entitled "Gradus ad Parnassum," has long enjoyed an established reputation in the schools of Europe. D. 1727.

ALES, a'-lais, an episcopal town of Sardinia, 30 miles from Cagliari. Pop. 1,200.

ALES, Alexander, ails, a Scotch divine, who, from being a zealous Catholic, became as zealous a Protestant. In 1535 he visited England, and was greatly esteemed by Archbishop Cranmer; but soon after went to Germany, where he rose successively to the professorial chairs of Divinity in the universities of Frankfort and Leipsic. B. at Edinburgh, 1500; D. 1565.—He wrote several books on theological subjects, particularly on the necessity of good works to justification.

ALESHKI, a-lesh-ke, a Russian town in the government of Taurida, opposite Kherson, on the estuary of the Dnieper. Pop. 1,500.

ALESSANDRIA, a'-les-an'-dre-a, a strong town of the Sardinian states, with a citadel, amongst the strongest in Europe, on the Tanaro, in Upper Italy. Manf. Woollen, linen, and silk goods; stockings, hats, &c. Pro. In the district in which it stands, wheat, maize, flax, madder, and fruit are raised; the mulberry, the walnut, and the poplar are cultivated; and the ditches which separate the fields from each other, being almost constantly filled with water, the country is well irrigated. Pop. 40,000, besides a garrison of 4,000 men.—The Sardinian government has been diligently employed of late years in strengthening and extending the fortifications of Alessandria; and by throwing open the sluices of the Tanaro, the surrounding country can be inundated. This place is the bulwark of Piedmont, and may be considered as an intrenched camp, protecting Turin, the capital, from which it is distant 46 miles, and with which it is connected by a railway. Two miles from the town is the village of Marengo, the scene of the defeat of the Austrians by Napoleon, on June 14, 1800.

ALESSANO, a-les-an'-o, a town of Naples, in Terra d'Otranto, 200 miles E.S.E. of Naples. Pop. 1,800.

ALESSI, Galeas, a-les'-e, a famous architect, who planned the monastery and church of the Escurial, the royal palace of Madrid. B. at Perugia, 1500; D. 1572.

ALESSO, D', Matthew Perez, da-les'-so, an Italian, eminent as a painter and an engraver. His most celebrated performance is a fresco figure of St. Christopher, in the great church of Seville. The calf of each leg is an ell in thickness, and all the other parts are in proportion. B. at Rome; D. 1600.

ALETINO, Benedetto, al'-e-te'-no, the fictitious name of a professor of philosophy in the Jesuits' college at Naples. D. 1719.—In 1688, he printed a work which had for its object the overthrowing of the Cartesian philosophy, and the establishing in its stead that of Aristotle.

ALEUTAN, or ALEUTIAN ISLANDS, a-lu'-tan, a chain of islands, amounting to 40, in the North Pacific Ocean, stretching from the peninsula of Kamtchatka, in Asia, to Cape Alaska, in North America, comprehended under the government of Irkutzk, in Asiatic Russia. Behring's Island, Attoo, and Oonalashka, are the largest. Desc. Volcanic and rocky, and some of the hills in a constant state of fiery activity. Vegetation is scanty, and agriculture almost unknown. Pop. estimated at about 9,000. Lat. extending from 52° to 53° N. Lon. from 172° to 178° E.—The inhabitants of these inhospitable islands subsist chiefly by fishing and hunting, exporting the skins of the otter, the fox, and other animals, which are monopolized by the Russo-American Company.

ALEXANDER. (See PARIS.)

ALEXANDER I., ăl'-ex-an'-der, son of Amyntas I., is said to have been the tenth king of Macedon, and to have lived at the time of the great Persian invasion of Greece, 480 B.C.

ALEXANDER II., son of Amyntas II, and the sixteenth king of Macedonia. Lived 370 B.C.

ALEXANDER III., surnamed "the Great," was the son of Philip, king of Macedon, and was born the same year in which the famed temple of Diana, at Ephesus, was destroyed;—a circumstance which was considered afterwards to have been ominous of the greatness of his character. At an early age he was placed under the tuition of Lysimachus, and afterwards under Aristotle, who took great pains to form the mind of his illustrious pupil; and throughout his brief but active life the influence which his distinguished tutor had exercised over his mind frequently manifested itself amidst his most gigantic undertakings. When still young, the ambition of his character was observed in several expressions which historians delight to record. "My father will leave me nothing to achieve," said he, on hearing of the victories of Philip. "Give me kings to encounter, and I will enter immediately," was another of his remarks when his father expressed surprise that he did not enter the lists at the Olympic games. At a very early age he succeeded in subduing Bucephalus, his famous war-horse, which no one had previously been able to manage. The "Iliad" of Homer was his favourite book, as the "Ossian" of MacPherson was that of Napoleon; and Achilles was the hero which he chose for his model, and upon whose merits he endeavoured to form himself. On the assassination of Philip, 336 B.C., he ascended the throne, in his twentieth year, and began that series of conquests by which his name has acquired a world-wide celebrity. At this period several of the Grecian states were struggling to shake off the Macedonian yoke, imposed on them by Philip, when Alexander went against them, compelled them to submit, and acknowledge him generalissimo of all the Grecian armies, except those of Sparta,—an appointment which his father had enjoyed. He then marched into Thrace, and made several conquests. During his absence, Thebes revolted; on the intelligence of which Alexander returned into Greece, took that city by storm, and put many of the inhabitants to death. He also destroyed all the buildings except the residence of Pindar, the poet. This severe example had its effect on the other states; and even Athens, which was the most impatient under the domination of Macedon, distinguished itself by a servile submission to the conqueror. He next turned his arms against Darius Codomannus, king of Persia, and in his 22nd year crossed the Hellespont, with an army of about 40,000 men. It was on this expedition that he, with his friend Hephæstion, visited the mound in which the remains of Achilles were supposed to lie. (See ACHILLES.) With the force at his command, he defeated the Persians at the Granicus, and afterwards made himself master of numerous places. At Gordium, where he assembled his army, he cut the famous knot on which the fate of Asia was said to depend. While he was in Cilicia he fell into a dangerous fever, owing to his imprudently bathing in the river Cydnus when very hot. In this state he received a letter from Parmenio, intimating his suspicions that his physician Philip had been bribed to poison him. When Philip attended with a strong medicine, Alexander gave him the letter to read as he drank off the potion. On his recovery from this illness, he liberally rewarded the physician for his skill and integrity. Shortly after this he defeated Darius near Issus, took a quantity of treasure and a number of prisoners; among whom were the mother, wife, and children of the king of Persia, who made his escape by flight. The generous conduct of Alexander to these fallen princesses forms the most brilliant episode in his distinguished career (333 B.C.). This victory was followed by the conquest of Phœnicia, Damascus, and other places. The siege of Tyre, however, occupied him seven months, and in revenge he perpetrated great barbarities on the inhabitants. He next marched to Jerusalem, where he was met by the high-priest, dressed in his sacerdotal vestments. On seeing this venerable personage, the hero bowed to the ground with such reverence as excited the astonishment of Parmenio, who attended him; when Alexander informed him that a personage of his description had appeared to him in a dream in Macedonia, and promised him success in his expedition. The high-priest then presented to the monarch the prophecy of Daniel, in which it was foretold that a Grecian prince should destroy the Persian empire. In consequence of this, Alexander bestowed liberal presents on the Jews, and passed into Egypt, which country he subdued. While there he founded the city of Alexandria (see ALEXANDRIA), and consulted the oracle of Jupiter Ammon, the priest of which flattered his vanity by asserting that he was the son of that deity. Darius, having collected a considerable army, resolved to make another struggle for his dominions, but was defeated at Arbela, and the fate of Asia was decided, 331 B.C. This battle was followed by the taking of Susa and Persepolis. The latter city Alexander caused to be burnt, at the instigation of a favourite Athenian courtesan named Thais. While pursuing Darius, he received intelligence of his having been slain in the deserts of Parthia by one of his own satraps, called Bessus. This individual Alexander caused to be put to death for his treachery, and when he came to the spot where the body of the unfortunate king lay, he covered it with his own cloak, and sent it to Persepolis to be buried in the tomb of his ancestors. The ambition for conquest had now become in Alexander an inordinate passion. He entirely subdued Persia, and then prepared to invade India. In the early part of the year 326 B.C. he crossed the Indus,—it is supposed at a place a little north of the modern Attock,—and entered the Punjab, or the country of the Five Rivers. On the banks of the Hydaspes,—the modern Behut, or Beduster,—he encountered Porus, an Indian prince, with a numerous army, in which were several elephants. The wonted fortune of the Macedonians prevailed; but Alexander was so pleased with the gallantry of Porus, that he restored him his kingdom, and entered into an alliance with him. Pursuing the tide of conquest which seemed to roll him to success, he advanced to the Acesines (the Chenaub), traversed the barren plain between it and the Hydraotes (the Ravee), where he was met by a second Porus: him he defeated, and gave his kingdom to the former Porus. Continuing his march, he arrived at the river Hyphasis (the Garra), which was the limit of his Indian expedition, and where he erected twelve colossal towers to mark this circumstance. All the country he had subdued between the Hydaspes and the Hyphasis he presented to Porus, the first; and thus made him the most powerful prince in India. He now ordered a fleet to be built, and sailed down the Indus, and leaving the ships to Nearchus, whom he directed to the Persian Gulf, returned with his army through Persia to Babylon, where he was carried off by a fever, in the thirty-third year of his age, 323 B.C. B. at Pella, 355 B.C. The unsettled state of India at the present time imparts a far deeper interest to the narrative of Alexander's conquests in the Punjab than they might otherwise deserve, when the remote period at which they occurred, and the objects for which they were made, are taken into consideration. He had four wives,—Barsina, the daughter of Artabazes; Roxana, a Persian princess, by whom he left a son of his own name, who was assassinated, with his mother, by Cassander; Parisatis, daughter of Artaxerxes Ochus; and Statira, daughter of Darius Codomannus. By his own direction, his body was carried to Alexandria, where Ptolemy Lagus deposited it in a gold coffin, which one of his successors changed for a glass one. Having appointed no successor, his generals divided his conquests among themselves. The character of Alexander was made up of very great and very bad qualities. He committed many odious cruelties, and he drank to a shameful excess. In one of his drunken fits he stabbed his most intimate friend Clytus with his own hand. Yet he often performed deeds that indicated a benevolent mind; and though he was pleased with the fulsome ascription of divinity, on other occasions he expressed his abhorrence of adulation and flattery. He possessed a taste for learning and the fine arts, and had always about him men of science, philosophers, and poets.

ALEXANDER BALAS, an impostor, who was employed by the Romans to personate the son of Antiochus Epiphanus, king of Syria, in order to take possession of that kingdom. He defeated Demetrius Soter, the lawful heir; but that prince, with the aid of Ptolemy king of Egypt, afterwards gained a victory over the usurper, who fled into Arabia, where he was slain, 146 B.C.—There are in the British Museum many copper and silver coins with the head of Balas.

ALEXANDER II. This prince was called Zebinas, or the 'bought one,' as it was reported that he had been purchased from slavery. Put to death 2nd century B.C.—The British Museum contains coins, both copper and silver, of this sovereign also.

ALEXANDER JANNEUS, king of the Jews, was the son of Hyrcan, and succeeded his brother Aristobulus, 106 B.C. Aristobulus had cast him into prison; whence he was taken at his death and placed on the throne. He began his reign by murdering one of his brothers, and entered into hostilities, which lasted long, with Ptolemy Lathyrus, king of Egypt. His cruelties irritated his subjects, and produced a civil war, which endured six years. Alexander, however, proved successful, and in one day caused 800 captives to be crucified, after their wives and children had been murdered before their eyes. Having secured the throne, he carried his arms into foreign countries, and made several important conquests. D. of intemperance, 79 B.C.

ALEXANDER was the son of Aristobulus II., king of the Jews. He was sent prisoner to Rome by Pompey, with his father, brother Antigonus, and two sisters. On being delivered from prison and going into Judæa, he raised an army, and opposed Hyrcan, the brother of Aristobulus, but was defeated by Gabinius, the Roman general, A M. 3979, taken prisoner, and sent to Rome. Cæsar afterwards restored him to liberty, in hope that he would be serviceable to him in Syria; but he again turned against the Romans, and with the same bad success. Scipio caused him to be beheaded at Antioch, by order of Pompey, 49 B.C.

ALEXANDER SEVERUS. (See SEVERUS.)

ALEXANDER I., king of Scotland, succeeded his brother Edgar in 1107. Before his accession he was remarkable for his seeming piety and humility, but afterwards he was so distinguished by his fiery disposition, that he was called "the Fierce." He was very rigorous in the administration of justice; on which account several insurrections took place, all of which he subdued. D. 1124.

ALEXANDER II., king of Scotland, succeeded his father, William the Lion, in 1214, at the age of 16. He engaged in a long and destructive war with John, king of England, who invaded his dominions; but he retaliated severely, by marching into England, where he committed great ravages. In 1221 he married the sister of Henry III. of England; in consequence of which, peace was restored between the two kingdoms.

ALEXANDER III., king of Scotland, was the son of the preceding by his second wife, and came to the crown at the age of eight years. Soon after he was married to Margaret, daughter of Henry III. of England, whom he assisted against the English barons. He defeated the king of Norway, who had invaded Scotland with a large army. He was killed hunting, in 1285, leaving the character of a great and good prince.

ALEXANDER, king of Poland, was chosen such on the death of his brother, John Albert, in 1501. D. 1506, aged 45.—He was a courageous, humane, and liberal prince.

ALEXANDER NEVSKOI, grand-duke of Russia, and a saint of the Greek church. His father, Jaroslaf, in 1227 removed his residence from Novgorod to Peryaslaf, leaving at the former place his two sons, Feodor and Alexander, as his representatives. Five years after, Feodor died, and Alexander became sole viceroy. About 1239 he married a princess of Polotzk, and began to strengthen his kingdom against the incursions of his neighbours, who drew to their interest Valdemar II., king of Denmark, with the Swedes and the Teutonic knights. Notwithstanding this combination, Alexander mustered his forces, and proceeded to engage the enemy. The armies met on the banks of the Neva. The battle began at six in the morning, and lasted the whole day; by the time that the shades of evening were drawing over the field, Alexander had gained a complete victory. D. at Vladimir, 1218 or 1219; D. at Kasuncow, 1263.—After his death, he was canonized; and in 1712, Peter the Great erected a monastery on the spot where he gained his fame, to which, in 1723, he caused the bones of the saint to be brought in great pomp. The empress Catherine built a superb church within the same monastery, with a magnificent mausoleum for herself and her descendants. The shrine of the saint is of massive silver. Peter the Great instituted the order of St. Alexander Nevskoi; but dying before he had named the knights, this was done by Catherine I. in 1725.

ALEXANDER I., emperor of Russia, was the son of the emperor Paul and of Maria, daughter of Prince Eugene of Würtemberg. On the 24th of March, 1801, his father was assassinated, not without some suspicions that Alexander was implicated in the conspiracy which had been formed against him; and which terminated so fatally to the son of the empress Catherine II. When he ascended the throne, Russia was engaged in a war with England; and as he found that her commerce was being greatly crippled by the naval ascendancy of the British, he took immediate steps to endeavour to reconcile the hostile differences between the two kingdoms. Accordingly a convention took place, and an agreement was signed between them on the 17th of June, 1801. The unparalleled successes of Napoleon were then striking alarm into the breasts of most of the sovereigns of Europe, and on the 11th of April, 1805 Alexander concluded an alliance with England, which was joined by Austria on the following 9th of August and by Sweden on the 3rd of October. The lightning rapidity with which Napoleon conducted his wars, however, rendered almost entirely nugatory the physical influence of Russia against him; for the succession of battles which were fought between the 6th and the 18th of October completely crushed the armies of Austria before the arrival of the Russian troops. On the 25th Alexander made his appearance at Berlin, concluded a secret convention with the king of Prussia, joined hands with him at midnight in the tomb of Frederick the Great, whose coffin he kissed, and in the gloomy vault of the departed, the two sovereigns pledged themselves to an eternal friendship with each other. He hastened now to join the emperor of Austria. On the 2nd of November the Russian and Austrian troops, commanded in person by their respective emperors, were met and beaten by the French at the battle of Austerlitz, which was the cause of an immediate convention being agreed to between France and Austria, and the departure of Alexander with the remains of his shattered army. In order to gain time and recruit his strength, Alexander feigned to treat for peace, but suddenly broke off the negotiations, or failed to fulfil the conditions which had been partially made, and recommenced hostilities. The battles of Jena and Eylau were fought and won by Napoleon, and on the 14th of June, 1807, the united armies of Russia and Prussia were signally defeated at the destructive battle of Friedland, and compelled to fall back behind the Niemen. This terrible event ended the campaign. On the 21st an armistice was arranged, and five days later, the emperors of Russia and France met in a tent on a raft, in the middle of the Niemen. It is affirmed that the foes became friends, and on the

ALEXANDER I., EMPEROR OF RUSSIA.

7th of July following, a treaty of peace was signed at Tilsit, Alexander, in a secret article, engaging to unite with Napoleon in a war against England. This treaty converted all the former friends of Alexander into enemies. In accordance with the plans of Napoleon, on the 24th February, 1808, Alexander declared war against Sweden, and finally, after much hard fighting, obtained possession of Swedish Finland. On the 27th September the French and Russian emperors again met at Erfurt, where a congress was held for the purpose of bringing about a general peace; and although both Napoleon and Alexander united in proposing terms to England, the negotiations proved unsuccessful, and were broken off in a few weeks. The friendship between these two sovereigns lasted five years, and the treaty of Vienna, signed on the 14th of October, 1809, brought to Russia the annexation of Eastern Galicia, ceded by Austria. By the close of 1811 disputes had risen to such a height between the two emperors, that a rupture became inevitable, and on the following 19th of March, Alexander declared war against Napoleon. A peace was concluded with Turkey, with which Russia had been at war, and by the 25th of June, Napoleon, with an immense army under his command, was marching upon Russian ground. Alexander had an interview in Finland, with Bernadotte, the crown-prince of Sweden. The French army had already entered Smolensk. "Should St. Petersburg be taken," said he, "I will go into Siberia. I will resume our ancient customs, and, like our long-bearded ancestors, will return anew to conquer the empire." "This resolution," cried Bernadotte, "will liberate Europe!" On the 7th of September, Borodino was fought, and on each side 25,000 men fell. On the 14th Moscow was entered by the French, but only to find it a vast pile of smoking and flaming ruins. Napoleon commenced his retreat, and before the remnant of his immense army had crossed the Niemen, on the 16th of December, the bones of 300,000 Frenchmen were already bleaching on the plains of Russia. Alexander had joined his army in pursuit of Napoleon. He was present at the battle of Dresden, fought on the 26th and 27th August; at that of Leipsic on the 18th October; and on the 24th of February, 1814, met the king of Prussia at Chaumont. Here these two sovereigns bound themselves by a treaty to pursue the war against France until it was successfully closed, even at the sacrifice of all the resources of their dominions. On the 30th of March following, they victoriously entered the French capital, Napoleon was deposed, and on the 25th of July, Alexander arrived at his own capital, St. Petersburg, where he was greeted with every public demonstration of joy by his admiring subjects. At the congress of Vienna, opened on the 3rd November, 1814, Alexander was recognized as king of Poland, which country had, for some time, been merged in his dominions. The escape of Napoleon from Elba, and the events which followed it, brought Alexander again to Paris, where, on the 26th September, 1815, he, the emperor of Austria, and the king of Prussia, affixed their signatures to an instrument, which had for its object the preservation of universal peace on Christian principles, and which was called the Holy Alliance. By the 13th of December following, he was once more in his own capital. With the banishment of Napoleon, the great events which had marked the political career of Alexander closed. In the beginning of 1825 he left St. Petersburg on a tour through his southern provinces. After visiting the principal towns in the Crimea, he arrived at Taganrog, on the Sea of Azof. Here he was taken ill of the common intermittent fever of the country, and gradually sank into insensibility, and then into death. D. 1777; D. at Taganrog, 1825.—Alexander and Frederick William, king of Prussia, visited England in 1814, and were received with the most tumultuous rejoicings, and entertained with truly magnificent hospitality. As a sovereign, he greatly extended the happiness of his people, promoted their literature, advanced their civilization, and improved their institutions. He founded upwards of 2,000 schools for the benefit of the humbler classes, established 204 gymnasia, and remodelled seven universities. He abolished personal slavery, paved the way for the final emancipation of those serfs that are attached to the soil, and from a subordinate rank, raised his country to be one of the leading European powers. At his death it was rumoured that he had been poisoned, but there was no foundation for such a report.

ALEXANDER II., present emperor of Russia, is surnamed Nicholaewitch, as the eldest son of the late emperor Nicholas. His mother was a sister of Frederick William IV., the present afflicted king of Prussia. On the death of his father, which took place on March 2, 1855, he became autocrat of all the Russias, and immediately issued a proclamation intimating his resolution to pursue the plans of Nicholas, and, if possible, bring the war, which was then raging in the Crimea, between the united forces of Turkey, England, France, and Sardinia, and those of his own dominions, to a successful termination. In this, however, he was doomed to disappointment; for on the 8th September, 1855, the allies obtained possession of Sebastopol, the stronghold of the Crimea, which was the immediate precursor to a suspension of hostilities. Peace was concluded in the same year; since which time Alexander has steadily devoted himself to the administration of the internal policy of his extensive dominions, to the development of arts and manufactures, and the gradual abolition of serfdom, a task which even the energy of his father recoiled from undertaking. B. 1818.

ALEXANDER I., bishop of Rome, was a Roman by birth, and succeeded Evaristus in 109. He stands as a martyr and saint in the Roman calendar. D. 129.—Platina attributes the introduction of holy water to this pope.

ALEXANDER II., Pope, was raised to the papal see in 1061. The imperial party opposed his election, and in a council held at Basil procured Cadalous, bishop of Parma, to be elected by the name of Honorius II. After a strong contest, the party of Alexander prevailed, and all Europe acknowledged him pope. He carried the papal power to a great height, and most of the sovereign princes yielded to his authority. D. 1073.

ALEXANDER III. succeeded Adrian VII. in 1159. There was a competitor set up against him by the emperor Frederick I., but England and France acknowledged Alexander. On the death of his opponent, the emperor procured Cardinal Guy to be elected pope, by the name of Paschal III.; but Alexander being supported by the Roman clergy, deposed the emperor, and absolved his subjects from their allegiance. On this Frederick marched to Rome, and having driven out Alexander, placed his rival in the pontifical chair; but becoming weary of the contest, he acknowledged Alexander as legal pontiff. D. at Rome, 1181.—This pontiff took part with Thomas à Becket in his quarrel with Henry II., and canonized him after his assassination.

ALEXANDER IV., Pope, was raised from the bishopric of Ostia to the papal throne, in 1254. He claimed a right to dispose of the crown of Sicily, but was unsuccessful in the dispute which it occasioned. D. 1261.

ALEXANDER V., Pope, was born of such poor parents that in his childhood he was obliged to go about begging. An Italian monk taking a fancy to him, got him admitted among the Friars Minors. After studying at Paris, he obtained the bishopric of Vicenzia, and next the archbishopric of Milan. Pope Innocent VII. made him cardinal, and appointed him legate. On the deposition of Gregory XII., in 1409, the council of Pisa elected him pope. B. in the island of Candia; D. at Bologna, 1410.—He was a liberal and munificent pontiff.

ALEXANDER VI., Pope. The original name of this pontiff was Roderic Borgia, and his mother was sister to Calixtus III., by whom he was made cardinal in 1455. On the death of Innocent VIII., he contrived by his intrigues to get himself elected by the conclave, though he had then four sons and a daughter by a Roman lady. His son, Cæsar Borgia, was a monster of wickedness like himself. There is hardly a crime of which these profligate wretches have not been accused, and it seems with justice. At length Providence punished them by the same means which they had prepared for the ruin of others. In 1503 the pope and his son attempted to poison a rich cardinal on account of his wealth; when, by a mistake of the attendant, they drank the wine which they had destined for their victim. The pope died almost directly, but Borgia recovered, and was killed some years after. B. at Valencia, Spain, 1431.

ALEXANDER VII., Pope, was originally called Fabio Chigi. After passing through a variety of offices with credit, he became a bishop and cardinal. In 1655, on the death of Innocent X., he was elected pope, owing to his affectation of extraordinary piety and humility.

B. at Sienna, 1599; D. 1667.—He published, in 1656, a famous bull against the Jansenists; yet, it is said, he was a liberal-minded prelate, and particularly favourable to the Protestants. He was an eminent scholar, and an encourager of learning.

ALEXANDER VIII., Pope, received several preferments from Urban VIII.; Innocent X. created him a cardinal, and in 1689 the college raised him to the papal chair. B. at Venice, 1610; D. 1691.

ALEXANDER of Ægea, a Peripatetic philosopher, was the tutor of Nero, whom it is said he corrupted by his instructions. Lived in the 1st century A.D.—He wrote a commentary on Aristotle's Meteorology.

ALEXANDER, a bishop of Hierapolis, who espoused the doctrine of Nestorius, that there were two different natures in Christ, which he supported in the council of Ephesus. Lived in the 5th century, and died in exile.

ALEXANDER, a Norman by birth, and made bishop of Lincoln in 1123. He rebuilt his cathedral, which had been burnt down, and enlarged the revenues of his see; he also built the castles of Banbury, Sleaford, and Newark, and founded two monasteries. D. 1147.

ALEXANDER of Paris, a French poet, who wrote a poem on the life of Alexander the Great, in verses of twelve syllables, which measure has ever since been called Alexandrine. Flourished in the 12th century.

ALEXANDER, an English abbot, who was sent by Henry III. to support the rights of the English nation at the court of Rome. This commission he discharged with such fidelity that Pandulphus, the pope's legate in England, excommunicated him, and caused him to be imprisoned. D. about 1217.—His works are, "Victoria a Proteo," "De Ecclesiæ Potestate," "De Potestate Vicaria," "De Cessatione Papali," &c.

ALEXANDER AB ALEXANDRO, an eminent lawyer, who, from his excellent honesty, renounced his profession, owing to the corrupt state in which the practice of it was in his time. B. at Naples, 1461; D. about 1521. He wrote a curious book entitled "Genialium Dierum," in the manner of Aulus Gellius's "Attic Nights."

ALEXANDER, William, a Scotch statesman and poet, who, in 1613, became gentleman usher to Prince Charles, and received the honour of knighthood from James I. In 1621 the same monarch gave him a grant of Nova Scotia, which he intended to colonize, and Charles I. afterwards patronized the scheme by appointing him lieutenant of that country, and founding an order of knights-baronet in Scotland, each of whom was to contribute towards the settlement, and to have a portion for the same. The number of these baronets was limited to 150. Sir William afterwards sold Nova Scotia to the French. In 1630 he was created viscount, and afterwards Earl Stirling. B. at Menstrie, 1580; D. 1640.—Notwithstanding the great affluence of Alexander in powers of versification, he was entirely destitute of the poetic faculty. His poem entitled "Aurora" was published in 1604, and in 1607 a collection of his tragedies in 4to appeared. The title is now extinct, the last of the male descendants having died in 1739.

ALEXANDER POLYHISTOR, an historian, who was the slave of Cornelius Lentulus, who became his pupil, and gave him his freedom. He was burnt to death in his house at Laurentum, which so affected his wife, that she hanged herself. Lived 80 years B.C.—He wrote five books concerning Rome; and various other works of his, in history and philosophy, are mentioned by Plutarch and others. Suidas says, that in his writings he mentions a Hebrew woman named Moso, who was the author of the Jewish laws. All his works are lost.

ALEXANDER, St., an Asiatic, who though connected with an Eastern court, quitted it for a religious retirement. He founded the order called Acemeles, because one of them was always to be on the watch to sing hymns. D. about 430.

ALEXANDER, a bishop of Jerusalem, celebrated alike for his piety and his sufferings. He studied under Pantænus, and afterwards under St. Clement of Alexandria. Being made bishop of Cappadocia, he was imprisoned in the persecution begun by Severus, and remained in confinement nearly eight years. On his release he was associated in the government of Jerusalem with Narcissus, on whose death he became sole bishop; but in the reign of Decius he was again imprisoned, and cruelly used. Lived in the 3rd century.—He wrote many letters, which are lost; but Eusebius has preserved extracts of four. He was the founder of a library at Jerusalem, spoken of by Jerome.

ALEXANDER, a county of the Illinois, at the angle between the Ohio and Mississippi rivers. Area, 375 square miles. This county was organized in 1819. Desc. Chiefly pastoral and agricultural. Pop. about 5,000.

ALEXANDRETTA, or SCANDEROON, ăl'-ex-an-dret'-a, or skăn'-de-roon, the seaport of Aleppo, at the south-east part of a bay in the Mediterranean. Besides having a large trade, it has the best harbour on the Syrian coast.

ALEXANDRIA, ăl'-ex-an'-dre-a, the Iskenderiyeh of the Arabs, a large and celebrated city, the ancient capital of Egypt, founded by Alexander the Great. It is situate 118 miles N.W. from Cairo, on the south-east coast of the Mediterranean, and at no great distance from Lake Marcotis. Under the dynasty of the Ptolemies, a race of enlightened princes, whose pride it was to foster commerce and the sciences, this city made great progress. On what was then the island of Pharos, but which is not an island now, they built a pharos, or lighthouse, which was considered one of the seven wonders of the world. The city, at that epoch, engrossed the commerce of India, the grand object of ancient ambition. It became also, at the same time, the centre of all sciences connected with mathematics, astronomy, and geography, and contained an immense library, the largest of antiquity, chiefly collected by Ptolemy Soter. Altogether it consisted of 700,000 volumes, 500,000 of which were destroyed when Julius Cæsar was blockaded in the Greek part of the city, and the rest by the Saracenic general Amer, A.D. 640. After falling before the arms of the Romans, Alexandria scarcely lost any of its splendour, and continued still to be the channel by which the commodities of India, Arabia, and Eastern Africa were transported to Europe; but when conquered by the caliphs, and subjected to the Saracen yoke, it then began and continued to decline till the discovery of a passage to India by the Cape of Good Hope, in 1497, gave the final blow to its importance and trade. Its principal buildings and institutions consist of the palace of the pasha, a multitude of mosques, a naval arsenal, the custom-house, naval and military hospitals, a medical college, and several educational establishments. The chief ecclesiastical building is the mosque of the Thousand and One Pillars. Exp. These consist principally of the produce of Egypt; comprising cotton, rice, wheat, beans, barley, linseed, and drugs; hides, mother-of-pearl, natron, and potashes; coffee from Arabia; indigo, opium, saltpetre, ivory, ostrich feathers, soda, and dates. Imp. Principally timber, iron, copper, tin plates, hardware, cotton, woollen, and silk goods, paper, cutlery, jewellery, and machinery, &c. Pop. about 66,000, chiefly Copts, Turks, and Jews. Lat. 31° 13′ N. Lon. 29° 55′ 52″ E.—This city was founded 332 B.C., and Dinocrates, a celebrated architect, who rebuilt the temple of Diana at Ephesus, was engaged to lay out its plan. There are now very few remains by which its ancient magnificence can be recognized. One of the two obelisks known as Cleopatra's Needles is still standing, and the other, which was presented to the British government by Mehemet Ali (to remove which to England an unsuccessful attempt was made), we believe, is still lying prostrate not far from it. The origin of the name of "needles" being applied to these singular erections, arises from the Arabic word mesalleh, signifying both an obelisk and a packing-needle; and as the Arabs ascribe them to Cleopatra, so they adopted the word needle as being the more appropriate term by which the works of a lady should be recognized. The pillar of Diocletian, better known as "Pompey's Pillar," stands between the city and Lake Marcotis, and the catacombs are at a distance of about two miles from it, cut in the face of a calcareous rock, which fronts the sea. Such are the principal melancholy memorials of this vast and ancient city, which, according to Diodorus Siculus, had on its rolls in his time (44 years B.C.) 300,000 freemen. When Amer took it, he said, in his letter to the caliph, that he found in it 4,000 palaces, 4,000 baths, 40,000 Jews who paid tribute, 400 royal circuses, and 12,000 gardeners, who supplied the city with all kinds of herbs in great plenty. Alexandria now forms the centre through which the intercourse between England and India is carried on. Its port is frequented by British, Austrian, and French steamers. From it, travellers cross the Isthmus of Suez by a railway, lately completed, to Cairo; the distance 130 miles, time of transit seven hours; thence by omnibuses across the desert to Suez, where they embark on steamers for the ports of India and southern Asia. The whole line to Suez will soon be finished. While we write, a submarine cable is being laid from Cape Hellas to Canea, in Candia, and thence to Alexandria; so that now the only interruption to a direct and almost immediate communication between Egypt and England will be about 100 miles of land line, between Cape Hellas and Constantinople, which it is expected will be completed early in the spring of 1859.—On the 14th June, 1798, the city was stormed by Napoleon Bonaparte, and taken. On the 21st March, 1801, at the battle of Alexandria, when the French under Menou were defeated, Sir Ralph Abercrombie was mortally wounded, and on the 28th of August following, the French garrison yielded to the British under the command of General Hutchinson. (See Sir Ralph ABERCROMBIE, EGYPT, &c.)

ALEXANDRIA, a village of Scotland, 1 miles N. of Dumbarton. Pop. about 4,000, chiefly employed in the cotton manufacture.—A station on the Glasgow and Loch Lomond Railway.

ALEXANDRIA, the capital of a barren district of Russia, in Cherson, 70 miles W. of Ekatherinoslav. Pop. 2,500; of the district, 21,000.- This is the name of various small places throughout Russia.

ALEXANDRIA, the name of a great many small towns and villages of the United States.

ALEXANDRIA, a county in Virginia, United States. The inhabitants are chiefly employed in agricultural and pastoral pursuits.

ALEXANDRIA, the capital city and port of the above, on the west bank of the Potomac, 7 miles S. of Washington. Trade. Maize, wheat, flour, and tobacco. Pop. 10,000.—Alexandria, previous to 1846, belonged to the district of Columbia. It has a commodious harbour, to which ships of the line can ascend by the river.

ALEXANDRINA LAKE. (See AUSTRALIA.)

ALEXANDROV, al'-ex-an'-drov, a small town of European Russia, 58 miles from Moscow, where the czar Ivan Vasilievitch occasionally spent the summer, and where he established the first printing-press introduced into Russia. Pop. 3,000.—Here is the imperial breeding-stud of horses, an establishment supported by the crown, and remarkable for the extent and disposition of its buildings. It was commenced in 1761, by the empress Elizabeth, and twenty years were spent in its erection.

ALEXANDROVSK, al'-ex-an'-dro-vosk', a town of European Russia, 48 miles from Ekatherinoslav, the capital of a district of the same name, on the left bank of the Dnieper, at the mouth of the Moscovka. The town is fortified, and the district is for the greater part a barren heath. Pop. of town about 6,000.

ALEXANDROVSKAIA, al'-ex-an-drov-skai'-a, a fort of Russia, on the Dnieper, 114 miles N.E. of Cherson.

ALEXANDROWKA, al'-ex-an-drow'-ka, the name of several small towns of Russia, in Cherson, Ekatherinoslav, Tambov, &c.

ALEXICACUS, al-ex'-e-kai'-kus, a surname of Apollo, from his delivering mankind from plagues.

ALEXIS, a-lex'-is, a Greek comic poet, uncle to Menander, of whose works a few fragments remain. Flourished 4th century B.C.

ALEXIS of Piedmont, a writer, who was of a noble family, and spent fifty-seven years of his life in travelling. At the age of 82 he was in Milan, and happening to see a poor man expire under the hands of an unskilful surgeon, he was so deeply stung by remorse for not interfering to save his life, that he renounced the world and sought retirement in a hermitage. Lived in the 16th century.—He was the author, of "Medical Secrets," a work which was printed at Basil, 1536, and which has been translated into several languages.

ALEXIS, or ALEXEI, MICHAELOWITCH, mi'-kel-o-vitch, the son of Michael, czar of Russia, ascended the throne in 1645, at the age of sixteen. His reign was disturbed by foreign and civil wars. Having succeeded in quelling domestic dissension, he engaged in a war with Poland, which ended by his acquiring the provinces of Smolensko, Tchernigov, and Seweria, for a sum of money. He next entered upon a long and destructive war against Charles Gustavus, of Sweden, who was more than his equal, and compelled him to retire within his own territories. He next engaged the Turks, uniting his forces with those of the king of Poland, under the famous John Sobieski, who, on the 18th October, 1672, gained a splendid victory over the Ottomans at Kaluzo. A short peace with Turkey was the result of this battle; but the terms on which it was obtained being deemed unsatisfactory by the Polish chief, war was recommenced, and before it was again concluded, Alexis died. B. at Moscow, 1630; D. 1677.—He was an upright but severe prince, and was the first who caused the laws of Russia to be printed. He also encouraged the arts and sciences, paid attention to the interests of commerce, and laid the plans of those projects which his son Peter the Great afterwards carried into execution.

ALEXIS PETROWITCH, pe'-tro-vitch, son of Peter the Great, by Eudokia Lapukin, when a child, was committed to the care of the Russian priests, who instilled into him all their barbarous prejudices. Being of a disposition which seemed likely to overturn all the reforms which his father had planned for the civilization of his people, he was obliged to sign his renunciation of the right of succession, in 1716. Soon afterwards he escaped to Vienna, and put himself under the protection of Charles VI., who sent him first to Inspruck, and then to Naples. By a promise of forgiveness, however, he was induced to return to Moscow, where he was thrown into prison, tried secretly, and condemned to death. The trial was printed by order of the emperor. The public manifesto asserts that he died of an apoplectic fit, but it is suspected that he was secretly put to death. B. at Moscow, 1699.

ALEXIS I. COMNENUS, kom-ne'-nus, who on the deposition of Nicephorus, in 1081, was chosen emperor of the East by the troops. The greatest part of his reign was disturbed by wars with the Turks, Scythians, and other powers. B. at Constantinople, 1048; D. 1118.—He was a vigilant prince, well versed in the art of government, and attentive to the interests of his people. He was the father of the celebrated Anna Comnena, who, in the "Alexiad," the history of her father's reign, has drawn his character in the most flattering colours. The first crusaders, roused to action by the preaching of Peter the Hermit, passed through his dominions during his reign.

ALEXIS II. COMNENUS, surnamed PORPHYROGENITUS, por'-fi-ro-gen'-e-tus, was the son of Michael Comnenus, whom he succeeded in 1180, under the care of the empress Mary, his mother. Her conduct gave offence to the nobility, and at length an open insurrection ensued, headed by Andronicus Comnenus, who took Constantinople in 1183, imprisoned the empress, and compelled the young emperor to admit him as his associate in the empire. In the year following, however, he caused Alexis to be strangled.

ALEXIS III. ANGELUS, emperor of the East, deposed his brother Isaac, and threw him into prison, where he was deprived of his sight. Alexis, the son of Isaac, prevailed on the French and Venetians to espouse the cause of his father. A large army besieged Constantinople in 1203, and the usurper fled with his treasure to Thrace. The people then released Isaac, and placed him on the throne. Alexis fell into the hands of Theodore Lascaris, who put out his eyes, and confined him in a monastery, where he died.

ALEXIS IV., after the flight of his uncle, was associated with his father Isaac in the government. He was deposed and put to death by the people, for endeavouring to raise heavy contributions to pay his allies, and to bring the Eastern empire under the authority of the pope. D. 1204.

ALEXIS V. DUCAS, called Murtzuffle, from his black heavy eyebrows, on the murder of the last-mentioned emperor, was raised to the throne. The Latins, however, laid siege to Constantinople, and pressed it so closely, that Murtzuffle was obliged to escape by night. He was deprived of his eyes by his father-in-law, to whom he fled for refuge; and, after rambling about as a mendicant, was seized by the Latins, who cast him from the top of Theodosius's Pillar, when he was dashed to pieces. Reigned at the commencement of the 13th century.

ALEXIS DEL ARCO, a-laix'-es dail ar'-ko, a celebrated deaf and dumb Spanish portrait-painter. B. at Madrid, 1625; D. 1700.

ALEXOPOL, ă-lex'-o-pol, the capital of a circle in Pultawa, Russia, 30 miles S. of Pultawa.

ALEYBEH, a-lai'-be, a large and populous place in W. Africa, on the bank of the Senegal. Lat. 16° 50′ N. Lon. 14° 4′ W.

ALEYN, Charles, a-lain', an English poet, who wrote two poems on the battles of Cressy and Poictiers, and some other effusions. D. 1640.

ALFACAR, al-fa-ka, a town of Grenada, with extensive and fine Moorish remains. Pop. 1,100.

ALFAQUES, al-fa'kais, a Spanish seaport town in the province of Tarragona, at the mouth of the Ebro. Lat. 40° 30′ N. Lon. 0° 45′ E.—In the neighbourhood there are extensive marshes and small ponds, where a great quantity of salt is deposited, procured, and constantly being exported.

ALFAR DAGH, al-far daw, a mountain of Asiatic Turkey, in Anatolia, not far from the Black Sea. Lat. 41° 35′ N. Lon. 33° 5′ E.

ALFARIG, or ALFRAIG, ăl'-fraig, a district in Rossshire, Scotland, well wooded with firs.

ALFARO, al-far-o, a town of Spain, at the conflux of the Alama and Ebro. Pop. 5,000. Lat. 42° 16′ N. Lon. 1° 52′ W.

ALFAYATES, al'-fa-ya'-tais, a fortified place of Portugal, 150 miles N.E. of Lisbon. Lat. 40° 27′ N. Lon. 6° 47′ W.

ALFECHIMO, al'-fe-che'-mo, one of the four districts of the island of Corfu, containing a considerable number of villages. Pop. about 15,000. (See CORFU.)

ALFELD, al'-felt, a walled town of Hanover, on the river Leine. Manf. Linen and yarn; and there are corn, oil, paper, and saw-mills. In the neighbourhood hops and flax are cultivated. Pop. 3,000.—A station on the Hanover and Cassel Railway.

ALFENUS VARUS, Publius, ăl-fe'-nus vair'-us, a Roman jurist, who, from being a shoemaker, became an advocate, and at length consul. He wrote forty books of digests, and some collections, cited by Aulus Gellius. Horace mentions him in his third satire, and Virgil speaks of his conduct towards him with gratitude. B. at Cremona. Lived 1st century B.C.—There is another of this name, who was captain of the guards to Vitellius.

ALFIERI, Vittorio, vee-tor'-e-o ăl'-fe-air'-e, a celebrated poet, was born of a wealthy and noble Italian family. He lost his father when a child, and his mother having married again, he was placed under the guardianship of his uncle, and at the age of 13 was admitted a student of philosophy at the university of Turin. At 14 he became master of his own income, entered the army, and at 17 commenced his travels under the escort of an English Roman Catholic tutor. He visited France, England, and Holland, and then returned to Italy and took up his abode first at Siena, and then at Florence. Here he made the acquaintance of the wife of Charles Edward Stuart, known as the Young Pretender, and upon whom the affections of his heart were fixed for ever afterwards. On the death of that lady's husband, it is said that he privately married her, although she continued to retain the title of countess of Albany. With the exception of a brief interval, when he resided in France with the countess, he spent the remainder of his life in Florence, devoting nearly the whole of his time to study. B. at Asti, Piedmont, 1749; D. at Florence, 1803.—The early years of Alfieri were given to dissipation, and not till 1773 did he commence writing with a view to public fame. By 1782 he had completed fourteen tragedies, which are wonderfully effective in operating upon the passions of an Italian audience. His "Saul" and his "Filipo" are considered the finest of his productions. (See ALBANY, Countess of.)

ALFONZO or ALPHONZO. This is the name of several kings who have reigned in Spain, Portugal, Sicily, and Naples, and is variously spelt; but we have retained the mode by which it is best known in this country. (See ALPHONSO.)

ALFORD, ăl-ford, a parish and township of Lincolnshire, 24 miles from Boston. Area, 1,410 acres. Pop. 2,300.—There is another small parish in Somerset of the same name.

ALFORD, a district and parish, 28 miles N.W. of Aberdeen, Scotland. The district contains fourteen parishes, and is watered by the river Don, and surrounded by hills and mountains. Area of the parish, 8,000 acres. Pop. 1,100; of the district, 13,000.—In 1645 a battle was fought in this parish between the Covenanting army under General Baillie, and the royalists under Montrose, in which the former was defeated.

ALFRED THE GREAT was the youngest son of Ethelwolf, king of the West Saxons, and Osburga, daughter of Oslac the Goth, who inherited the blood of the subkings of the Isle of Wight. At the age of five he was sent to Rome, where Pope Leo IV. anointed him with the royal unction. Ethelwolf died in 858, leaving his dominions to Ethelbald and Ethelbert, and his personal estate to his younger sons, Ethelred and Alfred. Ethelbald did not long survive his father, and was succeeded by Ethelbert; but he dying in 866, left the throne to Ethelred, who made Alfred his prime-minister and general of his armies. Ethelred dying in 871, from a wound which he received from the Danes at the battle of Mertune,—probably Merton, near Reading,—Alfred found himself, at the age of 22, the monarch of a distracted kingdom. After several unfortunate actions with the Danes, he disbanded his followers and wandered about the woods, and finally found shelter in the cottage of a herdsman named Denulf, at Athelney, in Somersetshire. In this retreat he remained about five months, when he received information that Odun, earl of Devon, had obtained a victory over the Danes, in Devonshire, and had taken their magical standard. On this, Alfred is said to have disguised himself as a harper, and obtained admission to the Danish camp, where his skill was so much admired that he was retained a considerable time, and was admitted to play before King Gorm, or Guthran, and his chiefs. Having gained a knowledge of the state of the camp, he directed his nobles to collect their vassals, and to meet him at Selwood, in Wiltshire, which was done so secretly, that the Danes were surprised at Eddington, and completely defeated. This was in May, 878. After the victory Alfred behaved with great magnanimity to his foes, giving up the kingdom of the East Angles to those of the Danes who embraced the Christian religion.

His success now enabled him to put his kingdom into a state of defence, and to increase his navy. Having recovered London, which had been taken by the Danes, the whole country seemed to acquire a new life under his vigorous administration. After the repose of a few years, an immense number of Danish forces landed in Kent; on which those who settled in Northumberland broke their treaty, and, fitting out two fleets, sailed round the coast, and committed great ravages. They were, however, soon defeated by Alfred, who caused several of their leaders to be executed at Winchester as an example. Thus by his energy, activity, bravery, and wisdom, did he secure the peace of his dominions, and strike terror into the hearts of his enemies, leaving the country in a very different condition, as to its internal safety and prosperity, from that in which he found it. B. at Wantage, in Berkshire, 849; D. 900.—There is, perhaps, no prince who has had the surname of 'Great' given him with more universal consent than Alfred. He is said to have been engaged in 56 battles by sea and land, although his valour as a warrior has excited less admiration than his wisdom as a legislator. He composed a body of statutes, instituted the trial by jury, and divided the kingdom into shires and tithings. He was so exact in his government that robbery was unheard of, and valuable goods might be left on the high-road without danger. He also formed a parliament, which met in London twice a year. There was so little learning in his time, that from the Thames to the Humber hardly a man could be found who understood Latin. To remedy this state of things, he invited learned men from all parts, and endowed schools throughout his kingdom; and if indeed he was not the founder of the University of Oxford, he raised it to a reputation which it had never before enjoyed. Among other acts of munificence to that seat of learning, he founded University College. He was himself a learned prince, and composed several works, and translated others from the Latin, particularly "Boetius's Consolations of Philosophy." He divided the twenty-four hours into three equal parts; one he devoted to the service of God, another to public affairs, and the third to rest and refreshment. To Alfred, also, England is indebted for the foundation of her naval establishment, and he was the first who sent out ships to make the discovery of a north-east passage. In private life he was benevolent, pious, cheerful, and affable; and his deportment was both dignified and engaging. Several of the romantic incidents of his eventful life have suggested subjects for the historical painter: one of the best known of these is his allowing the cakes to burn whilst making his arrows in the cottage of the herdsman, during his obscurity at Athelney. "You can eat the cakes fast enough, though you will not take the trouble to look after them," was the rebuke which the angry herdsman's wife gave on this occasion to the disguised monarch for his want of vigilance.

ALFRED, the son of Ethelred the Unready, by Emma, daughter of Richard I, duke of Normandy. The ravages of the Danes induced his father to send him with his brother, afterwards Edward the Confessor, to Normandy, where they were educated. On the death of Canute, he landed in England with a chosen band of Normans, and would have succeeded in dethroning Harold, surnamed 'Harefoot,' if it had not been for the treachery of Earl Godwin. Alfred was taken prisoner, and his eyes were put out; after which he was confined in the monastery at Ely, where he died, or, as some say, was murdered, about 1037. B. 1003.

ALFRED ERNEST ALBERT, second son of her Majesty Queen Victoria and Prince Albert, embarked on board the ship Euryalus at Portsmouth, as a naval cadet, on the 27th October, 1858. B. August 6th, 1844.—Thus are the two eldest sons of the queen members of the naval and military professions, in which we trust their conduct will be such as to merit the admiration of their country, and to shed additional lustre round the name of their parents, whose virtues have so long commanded the affection and homage of the great nation over whose destinies they have been called to preside.

ALFRETON, ăl'-fre-ton, a market-town in Derbyshire, supposed to have derived its name from Alfred the Great. The inhabitants are occupied principally in the manufacture of brown earthenware and stockings, and in some iron-works and collieries in the vicinity. Pop. about 2,000.—Reached by the North Midland Railway.

ALFRIDE, or ELFRID, the illegitimate son of Oswy, king of Northumberland, on whose death he was violently persecuted by Egfrid, his brother. To avoid his violence he retired to Ireland, or, according to others, to Scotland, where he led a philosophical life. His brother, however, followed him with implacable malice, and waged war with those who granted him an asylum. In this contest Egfrid was slain, on which the Northumbrians elected Alfride to the vacant throne in 686.—This prince greatly endeared himself to his subjects, and was a liberal encourager of literature.

ALGARDI, Alexander, al-gar'-de, an Italian painter and sculptor, the son of a silk-mercer. He studied under Lewis Carracci, and executed many fine works; amongst which may be mentioned the Attila, which is the largest alto-relievo in the world, and is in St. Peter's church of the Vatican at Rome. B. at Bologna; D. at Rome, 1654.—As a sculptor, Algardi ranks among the first of the moderns. In infantile representation his excellence was great.

ALGARINEJO, al'-gar-e-naish'-o, a well-built town of Andalusia, Spain, 26 miles from Grenada. Manf. Wove fabrics, brandy, soap, oil, &c. Sheep, goats, mules, and asses are reared, game in the vicinity is abundant, and the inhabitants cultivate much fruit and vegetables. Pop. 5,000.

ALGARKIRK, ăl-gar-kirk, a parish of Lincolnshire, 8 miles from Spalding. Area, 6,050 acres.—Here there is to be seen a statue of Edgar, earl of Mercia, who having, in 870, defeated the Danes in a battle in this part, was slain the next day.

ALGAROTTI, Francis, al'-ga-rot'-e, a polite writer, who received a liberal education, and after visiting different countries, was made, by Frederick, king of Prussia, chevalier of the order of Merit, created a count, and appointed chamberlain. The king of Poland also highly esteemed him, and gave him the title of privy counsellor of the affairs of war. B. at Padua, 1712; D. at Pisa, 1764.—His works were published in Italian at Leghorn, 1765, and afterwards translated into French. Algarotti was a man of lively, but superficial genius; and though his writings show a taste for the fine arts, they convey little information.

ALGARVE, or ALGARVA, al-gar'-vai, a southern maritime province of Portugal, bounded on the W. and S. by the Atlantic, on the E. by Spain, and on the N. by Alentejo. Ext. 90 miles in length, with an average breadth of about 20. Area, 2,112 square miles. Desc. Hilly, and intersected with numerous valleys, which are fertile, although so little cultivated that a sufficient quantity of corn is not raised to meet the wants of the population. Pro. Oil, almonds, figs, wine, and olives. These are all exported, and the herring and sardine fisheries are very productive. In the mountains numerous goats are pastured, and the oak is reared. Pop. 150,000.—At the S.W. extremity of this province is Cape St. Vincent, where Admiral Sir John Jervis, afterwards called, from this victory, Lord St. Vincent, defeated the Spanish fleet on the 14th February, 1797.

ALGECIRAS, al'-jai-the'-ras, a maritime town of Spain, in Andalusia, in the Gulf of Gibraltar, between Cape Algeciras and the rock of Gibraltar. Manf. Coarse linen and cotton fabrics, gloves, brown and stained paper, sombrero hats, Morocco leather, earthenware, and copper utensils. Pop. about 12,000. Lat. 36° 8' N. Lon. 5° 26' W.—This town was built by the Moors, and, after a siege of twenty months, was, in 1344, taken from them by Alphonso X. It is memorable in British naval history, as the locality of a great victory gained by Admiral Saumarez over the combined French and Spanish fleets, on June 9, 1801.

ALGEMESI, or ALGEMESIA, al'-jai-mai'-se, a town of Spain, in Valencia, 18 miles S. of Valencia. Pro. Principally rice and silk. Pop. 5,000.

ALGERIA, ăl-jeer'-e-a (Fr. L'ALGERIE, lal'-shai-re), is the name given by the French to a large portion of Northern Africa, which they have recently acquired by the connivance of the British. It is bounded on the N. by the Mediterranean Sea, on the E. by Tunis, on the S. by the Great Desert, and on the W. by Morocco. Ext. 600 miles, with a varying breadth of from 100 to 300. Desc. The interior of Algeria may be regarded as an extensive table-land running from east to west, and rapidly rising from the plains which skirt the Mediterranean coast, until it attains to an average height of 3,000 feet above the level of the sea, when it gradually slopes towards the south, and loses itself in the Great Desert. The breadth of this tract varies considerably, and is beautifully adorned with rounded, insulated hills, overlooking rich valleys and ravines, but never attaining to the elevation of the limit of perpetual snow. These hills are for the greater part covered with fruit-trees of every description, and of the very finest quality. Orange, lemon, fig, and vine trees abound; the palm is indigenous, and in the 'country of dates,' to the south of the Atlas mountains, that fruit is exceedingly plentiful. The timber-trees consist mostly of the elm, and a species of oak which produces a nutritious kind of acorn. The lotus, the cypress, and the chestnut are also abundant, whilst the plains are beautified by large plantations of white roses; whence is obtained the perfume known to us by the name of attar of roses. Rivers. The principal are the Shellif, rising on the borders of the Algerian Sahara, and after a course of 300 miles falling into the sea below Cape Ivy;—the Isser, the Zowah, the Wad-el-Kebeer, the Sciboos, the Sig, and the Tafna. These are on the N. of the Atlas. On the S. are the Wad-ad-jedee, which, after a course of 200 miles, loses itself in the marshes which border the Desert. Several other streams of no great size also fall into these marshes after tracing a meandering or tortuous course through the rugged defiles of the southern side of the Atlasian chain. Climate. Temperate and healthy to the north of the Atlas, but disagreeable during the blowing of the south wind, or Khamsin, as it is called. The rainy months are November and December. It is generally fine in January and February, and in April the fields are carpeted with the richest green. From July to September the country is scorched by the solar heat, the oleander alone preserving its verdant hue. Pro. Rice, wheat, millet, barley, dourra, Indian corn, cotton, and sugar. Minerals. So far as these are at present known, they consist of iron, copper, lead, silver, gypsum, marble, and limestone. Since the country was taken by the French, the copper-mines have been worked to a considerable extent. Wild Animals. In the mountain-ranges are lions, panthers, and leopards, but no tigers, and the interior swarms with antelopes, boars, and porcupines. Serpents and venomous insects also abound, and the locust occasionally lays waste the harvest of whole districts in a few days. Domestic Animals. Cows, goats, asses, mules, horses, and camels. The horses are an excellent breed, and of the milk of the camel a good cheese is made. The flesh of the foals of horses is eaten, and the countries of Morocco and Algeria are the original of the Merino sheep. Inhabitants. These comprise seven races,—the Arabs, Moors, Turks, Kooloolis, Jews, Berbers or Kabyles, and the Negroes of Soudan. The Arabs encamp on the plains, and are also known by the name of Bedouins. The Moors are a mixed race, who have grown out of the several nations who have successively conquered the country. Their numbers were much increased when they were forced from Spain. The Kooloolis are the offspring of Turks and Moorish women or Christian slaves. The Jews mostly came with the Moors from Spain or Portugal; the Kabyles are the aborigines, who were called so by the Moors, from the word 'Kabileah,' signifying a clan. Their chief stronghold is to the east of Algiers, in the highlands stretching for 200 miles along the Mediterranean, from Dellys to Bona, and designated Kabylia by the French. The Negroes were slaves who were kidnapped by the Bedouins, or brought from Soudan by the caravans. Rel. Of these races the religion is chiefly Mahometan. Gov. The dey of Algiers was an absolute monarch. The revenues arose from the tribute paid by the Moors and Arabs, a detachment of the army being sent into each province every year to collect it; and the prizes which were taken at sea sometimes equalled the taxes imposed upon the natives. Since its occupation by the French, up to the present time, however, the government has been administered under the direction of the French War-office, and consisted of a governor-general, assisted by a council. The country was divided into three provinces, each of which consisted of a civil and a military territory. The former constituted a department, subdivided into arrondissements and communes, governed by a prefect and council; the latter was administered exclusively by the military authorities. The names of the provinces were Alger, Oran, and Constantine, and the governor-general was the commander-in-chief of the military force of the colony. But Algeria is now no longer a colony. On the 24th of November, 1858, this fact was announced in a proclamation of M. Géry, the new prefect of Algiers, who, on assuming his office, had it posted on the walls of that city; the minister for Algeria under the new régime being Prince Napoleon, the cousin of the present emperor of the French. Towns. The principal are Algiers, Constantine, Bona, Medeyah, Blidah, Mushgammin, Arzew, Oran, Tlemsen, and Mascara. Manf. Defective. Carpets, blankets, and other woollens; silks in the form of sashes and handkerchiefs. A considerable trade is carried on in salt, ostrich feathers, hides, wax, cattle, and sheep; and there are imported European manufactures and colonial produce. With the French African settlements of Senegal a profitable trade is carried on across the interior by means of caravans. Pop. about 3,000,000, of which upwards of 100,000 are Europeans.—This country embraces the ancient Numidia, the kingdoms of Massinissa, Syphax, and Jugurtha; the Mauritanian kingdoms of Bocchus and Juba; and it has been successively conquered by the Romans, the Vandals, the Byzantine Greeks, and the Arabs, who, in the beginning of the 8th century, invaded North Africa, and established Islamism. (See ALGIERS.)

ALGHERO, or ALGHERI, al-gair-ro, a province, situate on the west coast of the island of Sardinia, remarkable for the beauty of its scenery and the exceedingly high state of its cultivation. Pro. Fruits, vegetables of all kinds, butter, cheese, and a good quality of wine. Tobacco is profitably cultivated, and the coral procured on its coast is the most valuable of any in the Mediterranean Sea. Exp. Corn, wine, tobacco, skins, wool, rags, bones, coral, and anchovies. Pop. 35,000.

ALGHERO, the capital of the above province, standing on a large bay formed by capes Caccia and Maragan. Its streets are narrow, but clean and well paved. Pop. 10,000. Lat. 40° 33′ 30″ N. Lon. 8° 19′ 15″ E.—This was a favourite retreat of Charles V. of Spain.

ALGIDUM, al-je-dum, a town of Latium, near Tusculum, about 12 miles from Rome. There is a mountain of the same name in the neighbourhood.

ALGIERS, al'-jeers, comes from the Arabic al Jezira, signifying 'the island,' and is the capital of the French province of Algeria. It is built on the declivity of a mountain, in the form of an amphitheatre, next the harbour; and the houses appearing one above another of a resplendent whiteness, seem as if rising in successive layers of snow, and present a dazzling picture from the sea. Their tops are flat, and the inhabitants walk upon them in the evening to take the air: they are also covered with earth, and serve as small gardens. The streets are narrow, and there are several mosques, which exhibit nothing remarkable in their architecture, whilst the palace of the dey, the Turkish for 'uncle,' was neither spacious nor extensive. The harbour was small, shallow, and insecure, and its entrance incommoded with numerous rocks; but the French have enlarged it so much that it is capable of containing 300 vessels of commerce and 30 ships of war. The mole of the harbour is 500 paces in length, extending from the continent to a small island, where there is a castle and a large battery of guns. These fortifications constitute the principal defence of Algiers on the sea side, and are very strong; but those on the land side are by no means formidable in this respect. On the outside of the walls there is a castle which commands the city, and which is called the Emperor's. The city is well supplied with markets, and is lately much improved, wider streets having been built, squares formed, and houses in the European style erected. The country about Algiers is adorned with gardens and fine villas, watered by fountains and rivulets; and thither the inhabitants resort in the hot seasons. Pop. about 60,000, of whom the half are Mussulmans and Jews. Lat. 36° 49′ N. Lon. 3° 25′ E.—Algiers was first built about the middle of the 10th century, by an Arabian chief called Jussuf Zeri, and for ages it braved the resentment of the most powerful states in Christendom. The emperor Charles V. lost a fine fleet and army in an expedition against it in 1541, and from that time the Algerines believed themselves unconquerable, and extended their piratical enterprises not only over the Mediterranean, but into the waters of the Atlantic. The English burnt their vessels in the harbour in 1635 and 1670. It was bombarded by the French in 1683. In 1775 the Spaniards made a descent near the city with a formidable army, but were defeated with great slaughter. In 1784 they sent a powerful fleet to attack the forts that defend the harbour; but they were repelled by the Algerines, although they made eight successive attacks with great bravery. In 1767 the Algerines took the lead of the other states of Barbary in refusing to pay any longer their usual tribute to the Porte, and continued to pursue their hereditary lawless mode of life, until finally subdued by those commercial nations whose shipping interests called for its suppression. In 1815 they received a severe check from the United States, who compelled the dey to renounce his accustomed tribute, and to pay 60,000 dollars as compensation for the American vessels he had plundered. On August 16, 1816, Lord Exmouth bombarded the forts and attacked their fleet, gaining a complete victory, which put an end, amongst them, to Christian slavery; and in June, 1830, in consequence of an insult to the French consul, a large fleet and army were dispatched by Charles X., when the Algerines fell under the power of that nation. The dey capitulated to General Bourmont, abdicated, and crossed to Europe, when the French entered the town and took possession of the fort and the treasury, which in stores and metals amounted to £2,000,000 sterling. From that time the invaders have gradually extended their conquest over the country, winning their way by fire and sword, and not without much bloodshed. Their bravest and most persevering foe was Abd-el-Kader, who, for fifteen years, disputed their settlement in the country, but who was at last taken prisoner, carried to France, and finally allowed to retire to Brussa, and thence to Constantinople. Since this event the French have held undisputed possession of the conquered territory. (See ALGERIA, ABD-EL-KADER.)

ALGOA BAY, or PORT ELIZABETH, ăl-go-a, an inlet about 20 miles broad and about 500 miles E. of Cape Town, South Africa. It is the place where the emigrants who went from this country in 1820 debarked. Both in population and importance, commercially speaking, the place is increasing. Lat. 33° 56′ S. Lon. 26° 53′ E.

ALGONQUINS, al-gon'-quins, the name of a North American tribe of Indians, the chief of whom are the Chippewas, and who inhabit a large tract of country which stretches from lakes Ontario and Erie to the shores of the Esquimaux.

ALGOOR, ăl'-goor, a place in Chinese Tartary, where the Russian count Mouravieff, in 1858, determined, with the representatives of the emperor of China, the frontier territory which divides the two empires, Russia and China, in this direction. (See AMOOR.)

ALHAMA, al-ya'-ma, the name of several small towns in Spain, none of which has a population over 7,000.

ALHAMBRA, al-ham'-bra, a town of Spain, in Aragon, 7 miles S. of Teruel.—There are several other small towns in Spain of this name, but none of them has a population above 1,000.

ALHAMBRA, the name assigned to the vestiges of a palace which was erected and occupied by the Mahometan sultans or kings of Grenada, in Spain. They crown the summit of a lofty hill which overlooks the city of Grenada, and which is cut off from another hill called the Cerro del Sol, on which stands the summer residence designated the Generalife. When in its perfect state, the interior of the Alhambra was deemed the most superb specimen of Moorish architecture and fanciful adornment that has ever existed, and the ruins may now be regarded as the most picturesque in Europe.

ALHANDRA, al-yan'-dra, a town in Estremadura, Portugal, on the Tagus, 15 miles from Lisbon. Pop. 2,000.—Another in Brazil, S. America, 15 miles from Paranahyba.

ALHAURIN EL GRANDE, ail grawnd-ai al-yaw'-reen, a town in the province of Grenada, Spain, 22 miles from Malaga. Pop. 5,600.

ALHUCEMAS, al-yoo-thai'-mass, a small island and fortress belonging to Spain, off the coast of Morocco, in the Mediterranean. There is a town upon it consisting of about thirty houses. Lat. 35° 15′ N. Lon. 4° 12′ E.

ALI, a'-le, an ancient town of Sicily, with sulphur-baths, 15 miles from Messina. Pop. 1,500.

ALI, the cousin and son-in-law of Mahomet, whom he was to have succeeded; but being successfully opposed by Omar and Othman, he raised a sect of his own, and gained many followers. On the death of Othman he was declared caliph in 655, but was assassinated in a mosque, A.D. 669.—He had nine wives, by whom he had fourteen sons and eighteen daughters.

ALIA, a'-le-a, a town in New Castile, Spain, 18 miles from Logrossan. Pop. 3,500.

ALI-ABAD, a'-le-a'-bad, a town of Persia, 85 miles from Kushan. It contains 500 houses. There is a residence built by Shah-Abbas in the neighbourhood.—There are several other towns and villages in Asia of this name.

ALIASKA, ă-li-ăs-ka, a peninsula on the N.W. coast of North America, separating, with the Aleutian Isles, the Pacific from the Sea of Kamchatka. Lat. between 59° and 54° 40′ N. Lon. between 153° and 163° 40′ W.—This peninsula contains the lofty volcanic cone of St. Elias.

ALI BEG, a'-le-beg, a Pole, who became first dragoman or interpreter to the grand seignior of Turkey. He was taken prisoner by the Tartars when a child, and sold to the Turks, and was brought up in the Mahometan faith. D. 1675.—He understood English, and translated the catechism of the church of England, and all the Bible, into the Turkish language. His greatest work is a book on the liturgy of the Turks, their pilgrimages to Mecca, &c., translated into Latin by Dr. Smith.

ALI BEY, a'-le-ba or bai, a Greek adventurer, who when young was taken by robbers and conveyed to Cairo, where he was bought by Ibrahim, a lieutenant of the janisaries, who entered him among the Mamelukes. For his gallantry against the Arabs he was created a bey. In 1758 his patron was murdered by a party headed by a person also called Ibrahim, a Circassian. In 1763 he attained the dignity of sheik-ecbalad, which was the first in the republic, and soon after slew Ibrahim, to revenge the murder of his patron. This raised against him numerous enemies, who obliged him to fly to Acre, where he was protected by the sheik Daher. In 1766 he was recalled by the people, and, after revenging himself upon his enemies, he declared war against the Arabs, and by the success of his achievements encircled his name with renown. Having now risen to be the head of the government, Egypt under his rule began to revive; agriculture flourished, and the country seemed to bid fair to recover its former splendour. In 1768 war broke out between Russia and Turkey, and Ali sent 12,000 men to serve in the Ottoman army. His enemies reported at Constantinople that these troops were designed to assist the Russians; in consequence of which a capigi, and four attendants, were sent to take off his head. Ali being informed of this, seized these messengers of death and handed them over to the fate they designed for himself. He then declared war against the Porte, and for a time preserved his independence, and obtained several advantages. At last his principal commanders revolted with their troops, and in a battle which took place between Ali and the forces of one of his chief Mamelukes, he was taken prisoner, and died of his wounds in 1773. B. in Anatolia, 1728.—The object of Ali was to endeavour to re-establish the independence of Egypt; to resuscitate some of the greatness of its long-gone grandeur; and had he been supported by a similar spirit of energy in his people, Egypt might once again have taken a prominent place amongst the nations of the modern world.

ALI MUSJID, a'-le moos'-jid, a fort 2 miles from the eastern entrance of the celebrated Khyber pass, which during the Afghan war frequently changed hands.

ALI, HYDER. (See HYDER ALI.)

ALI PACHA, a'-le pa-shaw', or pa'-sha, an Albanian chief, who in his fourteenth year was secured in the inheritance of his father's estates by the cruelty of his mother, from whom he seems to have inherited the ferocity by which he was actuated in many of his deeds in winning his way to wealth and power. Born amongst a community of robbers, his early life was passed amid scenes of continual vicissitude and the most daring and dangerous adventure; but whilst he was distinguishing himself by his bravery, he was, at the same time, accumulating riches and gathering power. At length he was enabled, by intriguing at Constantinople, to obtain the secret commission which enabled him to execute the firman of death against Selim, pasha of Delvino. He was then appointed lieutenant to the new Derwend pasha of Roumili, in which his conduct was marked by great rapacity, even among the Kleptis, or robbers, with whom he was leagued in spoliating all that came within his reach. The country now swarmed with marauders. His power grew with his increasing riches; but the Porte was dissatisfied, and the Derwend pasha was recalled and decapitated. Ali, although summoned to the capital, was too wary to be caught. He bribed the divan, remained where he was, and avoided the loss of his head. Ali soon afterwards managed to make his peace with the Porte, and successively became pasha of Trivali, in Thessaly, then Derwend pasha of Roumili, when he, from being a robber himself, raised a body of 4,000 Albanians, and gained additional favour with the Porte by clearing the country of the depredators by which it was infested. He next took Janunna, the capital of southern Albania, or Epirus, usurped its pashalic, got himself confirmed in it, and began vigorously to extend his territories. These finally embraced all Epirus, and extended into Acarnania and Ætolia, or Western Greece. He attacked and defeated the Suliotes, and exercised upon them the most dreadful vengeance for the bravery with which they had resisted his efforts to conquer them. He reduced many of the towns on the Gulf of Arta and the coast of the Adriatic; penetrated, on the north, Albania proper; intrigued for and obtained the pashalic of Berat; seized the government of Ochrida, in Upper Albania; attacked, by order of the Porte, the pasha of Scutari, or Skodra; defeated and then appropriated his territories. At all these daring acts the Porte was compelled to connive, and Ali was even appointed inspector of the principal division of the empire, with a residence at Monaster, and an army of 24,000 men. He subsequently became a vizier, or pasha with three tails, but by his intriguing and treacherous disposition he finally roused the ire of the sultan, who had him excommunicated, and commanded all the pashas of European Turkey to march against him. Ali was compelled to abandon his stronghold in Janunna, and on a promise of pardon surrendered himself to the Porte. The treachery by which so many of the deeds of his own life had been distinguished now fell upon himself. He was betrayed and murdered. His head was transported to Constantinople, where, upon the gate of the seraglio, it was stuck and exhibited to the gaze of the populace. B. at Tepelen, 1750; D. 1822.—Ali had three sons, who shared his fate; and whatever regret might be felt for them, there was none on his behalf. Lord Byron visited him in his fortress at Tepelen, and thus sings of him in his second canto of "Childe Harold:"—

"He pass'd bleak Pindus, Acherusia's lake,
And left the primal city of the land,
And onwards did his further journey take,
To greet Albania's chief, whose dread command
Is lawless law."

The lineaments of Ali, however, did not, in the noble poet's opinion, indicate the ensanguined ferocity which characterized his disposition. Notwithstanding that he was a man of "war and woes," and that crimes had "marked him with a tiger's tooth,"—

"Yet in his lineaments ye cannot trace,—
While gentleness her milder radiance throws
Along that aged, venerable face,—
The deeds that lurk beneath, and stain him with disgrace!"

ALICANTE, a-le-kan'-tai, a province of Spain, in the S. of Valencia. Ext. 63 miles long and 68 broad. Area, 2,911 square miles. Desc. Rugged and barren in the north, but level and fertile in the south. Pro. Wheat, maize, barley, rye, sugar, hemp, flax, oranges, grapes, and other fruits. Minerals. Lead, iron, copper, and coal. Exp. Chiefly fruits, wine, and agricultural produce. Imp. Cotton, linen, stuffs, timber, tobacco, and salt-fish. Pop. upwards of 339,000.

ALICANTE, or ALICANT (the Lucentum of the ancients), a maritime town of Spain, in Valencia, standing on a sort of peninsula, in a bay of the Mediterranean, and at the bottom of a rocky mountain, on the summit of which is a castle fortified in the modern style. The harbour is at some distance from the town, and is one of the best in Valencia. Exp. Barilla, passarillas, anise, dates, saffron, figs, capers, brandy, raisins, silk, wine, and soap. Imp. Principally salt-fish. Pop. about 19,000. Lat. 38° 35′ N. Lon. 0° 24′ W.—Alicante may be considered as the Cadiz of the eastern coast of Spain, and is the residence of consuls from most of the European and other states. It is the terminus of the Madrid and Alicante Railway, 282 miles long.

ALICATA, a-le-kat'-a, a fortified town on the south coast of Sicily, 30 miles from Girgenti. Pop. 15,000.—This place has a considerable trade in soda, sulphur, maccaroni, almonds, pistaccio nuts, and gram.

ALICE, al'-is, a town in a fertile district of the province of Victoria, Cape Colony, 40 miles from Graham's Town. Lat. 32° 48′ S. Lon. 26° 52′ E.

ALICUDI, a-le-koo'-de, one of the Lipari islands, off the coast of Sicily, about 6 miles in circumference, and rising like a cone from the sea. It has about 300 inhabitants, among whom diseases are unknown, and who cultivate a fine kind of wheat, barilla, capers, flax, and pulse.—It is the Ericusa and Ericodes of the Greeks; a name applied to it from the heath with which it is covered.

ALIENUS CÆCINA, ai-le-e'-nus se-si'-na, a quæstor in Bœotia, appointed by Galba to the command of a legion in Germany. The emperor disgraced him for his bad conduct, and he then raised commotions in the empire, about the middle of the 1st century.

ALIFÆ, ALIFA, or ALIPHA, al'-e-fe, or a-li'-fa, a town of Samnium, near the river Vulturnus, celebrated for its manufacture of pottery. It is now Alife.

ALIFE, a-le'-fai, a Neapolitan town, 16 miles from Capua, remarkable for its salubrity. Pop. 1,700.

ALIMENTUS, al'-i-men'-tus, an historian of the second Punic war, who wrote in Greek an account of Hannibal, besides a treatise on military matters.

ALIPEE, al'-e-pe, a populous town of Hindostan, in Cochin. Exp. Pepper, grain, and timber. Pop. 13,000. Lat. 9° 30′ N. Lon. 76° 24′ E.

ALIPHERIA, al-i-fer'-e-a, a town of Arcadia, situate on a lofty hill, about 8 miles S. of Heræa. The strength of its position made it valuable to the Eleans, who took possession of it when the inhabitants removed to Megalopolis, on the foundation of that city. It was, however, taken from them during the Social war, by Philip, king of Macedon.

ALIRROTHIUS, al-ir-ro'-the-us, a son of Neptune. Hearing that his father had been vanquished by Minerva, in their dispute about giving a name to Athens, he went to the citadel, and attempted to cut down the olive which had sprung from the ground and given the victory to Minerva; but he missed his aim in the stroke, and cut his own legs so severely that he instantly died.

ALISON, Archibald, al'-e-son, a clergyman, whose father was a magistrate of the city of Edinburgh, who educated him for the church. After receiving several preferments, he finally became the senior clergyman of the episcopal chapel in the Cowgate of Edinburgh, the congregation of which subsequently removed to a new Gothic structure which they erected in York Place, where Mr. Alison continued to officiate, until increasing infirmity compelled him to relinquish his public duties. B. in Edinburgh, 1757; D. 1839.—Mr. Alison is best known by his "Essays on Taste," which attained no great degree of popularity till the appearance of a second edition, when an elegant and able critique from the late Lord Jeffrey, in the "Edinburgh Review," brought them prominently into notice. They then enjoyed a brief popularity, but are now little read.

ALISON, Sir Archibald, Bart., son of the above, was born in Shropshire, while his father officiated as vicar of Kenley, in that county. In 1800 his father removed to Edinburgh, whither he brought his son, who received his education in the schools and university of that city, and in 1814 was called to the Scottish bar as an advocate. His literary predilections stimulated him to become a contributor to periodical publications; and although his first appearance in the world of letters was as a writer on the criminal law of Scotland, he achieved little notoriety until the appearance of his "History of Europe from the Commencement of the French Revolution in 1789 to the Restoration of the Bourbons in 1815," the first volume of which was published in 1839. This work has been continued until it has become one of the most voluminous productions of modern times; and although it has a strong party bias towards Conservative principles, still the comprehensive grasp which it shows, and the evident endeavour to preserve, as far as possible, views of impartiality, coupled with the fervour and animation which it displays in recounting many of the stirring scenes of the Revolution, have procured for it a high degree of popular favour. It has been translated into most of the European, and into some of the Eastern languages. In 1828, Mr. Alison was appointed sheriff of the shire of Lanark, and on the formation of the Derby ministry in 1852, was created a baronet. In 1851 he was elected lord-rector of the University of Glasgow, and has since had conferred upon him the honorary degree of D.C.L. by the Oxford University. B. 1792. —Besides his "History," Sir Archibald has written, in two volumes, a "Life of Marlborough," "Historical, Political, and Miscellaneous Essays," which originally appeared in "Blackwood's Magazine," and two volumes on the "Principles of Population."

ALIWAL, a'-le-wal, a village of Upper India, standing on the banks of the Sutlej, 20 miles from Loodiana. It was formerly a place of no note, but is now celebrated as being the scene of a battle, fought on January 28th, 1846, between the British, under Sir Harry Smith, and the Sikhs, commanded by Runjoor Sing. The British army consisted of 10,000 men and 32 guns; the Sikhs of 19,000 and 68 guns. They were defeated with a loss of nearly 6,000 men and the whole of their artillery.

ALJUBARROTA, al'-shoo-bar-o'-ta, a market-town of Portuguese Estremadura, 15 miles S. of Leiria. Pop. 1,600.—In the vicinity Alphonso I. defeated the Moors in 1139, and on the same field John I. of Portugal, surnamed the Great, gained a signal victory over John I., king of Castile, August 14, 1385, 12,000 Castilians being slain. The battle is known as that of Campo de Ourique, and is described by Camoens in the fourth canto of his "Lusiad." The anniversary of the day on which it was won is still celebrated by the Portuguese. (See ALPHONSO I.)

ALJUSTREL, al-shoos-trail, a small town of Portugal, in Alentejo, 77 miles from Lisbon. Pop. 1,700.

AL-KAISSERIA, al-kai-ser'-e-a, a town in the northern part of Morocco, not far from Al-kasar. It is rapidly falling into decay, although it still possesses some remains of having been a flourishing place. It trades principally in salt, obtained from the neighbouring hills. Pop. 8,000.

ALKMAAR. (See ALCKMAAR.)

ALKMAR, Henry von, fon alk-mar, a German poet, who translated the celebrated satire called the "Fable of Reynard," which has been popularized in several languages. Flourished in the 15th century.—The story of "Reynard the Fox" is entirely fictitious, although it has been endeavoured to be otherwise proved, and is founded upon the supposition of a court of animals in which the lion is the king, and which has been assembled for the purpose of putting "Reynard" upon his trial for the numerous tricks of rapacity and cruelty which he was in the constant habit of playing off upon others of the quadrupedal species less quick-witted than himself. Although he is sentenced to be hanged, he is released from punishment on account of his declaration that he knows of a great treasure, which he would discover to the king. This is found to be a falsehood, and he is condemned to punishment again; but he offers to fight in single combat with his principal antagonist the wolf, in which it is generally supposed he is certain to be killed. By a trick, however, he conquers the wolf; for which he is pardoned, and is finally received into the favour of the king. Notwithstanding the almost universal popularity of this effusion on the Continent, the moral which it conveys is of a low, if not of an absolutely bad kind; namely, that the successful practices of fraud and cunning constitute the basis of true wisdom.

AL-KOSH, or EL-KOSH, al-kosh, the supposed birthplace and burial-place of the prophet Nahum, is a small Asiatic market-town on the river Tigris, 30 miles from Mosul. Pop. about 3,000.

ALLAHABAD, al-la-ha-bad', one of the N.W. provinces of Hindostan, bounded N. by the provinces of Oude and Agra, S. by Gundwana, E. by Bahar, and W. by Malwa and Agra. Ext. 270 miles long and 120 broad. Area, 11,971 square miles. Divisions. This province is divided into six districts,—Cawnpore, Futtehpore, Humeerpore, Calpee, Allahabad, and Banda. Being watered by the Ganges, the Jumna, and the Goomtee, it is one of the most productive in India. Pro. Opium, sugar, indigo, cotton, grain, and fruit. Saltpetre and diamonds are found. Manf. The natives make a coarse kind of cotton cloth. Pop. 4,527,000. Lat. between 24° and 26° N. Lon. between 79° and 83° E.—This province was brought under the power of the East-India Company by three successive arrangements, which were severally made in 1775, 1803, and 1810. The East-Indian Railway runs through the district, which is also traversed by the great trunk road from Calcutta.

ALLAHABAD, a fertile district of the above province, producing large quantities of opium, cotton, and indigo. The principal grain sown is wheat, which is grown on an average at the rate of 56 bushels to the English acre.

ALLAHABAD, an ancient city, and capital of the above province, situate at the junction of the Ganges and Jumna, and considered by the Brahmins as the most sacred site of all the confluences of the rivers in Hindostan. It is 53 miles from Benares and 550 from Calcutta. At two miles' distance stands the celebrated fortress of Allahabad, founded by the emperor Akbar, in the year 1583, and indicating one of the most esteemed places of Hindoo worship and ablution, to which, every summer, multitudes of pilgrims resort from all parts of India. As many as 200,000 of them have been known to bathe themselves in the holy waters of this spot in the course of a single year. Lat. 25° 27′ N. Lon. 81° 56′ E.—This city came into the possession of the East-India Company in 1801, since which period it has been held as one of the most important places of India. It is the seat of a permanent judicial establishment, wherein periodical circuits are made to other parts of the province, and where are immense public buildings for conducting the administration of the district. In 1857 it became the scene of one of the several demoniac massacres which distinguished the revolt of the sepoy troops. Early in the morning of the 5th June, news came of the rising at Benares, and a telegraphic message was received from Sir Henry Lawrence, desiring that every European should be kept in the fort till all was secure. A few hours proved that on the outside of the fort the rebels were triumphant. The English officers of the 6th regiment were sitting quietly at mess, when the mutineers sounded an alarm, when the officers, thinking that it was some disturbance amongst the people, rushed on to the Parade, and were cut down whilst the band was playing the Queen's anthem. Nine youthful ensigns doing duty with the regiment were bayonetted in the mess-room, and eight other officers were shot. Merchants and others swelled the slaughter, till fifty Europeans had fallen by the hands of the sepoys. The treasury was looted, the prisoners in jail were released, and the work of general destruction commenced. House after house was plundered and fired. The whole station was reduced to ashes, and the murderers revelled in the scene of their wanton destruction. For ten days the English were blockaded in the fort, and dared not venture fifty yards from it, without being shot at. In it were 400 Sikhs of doubtful loyalty, and 80 invalid English artillerymen, with 100 English ladies, and a large number of children. At one time during this period it was expected that the Sikhs would rise against them, on account of their having obtained spirituous liquors and become drunk and riotous. For three successive nights the ladies, silent, timid, and sleepless, crouched in the fort, expecting death, but guarded by the Europeans, each with a revolver in his hand, ready to meet the attack of the Sikhs, and to mete out to them, as far as was in their power, the reward of their treachery. But happily the Sikhs remained true, and recovered their senses. Colonel Neil, with a detachment of the Madras Fusiliers then arrived from Benares, attacked successfully the insurgents, and in a few days had the whole of Allahabad in his possession. (For the origin of the mutiny, and other incidents connected with it, see AGRA, BENARES, CAWNPORE, DELHI, &c.)

ALLAH-SHEHR, or ALA-SHEHR, al'-a-sher, the 'city of God,' a town of Asiatic Turkey, in Natolia, standing on three or four hills, and exhibiting the remains of a wall. It is of considerable extent, but the houses are in general mean and dirty. It is situate on one of the principal roads to Smyrna, whither a caravan goes and returns regularly, and is greatly frequented by Armenian merchants. The coffee houses and baths are much resorted to. Pop. 15,000. This city is the ancient Philadelphia, and was built by Attalus Philadelphus, king of Pergamus. It stands about 80 miles to the E. of Smyrna.

ALLAN, al'-lan, a river of Scotland, noted for the beauty of the scenery through which it flows for 18 miles, when it falls into the Frith of Forth, 2 miles from Stirling.

ALLAN, BRIDGE OF, a village of Scotland, situate on the above river, in Perthshire. It has become celebrated for a mineral spring in its neighbourhood, to which many resort.—A station on the Scottish Central Railway.

ALLAN'S CREEK, a river of the United States, which enters the Genesee.

ALLAN, al'-long, a parish and village in France, in the department of Drôme, celebrated for the excellence of its wine. Pop. 1,000.—Mulberry-trees were here first planted in France.

ALLAN, David, the son of a Scottish shoremaster in Alloa, has been called the "Scottish Hogarth," although far inferior to the distinguished Englishman in the paths of humorous and eccentric delineations of human characteristics. His genius was first remarked by his rude chalk drawings upon the floor, whilst confined to the house from a burnt foot. The immediate cause, however, of his being put to study for a painter, arose from a caricature which he made of his schoolmaster inflicting punishment upon a boy. Whilst the ludicrous turn given to this sketch brought upon him his expulsion from school, it secured the countenance of a Mr. Stuart, the collector of the customs at Alloa, who had him sent to the academy of Messrs. Andrew and Robert Foulis, at Glasgow, to be educated for a painter. After spending nine years at this academy, he was patronized by Lord Cathcart, who introduced him to Erskine of Mar, who generously sent him to Rome to prosecute his studies. Here a painting of the Corinthian Maid who executed a profile of her lover's countenance round the shadow thrown by a lamp upon the wall, procured him a golden medal in the academy of St. Luke, and a proportionate amount of reputation. He subsequently painted those humorous subjects by which he obtained considerable fame, and which, although deficient in sensibility, are yet replete with broad rustic fun. B. at Alloa, 1744; D. at Edinburgh, 1796.—The most popular designs of Allan are his twelve illustrations of Ramsay's far-famed Scottish pastoral, "The Gentle Shepherd."

ALLAN, Sir William, a distinguished Scottish artist, who, after passing through the High School of Edinburgh, was put to be a coach-painter, but who discovered so great a desire to improve in his art, that he was entered as a pupil in the Trustees' Academy, where he had Wilkie for a fellow-student and companion. After a certain period he became a student of the Royal Academy of London, but failing in attracting the notice to which he thought himself entitled, he set out for St. Petersburg, where he passed ten years, with the exception of the time necessary at various periods to visit Tartary, Turkey, the shores of the Black Sea, &c., where he enriched his portfolio with numerous objects and scenes of curious interest. On his return to Scotland in 1814, he publicly exhibited the fruits of his travels and labours; and for a large picture of "Circassian Captives," he received 1,000 guineas, which was subscribed for by a hundred gentlemen, at ten guineas each, and at the suggestion of Sir Walter Scott. This picture is now in the possession of the earl of Wemyss. Soon after this period he turned his attention to the production of native historical subjects, and the "Murder of Archbishop Sharpe," "Knox admonishing Mary, Queen of Scots," the "Parting of Prince Charles Stuart and Flora McDonald," and the "Murder of the Regent Murray," were the result. A disease having affected his eyes, he suspended his studies, and visited Asia Minor, Greece, and Italy. On returning, he produced his "Slave-market at Constantinople," which tended to enhance his reputation. Subsequently he produced the companion pictures of "Scott in his Study, Writing," and "Scott in his Study, Reading," both of which are well known from the nature with which he has succeeded in investing them. His most important pictures, however, are the "Battle of Waterloo," which Wellington approved and bought, the "Battle of Preston Pans," "Nelson boarding the San Nicolas," and the "Battle of Bannockburn," a large picture, upon which he was working when overtaken by death. B. in Edinburgh, 1782; D. 1850.—In 1825 Allan became an associate of the Royal Academy, and in 1838 was elected President of the Scottish Academy. On the death of Wilkie, he received the appointment of her Majesty's limner for Scotland, and in 1842 was knighted. He is considered by his countrymen to stand at the head of Scottish art.

ALLATIUS, Leo, al-av'-she-us, a Greek, educated first in Calabria, and then at Rome, where he taught the belles-lettres. He was appointed keeper of the Vatican library by Alexander VII. His learning was extensive, and he founded a college in the island of Chios. B. in Chios, 1586; D. at Rome, 1669.

ALLEDIUS SEVERUS, al-e'-de-us se-ve'-rus, a Roman knight, who married his brother's daughter to please Agrippina.—A noted glutton in Domitian's reign.

ALLEGAN, al-e-gan, a county of the United States, bordering Lake Michigan. Area, 832 square miles. Pop. 6,000.

ALLEGHANY, al-e-gai'-ne, or al'-e-gen'-e, a county of the United States, in New York, on Genesee river, bordering on Pennsylvania. Area, 1,185 square miles. Desc. Fertile, but more suitable for pasturing cattle than for agricultural purposes. Pop. 40,000. Principal town, Angelica.—2. Of Pennsylvania, at the junction of the Alleghany and Monongahela rivers. Pop. 140,000. Principal town, Pittsburg.—3. In Maryland, the north-west end of the state, on Potomac river. Desc. Uneven and rugged, though interspersed with much fertile land. Pop. 25,000, of whom there are from 1,000 to 2,000 slaves. Principal town, Cumberland.—The name of several townships in Pennsylvania.

ALLEGHANY, or APPALACHIAN MOUNTAINS, in the United States, commencing in the northern part of Georgia, and running north-east nearly parallel with the coast of the Atlantic Ocean. They pass through North Carolina, Virginia, Maryland, Pennsylvania, and New York, and terminate at the St. Lawrence, and are crossed by several great roads, which connect the cities of the east with those of the western states. They divide the waters which flow into the Atlantic from those which flow into the Mississippi, and consist of several ranges called the Blue Ridge, North Jackson's, Laurel, and Cumberland, rarely attaining an elevation beyond 2,500, feet, although Mount Washington, in New Hampshire, rises to 6,620 feet above the level of the sea. Geology. The geological formation of the Alleghanies consists of granite, gneiss, mica, clay-slate, and primary limestone. They inclose many rich and beautiful valleys, and are, in general, wooded to their summits. (See NORTH AMERICA.)

ALLEGHANY, a river in the United States, which rises in Pennsylvania, and at Pittsburg unites with the Monongahela, to form the Ohio. Is is navigable to Hamilton, 260 miles above Pittsburg.

ALLEGRAIN, Christopher Gabriel, al'-e-grăng, an eminent French sculptor. His principal works are the figure of a young man, for which he was admitted into the academy; also a Venus and a Diana. D. 1795.

ALLEGRANZA, al'-al-gran'-tha, the most northern of the Canary islands, inhabited, and possessing extensive woods. Lat. 29° 26′ N. Lon. 13° 31′ W.

ALLEGRE, al'-aigre, a town and parish of France, at the base of a volcanic mountain. It is in the department of Haute Loire, 12 miles from Le Puy. Pop. upwards of 2,000.

ALLEGRI. (See CORREGGIO.)

ALLEGRI, Gregorio, al'-ai-gre, a celebrated musician, whose compositions are still retained in the pontifical chapel. The chief is the "Miserere," which is always sung on Good Friday. D. 1672. Clement XIV. sent a magnificent copy of the "Miserere" to King George III. in 1773.

ALLEHGUNJ, al'-le-goonj, a town of British India, on the left bank of the Ramgunga river, 11 miles from Furruckabad. Pop. 6,000. Lat. 27° 33' N. Lon. 79° 45' E.

ALLEIN, Joseph, äl'-ain, a nonconformist minister, who, in 1655, became curate of Taunton. In 1662 he was ejected for nonconformity, but continued to preach privately, for which he was imprisoned. B. at Devizes, 1633; D. at Bath, 1668. His book entitled "An Alarm to unconverted Sinners" has gone through numerous editions, and is still popular among certain classes.

ALLEN, äl'-en, a river of England, which rises in Dorsetshire, and runs into the Stour.

ALLEN, a river of Wales, rising in Denbighshire, flowing through Flintshire, and ultimately falling into the Dee, a few miles below Holt.

ALLEN, BOG OF, a collective term applied to the bogs east of the Shannon, in King's county and Kildare, Ireland. Area, 258,500 acres. Its average depth of moss is 25 feet, and the rivers Boyne, Barrow, and Brosna have their sources in it. It is traversed by the Grand Canal.

ALLEN, ISLE OF, a village of Ireland, county of Kildare, 5 miles N.E. of Kildare.

ALLEN, LOUGH, lok al'-en, a lake of Ireland, in the province of Connaught, 9 miles from Carrick. It is viewed as the source of the Shannon.

ALLEN, three counties of the United States. 1. In Ohio. Area, 554 square miles. Pop. 12,000. Capital, Luna. 2. In Indiana. Area, 650 square miles. Pop 17,000. Capital, Fort Wayne. 3. In Kentucky. Pop. 2,000 whites and about 1,500 slaves. Capital, Scottsville.

ALLEN, Sir Thomas, an English admiral of high repute in the reign of Charles II., who was the first to enter upon hostilities against the Dutch in 1665, by attacking their Smyrna fleet. His squadron consisted only of eight ships, but he killed their commodore, Brackel, took four rich merchantmen, and drove the rest into the Bay of Cadiz. Several other successes were achieved by him, and in 1666 he defeated the van of the Dutch fleet, three of their admirals falling in the fight.

ALLEN, John, a metaphysical, historical, and physiological writer, and an extensive contributor to the "Edinburgh Review." B. at Redford, near Edinburgh, 1770; D. 1843.—Lord Brougham has sketched the character of Allen in the third series of his "Historical Sketches of the Statesmen of the Time of George III."

ALLEN, Joseph W., an English painter, who enjoyed considerable reputation for his landscape pieces. B. at Lambeth, Surrey, 1803; D. 1852.—He was for some time the principal scene-painter at the Olympic theatre, and his forte lay in pastoral scenery.

ALLEN, William, an eminent chemical and experimental professor, who lectured at Guy's Hospital. In his chemical investigations he demonstrated that the diamond was of pure carbon, and in conjunction with Mr. Pepys proved the proportion of carbon in carbonic acid. B. in London, 1770; D. at Lindfield, Sussex, 1843. —Mr. Allen was one of the principal actors in establishing the Pharmaceutical Society.

ALLEN, Ethan, an American brigadier-general, who distinguished himself by his activity and bravery in the war of independence against Great Britain. D. 1789. —He was somewhat of an eccentric writer also.

ALLEN. Besides those already mentioned, there are several American statesmen, divines, and warriors bearing the name, but none of them of any great celebrity.

ALLEN, ST., a parish of Cornwall, 4 miles from Truro. Area, 3,610 acres. Pop. 800.—Also a river in Cornwall

ALLENDALE, äl'-en-dail, a market-town and parish of Northumberland. Area, 45,810 acres. Pop. town and parish, about 7,000.—The inhabitants employ themselves chiefly in agricultural pursuits, and in some lead-mines and smelting-houses in the parish.

ALLENDORF, al'-en-dorf, a town of Germany, in the electorate of Hessen-Cassel, on the Werra. Pop. 4,000. —Also of Hessen-Darmstadt, between Marburg and Giessen. Pop. 1,130.—It is the name of several other small towns in Germany.

ALLENSMORE, al'-ens-mor, a parish in Herefordshire. Area, 1,930 acres. Pop. 800.

ALLENSTEIN, al-en-stine, a town in East Prussia. Pop. about 1,000, chiefly engaged in the manufacture of thread, linen, and glass; 65 miles from Konigsberg.

ALLENSTOWN, a town of the United States, in Rockingham county, New Hampshire, 10 miles S.E. of Concord. Pop. 1,000.—It is the name of several other townships and villages.

ALLER, al'-er, a river of Germany, rising in the district of Magdeburg, and falling into the Weser, after passing the towns of Gifhorn, Cell, and Verden.

ALLER, al'-er, a parish in Somerset, where, in 1631, a battle was fought between the Royalist and Parliamentarian forces. Area, 4,290 acres. Pop. about 600.—Here, also, Alfred defeated the Danes, and was sponsor to their chief, Guthrum, who was baptized after the battle.

ALLERSTON, äl'-ers-ton, a parish in the North Riding, Yorkshire. Area, 1,110 acres. Pop. 500.

ALLERTHORPE, äl'-er-thorp, a township in the West Riding of Yorkshire, 1 mile from Wakefield. Pop. with Thornes, upwards of 6,000.

ALLERTON, äl'-er-ton, two townships, one in the county of York, with a population over 2,000, and another in the county of Lancaster, with a population of 500.

ALLESTRY, or ALLESTREE, Richard, äl'-es-tre, a divine, who, in 1641, took up arms, with many other young men of the university of Oxford, in favour of Charles I. After serving some time in a military capacity, he returned to his studies, but afterwards again entered the army, and was at the battle of Kentonfield. At the end of the civil war he took orders, and in 1659 visited Charles II. in Flanders, and on his return was seized at Dover, but found means to secure his dispatches. At the Restoration he was made canon of Christchurch, and served one of the lectureships of Oxford, the salary of which he gave to the poor. In 1660 he took the degree of D.D., became chaplain to the king, and regius professor of divinity. In 1665 he was appointed provost of Eton. B. at Uppington, Shropshire, 1619; D. at Eton, 1673. He was buried in the chapel of Eton College, where there is a monument to his memory.

ALLEYN, Edward, äl-ain, founder of Dulwich College, in Surrey, who acquired great reputation as an actor, and became proprietor of a playhouse in Moorfields, and keeper of the royal bear-garden. Aubrey relates a ridiculous story of the devil appearing to him when personating the character of Satan, and so frightening him, that he grew serious and quitted the stage. He laid the foundation of his college in 1614, and completed it in 1617, at the expense of £10,000; he then endowed it with £800 per annum for the maintenance of one master and one warden (who must be unmarried, and always of the name of Alleyn or Allen), and four fellows, of whom three must be clergymen, and the fourth an organist; besides six poor men and six women, with twelve boys, who are to be educated till the age of fourteen or sixteen, when they are to be apprenticed to some trade. This building is called "The College of God's Gift." He was himself the first master. B. in London, 1566; D. 1626, and was buried in the chapel of the college which he founded. The question of the administration of the funds of this college has attracted much attention from actors and the public.

ALLIA, äl'-e-a, a river of Italy, rising in the hills of Crustuminum, and flowing into the Tiber a little above Rome. On its banks the Romans were defeated by the Gauls under Brennus, 387 B.C.

ALLIER, al'-e-ai, a river rising in the mountains of Lozère, traversing the centre of France, and, after a course of 220 miles, falling into the Loire, a few miles below Nevers.

ALLIER, a department of France, divided into four arrondissements, named Moulins, Gannat, La Palisse, and Montluçon. It is bounded on the N. by the departments Cher and Nièvre, on the S. by the department Puy-de-Dôme, on the W. by Cher and Creuse, and on the E. by Loire and Saône-et-Loire. Lat. from N. to S. 55 miles, and from E. to W. 82. Area, 2,821 square miles. Desc. For the greater part a level, although traversed by two chains of hills, the one an offshoot from the Cevennes mountains, and the other springing from those of the lower Auvergne. These ranges are both composed of granite. Rivers The Loire, Bèbre, Acolin, Dore, Sioule, and the Allier, which gives its name to the department, and which, after a course of 220 miles, falls into the Loire, a few miles from the town of Nevers. Climate. Healthy in general, except in the vicinity of stagnant waters. Pro. Flax, hemp, oats, rye, and fruit, all of which are exported; cattle and sheep are depastured; the mulberry is cultivated as the food of the silk-worm; and a seventh of the surface is covered with forests of oak, birch, beech, fir, and maple. The country abounds with game, and is infested with foxes, wolves, and badgers. Minerals. Iron, antimony, coal, granite, marble, gypsum, limestone, and potter's clay. The Commentry coal-mines are the most important. Towns. The principal are Moulins, Gannat, La Palisse, and Montluçon. Manf. Iron machinery and tools of every description, cutlery, paper, porcelain, earthenware, glass, linen, leather, and broadcloths, beetroot-sugar, nut-oil, and chemical products. Pop. about 400,000. Lat. between 45° 58′ and 46° 47′ N. Lon. between 2° 16′ and 3° 57′ E.

ALLINGHAM, John Lill, ăl'-ing-ham, a successful dramatist, the son of a wine-merchant, and brought up in the profession of the law. He subsequently became a stockbroker; but very little is known of his history. Flourished at the beginning of the 19th century.—Allingham's best-known productions are "Fortune's Frolic" and "The Weathercock," in which there is more bustle than poetry, and sprightliness of dialogue than either wit or humour.

ALLINGTON, ăl'-ing-ton, the name of a number of English parishes, of generally circumscribed areas and populations.

ALLOA, ăl'-o-a, a seaport town, in the parish of the same name, and the shire of Clackmannan, Scotland. It is situate on the north bank of the Forth, where that river is about 500 yards wide. The town is irregularly built; but it has an excellent harbour, and adjoining it a dry dock, capable of receiving the largest vessels. To the west of the dock there is a ferry across the river Forth, with good piers projecting down to low water-mark. There are extensive collieries and distilleries in the neighbourhood; glass-houses, where ordinary green glass bottles are made; iron-works and woollen and shawl manufactories. The malt liquors brewed here are in much repute, "Alloa ale" being celebrated all over the world. Pop. In 1851 it was 6,676; but it has since increased. Lat. 56° 7′ N. Lon. 3° 41′ W.—Above Alloa there is a dam of water called Gartmorn, which is perhaps the largest collection of artificial water in Scotland. In the vicinity is an ancient tower, supposed to have been built in the 13th century, and to have belonged to the former earls of Mar, where some of the Scottish princes were educated. This town is supposed to be on the site of the Alauna of Ptolemy.

ALLOBROGES, ăl-ob'-ro-jes, a warlike nation of Gaul, who dwelt near the Rhone, in that part of Europe now called Savoy, Dauphiny, and Piedmont. The Romans destroyed their city on account of their assistance to Hannibal. Their ambassadors were allured by great promises to join in Catiline's conspiracy against his country; but they scorned the offers, and disclosed the plot.

ALLORI, Alexander, al'-or-e, a painter of Florence, who was instructed by his uncle Bronzino, and had for his pupil the celebrated Avoli. D. 1607.—This painter mostly introduced portraits of his friends into his historical works.

ALLORI, Cristofano, son of the above, a better painter, and most skilful copyist. Some of his copies of the "Magdalen" of Correggio are supposed to be duplicates of the original by Correggio himself. B. at Florence, 1577; D. 1621.

ALLOWAY CREEK, ăl'-o-wai kreek, a tributary of the Delaware, in the United States, in New Jersey.

ALLOWAY, a parish of Ayrshire, Scotland, in which stand the ruins of the "auld haunted kirk," immortalized in the "Tam O'Shanter" of Robert Burns.

ALLSTON, Washington, awl'-ston, an eminent American landscape and historical painter, who in 1801 visited England, and entered the Royal Academy of London, where he studied for three years during the presidency of West. He then visited Paris and Rome, where he remained for four years, studying the styles of the best masters. In the "eternal city" he attracted considerable notice by a picture which he executed, and called "Jacob's Vision." In 1809 he returned to America, and married the sister of the celebrated Dr. Channing. In 1811 he revisited England, and gained the two hundred guinea prize from the British Institution for his picture of the "Dead Man raised by Elisha's Bones." On returning to his native country he continued to devote himself to his art; but being of a weakly constitution, he lived much in retirement. B. in South Carolina, 1779; D. at Cambridgeport, Massachusetts, 1843.

ALLUTIUS, ăl-u'-she-us, a prince of the Celtiberi, to whom Scipio restored a beautiful princess he had taken in battle.

ALLYGURH, ăl'-e-goor, a district of Central India, situate between the Ganges and the Jumna, in the province of Meerut. Area, 2,153 square miles. Desc. In the southern part fertile and highly cultivated; but in the northern little is to be seen but low dark jungle. Pop 1,131,565. Lat between 27° 27′ and 28° 11′ N. Lon. between 77° 32′ and 78° 47′ E.

ALLYGURH, capital of the above district, and 50 miles from Agra. In 1803 it was taken by the forces under Lord Lake, and was, up to the mutiny of 1857, one of the head-quarters of the East-India Company's civil and judicial governments. The town proper, however, is Coel, distant about 2 miles from Allygurh, with which it is connected by an avenue of trees. Here the civil authorities chiefly reside.—In the recent mutiny, the 9th regiment revolted at Allygurh, in the month of May, 1857, and set off to join the mutineers at Delhi, but without perpetrating any of those atrocities by which similar conduct in the rebels was characterized at so many other places. Lat. 27° 56′ N. Lon. 78° 8′ E.

ALMA, ăl'-ma, a small river in the Crimea, rendered memorable by the defeat of the Russians, commanded by Prince Menschikoff, by the allied French and English army, under Marshal St. Arnaud and Lord Raglan, on the 20th September, 1854. This brilliant battle lasted only three hours and a half, when the Russians made a precipitate retreat upon Sebastopol, the great stronghold of the Crimea. (See CRIMEA.)

ALMA-TOMAK, ăl'-ma to'-mak, a village on the river Alma, on which the Russian centre rested in the above battle.

ALMADA, al-ma-da, a town of Portuguese Estremadura, near which the gold-mine of Adissa is worked. It stands on the banks of the Tagus, opposite Lisbon. Pop. about 5,000.—Near this place is the fort of San Sebastian, which guards the mouth of the Tagus.

ALMADEN, ăl'-ma-dain, a town of New Castile, Spain, 55 miles from Ciudad Real, with an excellent practical school of mines. It has very productive mines of quicksilver. Pop. about 9,000.

ALMAGELL, Pass of, al'-ma-gel, the highest mountain-pass in Europe, being 11,653 feet above the level of the sea. It is between the valleys Visp and Zermath, in Valais, Switzerland.

ALMAGRO, Diego d', de-ai-go dal-ma'-gro, a Spanish commander, of mean descent, who, in 1525, accompanied Pizarro in his expedition against Peru. He is accused of having had a share in the murder of Atahualpa, the inca. In 1535 he took Cuzco, the capital of Chili, and reserved the plunder for himself. This gave great offence to the brothers of Pizarro, who were with him, and whom he cast into prison, when a civil war ensued. For some time Almagro's party had great success; but, at length, he was taken prisoner. After undergoing a long confinement, he was murdered by strangulation in 1538.—His son Diego endeavoured to revenge his father's death, but failed in the attempt, and was beheaded by De Castro in 1542.

ALMAGRO, al-ma'-gro, the capital town of a judicial district of the same name, in New Castile, Spain, and 12 miles from Ciudad Real. Manf. Chiefly lace, in which a large number of hands are employed. Pop. 13,000.

ALMAGUERAL, al'-ma-gair'-al, a town in the province of New Grenada, S. America, 40 miles from Popayan. It is built on a table-land 7,440 feet above the level of the sea.

ALMALI, al-ma'-le, a town of Asiatic Turkey, 52 miles from Makri, and beautifully situate in an amphitheatre of the Massanghus mountains. The peaks of these shoot away far up into the blue ether, the highest of them attaining an elevation of 10,000 feet. The houses are built of unburnt bricks, and roofed with cedar-wood. The town contains several mosques, a bazaar, and a market, and altogether consists of about 1,500 or 1,600 houses. Pop. about 20,000. Lat. 36° 47′ N. Lon. 29° 50′ E.

ALMAMON, al'-mai-mon, caliph of Bagdad, was the son of Haroun al Raschid, and succeeded to the throne in 813. D. 833.—He was a great encourager of learned men, founded an academy at Bagdad, calculated a set of astronomical tables, and caused the works of the most celebrated ancient authors to be translated into Arabic.

ALMANSOR, al-man'-sor, king of Cordova, in Spain, ascended the throne after Alhaca, who died in 976. He was engaged in perpetual wars with the Christians, and gained many great battles. D. 1002.

ALMANZA, or ALMANCA, al-man'-tha, a town of Spain, in Murcia, 37 miles from Albacete. It is a busy place, and has a considerable trade. Manf. Cotton, linen, and hempen fabrics, leather, and soap, which it sends to the neighbouring provinces. Pop. 9,000.—Here, in 1707, the English duke of Berwick, with 30,000 French under his command, defeated a much inferior force of British and Spanish troops, led by Henri du Ruvigny, earl of Galway.

ALMANZOR, al-man'-zor, the Victorious, was the second caliph of the race of the Abasides (see ABASIDES), and ascended the throne in 753. He was opposed by his uncle, Abdallah-ebn-Ali, who was defeated by Almanzor's general, Abu Moslem. Fearing this general's abilities and popularity, he caused him to be assassinated. Several insurrections took place in his reign, which were all suppressed. D. on a pilgrimage to Mecca, in the 63rd year of his age.

ALMARAZ, al-ma-rath, a town of Spanish Estremadura, 36 miles from Talavera de la Reyna. Pop. 700. —Here General Hill, in 1812, surprised the French, taking 250 prisoners, including 17 officers, and completely destroying the fortified works of the enemy.

ALMEIDA, al'-mai-e'-da, one of the strongest fortresses in Portugal, in the province of Beira, 113 miles N.E. of Lisbon. Pop. 1,200. Lat. 40° 43′ N. Lon. 6° 52′ W. —In 1808, after the convention of Cintra, this place was surrendered by the French, and for some time afterwards it remained in possession of the British. On the night of August 27, 1810, however, it was again taken by the French, under Massena; but in May, 1811, was retaken by the British and restored to Portugal.

ALMEIDA, Francis, a Portuguese gentleman, who in 1505 was appointed by King Emanuel the first viceroy of the Portuguese possessions in India. He took the city of Quiloa, and made many other important conquests. A fleet loaded with spices, and dispatched by him from the coast of Malabar, was the first to discover the island of Madagascar. While he was engaged in extending the conquests of the Portuguese, Albuquerque received orders from Portugal to supersede him; but Almeida, being about to proceed to Dabul with a fleet, refused to resign his command, and imprisoned the new viceroy. In his expedition against Dabul he sullied his reputation by his cruelty, and afterwards fell in with the fleet of the enemy, defeated it, and effected a peace. On his passage to Europe he was slain at the Cape of Good Hope, in a skirmish with the natives, 1509.

ALMELO, al'-me-lo, a town of Holland, in the province of Overyssel, 20 miles from Deventer. It is a busy town, with an industrious population, employed principally in the preparation of cotton and yarn goods. Pop. 3,000.

ALMENDRALEJO, al'-main-dra-laish'-o, a town of Spanish Estremadura, 28 miles from Badajos. Pop. 6,000, chiefly agricultural, although some weaving and distilling is carried on. In the neighbourhood a considerable number of horses, mules, goats, and sheep are raised.

ALMERIA, al-mai'-re-a, a rich maritime province in Andalusia, Spain, forming what was once a portion of the kingdom of Grenada. Area, 3,906 square miles. Desc. Mountainous in general, but presenting many beautiful valleys, teeming with fruitage and agricultural produce. Pro. Maize, sugar, grapes, and all the southern fruits in great abundance. It also depastures large herds of cattle. Minerals. Iron, copper, silver, lead, and antimony; salt, nitre, marble, and jasper. Pop. about 300,000.

ALMERIA, the capital of the above province, stands on the gulf, and at the mouth of a river, of the same name. It is mostly surrounded with walls, and is defended on the side next the sea by two forts, but its streets are narrow and ill-built. Exp. Principally barilla, lead, and esparto. Imp. Cotton and silk fabrics. Pop. about 18,000.

ALMERIA, Gulf of, between Point Elena on the W. and Cape Gata on the E. It runs 10 miles inland, and is 25 miles wide at its entrance. Lat. 36° 50′ N. Lon. 2° 32′ W.

ALMERIA, a town of Mexico, in the province of Vera Cruz. Lat. 20° 18′ N. Lon. 97° 30′ W.

ALMO, al'-mo, a small river near Rome, falling into the Tiber, in which the statue of Cybele was annually washed on the 25th of March. It is now called Acqua Santa.

ALMODOVAR DEL CAMPO, al-mo-do'-var dail kam'-po, a beautiful town, with a castle, in Spain, province of La Mancha, 18 miles from Ciudad Real. The male inhabitants are principally employed in agricultural pursuits, and the female in the manufacture of stuffs, blonde, and other wearing apparel. Pop. nearly 6,000.

ALMOGIA, al-mosh'-e-a, a town in Grenada, Spain. Pop. 5,500.

ALMOHADES, al-mo'-ha-dees, the name of a Mussulman dynasty which, in A.D. 1147, arose with Abdolmumem, in Africa and Spain. It comes from the word mouahedun, signifying Mutarians. (See ABDOLMUMEM.)

ALMON, John, all'-mon, a political writer, who was educated at Warrington, and served his apprenticeship to a bookseller, but became a traveller in foreign countries, and finally settled in London, where he pursued literature as a profession. On the death of George II. he wrote a review of his majesty's reign, which passed through two editions, and in 1761 published a review of Mr. Pitt's administration, which was also well received, and procured for him the friendship of Lord Temple. He was also the zealous friend of Mr. Wilkes, whom he defended against Kidgell, and in 1765 began business as a bookseller in Piccadilly. He still, however, continued to exercise his pen in politics. Not long afterwards he was tried, and found guilty, for publishing Junius's letter to the king; for which he was fined, and obliged to give security for his good behaviour for three years. In 1774 he began the "Parliamentary Register," which was the first periodical journal of the kind. On the death of Lord Chatham, he published anecdotes of the life of that great statesman, and after a considerable interval, published biographical, literary, and political anecdotes of several of the most eminent persons of the age. In 1804 he gave to the world the genuine correspondence of Mr. Wilkes, which was succeeded by a collection of the poetical works of the author of the "Heroic Epistle to Sir William Chambers," and afterwards by a valuable edition of "Junius's Letters," illustrated by numerous biographical and explanatory notes, and preceded by a critical inquiry respecting their real author. B. at Liverpool, 1738; D. 1805.

ALMON, the eldest of the sons of Tyrrhius. He was the first Rutulian whom the Trojans killed; and from the combats before and after his death, arose the feuds which terminated in the fall of Turnus.

ALMOND, or ALMON, two rivers of Scotland, one of which enters the Frith of Forth at Cramond, 5 miles N.W. of Edinburgh; the other, rising in the Grampian hills, enters the Frith of Tay. Neither is of great extent.

ALMONDBURY, or ALMONBURY, al'-mon-ber-e, a town and parish of England, in the West Riding of Yorkshire, situate on the river Calder, near Huddersfield. Area of parish, 30,140 acres. Manf. Chiefly cloths for waistcoatings, shawls, fancy goods, and broad and narrow woollen fabrics. Pop. between 40,000 and 50,000.—This place is supposed to be the Cambodunum of the Romans, and to have been the residence of some of the Saxon kings.

ALMONTE, al-mon'-tai, a town in Seville, a fertile district of Spain, 21 miles from Huelva. Pop. 4,000.

ALMORA, al-mo'-ra, the chief town in the British district of Kumaon, in North Hindostan, built on a ridge 5,337 feet above the level of the sea, 85 miles from Bareilly. It is in the presidency of Bengal, and has an old citadel and a modern British fort. Lat. 29° 35′ N. Lon. 79° 42′ E.

ALMORAVIDES, al'-mo-rav'-e-dees, a powerful Arabian tribe, who, in the 7th century, came from the country of Himyar, and settled in Syria in the time of Abu-bekr, the first caliph. (See ABUBEKR.)

ALMUNECAR, al-moo-nai'-kar, a seaport town of Spain, 33 miles from Grenada. It trades in cotton, fruit, and sugar. Pop. 5,400.—The fortifications of this place were erected by the emperor Charles V., and were destroyed by the British in 1812.

ALNE, an, the name of three small rivers in the counties Northumberland, Cumberland, and Warwick. —The name of a parish in the North Riding of Yorkshire, 22 miles from York. Area, 10,250 acres. Pop. 1,800.

ALNEMOUTH. (See ALEMOUTH.)

ALNEY, al'-nai, a small island in the river Severn, near Gloucester. Here Edmund Ironside and Canute the Dane fought a duel in presence of their two armies, in order to decide who should possess the kingdom. Canute was wounded, and an agreement was then made that he should have the northern, and Edmund the southern part of the realm.

ALNWICK, or ALNEWICK, ăn'-ik, a market-town and parish of Northumberland, situate on a declivity near the river Alne. There is a spacious square, in which a market is held weekly, and there is a large town-house ornamented with a tower and piazzas. Area of parish, 16,250 acres. Pop., town and parish, about 8,000.—Alnwick was formerly fortified, and vestiges of its walls and gates still remain. At the north entrance to the town stands Alnwick Castle, now an elegant mansion belonging to the duke of Northumberland, supposed to have been a stronghold in the time of the Romans. There is a cross, called Malcolm's Cross, erected on the spot where Malcolm III. of Scotland is said to have received a mortal wound from a soldier, who came to offer to surrender to him the keys of the castle on the point of a spear. A station on the North-Eastern Railway.

ALOA, a-lo'-a, festivals at Athens in honour of Bacchus and Ceres. The oblations were the fruits of the earth. Ceres has been called, from this, Aloas and Alois.

ALOADIN, a-lo'-a-din, a Mahometan sheik, better known by the appellation of the Old Man of the Mountain, was prince of the Arsacides, or Assassins. His residence was a castle between Antioch and Damascus, and he had a number of youthful followers, so devoted to his will as to engage in any of his attempts to assassinate the monarchs and princes with whom he was at enmity. Lived in the 13th century.

ALOEUS, ă-lo-e'-us, a giant, son of Titan and Terra, married to Iphimedia, by whom Neptune had two sons, Othus and Ephialtus. Aloeus educated them as his own, and from that circumstance they have been called Aloides. They grew up nine inches every month, and were only nine years old when they undertook a war against the gods, and were killed by Apollo and Diana. They built the town of Ascra, at the foot of Mount Helicon.

ALOMPRA, a-lom'-pra, an inhuman chief, who, from being the head of a petty Asiatic village, became, by conquest and barbarity, the founder of the reigning dynasty of Burmah. B. 1711; D. near Martaban, 1760. (See AVA, BURMAH, PEGU.)

ALOPE, ăl'-o-pe, daughter of Cercyon, king of Eleusis. She had a child by Neptune, whom she exposed in the woods, covered with a piece of her dress. The child was preserved, and carried to her father, who, knowing the garment, ordered his daughter to be put to death. Neptune, who could not save his mistress, changed her into a fountain. The child, called Hippothoon, was preserved by shepherds, and placed by Theseus on his grandfather's throne.—A town of Thessaly.—Another of Locris, in Greece.

ALOPECE, ă-lop'-e-se, an island in the Palus Mæotis. —Another in the Cimmerian Bosphorus.—Another in the Ægean Sea, opposite Smyrna.

ALOPECES, a-lop'-e-sees, a small village of Attica, where was the tomb of Anchimolius, whom the Spartans sent to deliver Athens from the tyranny of the Pisistratidæ. It is the native place of Socrates and Aristides.

ALOPECONNESUS, ă-lop'-e-kon-e'-sus, a town of the Thracian Chersonesus, taken by Philip, king of Macedon, towards the commencement of his wars with the Romans.

ALOPIUS, ă-lo'-pe-us, a son of Hercules and Antiope.

ALORA, a-lo'-ra, a town in Andalusia, Spain, remarkable for the ruins of an ancient castle. It is 20 miles from Malaga. Pop. about 7,000.

ALOS, or HALOS, ai'-los, a town of Phthiotis, in Thessaly, on the river Amphrysus. It contained a temple sacred to Jupiter Laphystius.

ALOST, or AELST, a'-lost, a town of Belgium, in Flanders, on the Dender, 15 miles from Brussels. Manf. Linen and lace; and it has oil-factories. Pop. 16,000. It was the capital of imperial Flanders, and was taken and dismantled in 1667 by Marshal Turenne. It is a station on the Brussels and Ostend Railway.

ALOTIA, ă-lo'-te-a, festivals in Arcadia, to commemorate a victory gained by the Arcadians over Lacedæmon.

ALP ARSLAN, alp ars'-lan, second sultan of the dynasty of Seljuk, succeeded his uncle Togrul Beg in 1063. He defeated Romanus Diogenes, emperor of the Greeks, in 1068, and was stabbed by a desperate Carizmian, whom he had taken prisoner and sentenced to death, in 1072.

ALPENUS, ăl'-pe'-nus, the capital of Locris, to the north of Thermopylæ.

ALPHEIA, al-fe'-i-a, a surname of Diana in Elis. Also a surname of the nymph Arethusa, because loved by the river Alpheus.

ALPHEN, al'-pen, a town of Holland, on the Rhine, 7 miles from Leyden. Manf. Principally linens. Pop. 3,000.—Another, 11 miles from Breda. Pop. about 2,000.

ALPHERY, Nicephorus, al-fer'-e, a Russian prince, who, when that country was rent in pieces by civil dissensions, at the end of the 16th century, was sent with two of his brothers to England, to the care of a Russian merchant, by whom they were placed in the university of Oxford, where two of them died of the small-pox. Nicephorus entered into orders, and in 1618 obtained the rectory of Warley, in Huntingdonshire, whence he was ejected in the civil war, and cruelly treated by the republican party. At the Restoration he was reinstated in his living; but, being old and infirm, he committed the care of it to a curate, and retired to Hammersmith, where he died. Lived in the 17th century.

ALPHESIBŒA, ăl-fe-si-be'-a, daughter of the river Phlegeus, married Alcmæon, son of Amphiaraus, who had fled to her father's court after the murder of his mother. (See ALCMEON).

ALPHETON, ăl-fe-ton, a parish in Suffolk, 6 miles from Sudbury. Area, 2,250 acres. Pop. 400.

ALPHEUS, ăl-fe'-us, a famous river of Peloponnesus, rising in Arcadia, and, after passing through Elis and Achaia, falling into the Ionian Sea. The god of this river fell in love with the nymph Arethusa, and pursued her till she was changed into a fountain by Diana.

ALPHINGTON, ăl-fing-ton, a village and parish of Devonshire, 2 miles from Exeter. Area, 2,720 acres. Pop. 1,200.

ALPHIUS, Avitus, ăl'-fe-us, a Roman poet, who wrote the lives of eminent persons, and the history of the Carthaginian war, in verse. Flourished in the 3rd century.

ALPHIUS, or ALFENUS, a celebrated usurer, ridiculed in Horace.

ALPHONSO I., ăl-fon'-zo, king of Portugal, was the son of Henry, count of Portugal, by Theresa, daughter of Alphonso, king of Leon and Castile. In 1139, his territories being invaded by the Moors, he attacked them with greatly inferior numbers, and obtained a signal victory on the plains of Ourique. This event caused the government to be changed into a monarchy, and he was proclaimed king on the field of battle. He is regarded by the Portuguese as the founder of their independence. D. at Coimbra, 1185.

ALPHONSO II., king of Portugal, passed his reign in comparative peace, save in disputing with the Church for endeavouring to reduce the clergy to military service. D. 1223.

ALPHONSO III., king of Portugal, was engaged in a war with the Mahometans, from whom he made a few conquests. D. 1279.

ALPHONSO IV., king of Portugal, succeeded his father Denis in 1325, and instituted many good laws and regulations for the benefit of his subjects, dispensing justice with impartiality, though sometimes with too great severity. B. 1290; D. 1357.

ALPHONSO V., king of Portugal, was born in 1432, succeeding his father Edward when he was but six years old. He invaded Africa several times, and took Alcazar, Seguer, and Tangier. D. of the plague at Cintra, in 1481.—He was a beneficent prince, and an encourager of learning. In his reign Guinea was discovered by the Portuguese.

ALPHONSO I., chosen king of the Asturias, in 739, extended his dominions over nearly the fourth part of Spain, and took Lara and Saldana, in Castile, from the Moors. D. 757.

ALPHONSO II., surnamed the Chaste, was continually engaged either in suppressing insurrections among his subjects, or fighting against the Moors. He was called to the throne in 791. D. 843.

ALPHONSO III., THE GREAT, king of the Asturias, ascended the throne in 865. He was successful in his wars with the Moors, but in the decline of life his peace was disturbed by insurrections. In 908 he resigned his crown to his son Garcias, who engaging, soon after, in a war with the Moors, Alphonso headed the army, and obtained a great victory. B. 847; D. at Zamora, 910. —He wrote a chronicle of Spanish affairs.

ALPHONSO IV., surnamed the Monk, abdicated in favour of his brother Ramiro, and retired to the monastery of Sahagun. D. at the end of the 10th century.

ALPHONSO V. ascended the throne of Leon in 999; but being only in his fifth year, the government was administered by a regent. During his reign Cordova was conquered and Leon rebuilt. Killed at the siege of Viseu, in 1028.

ALPHONSO VI. was crowned in 1066. During the reign of this sovereign, Asturias, Leon, Castile, and Galicia, were held under his authority. He was a successful warrior, and had Spain not been invaded by the Almoravides with a powerful army, he would have succeeded in driving the Moors from the peninsula. D. at Toledo, 1109.—It was in the reign of this monarch that Rodrigo Diaz de Vivar, surnamed the Cid, achieved the poetical celebrity with which his name has been surrounded by the Spanish romance-writers.

ALPHONSO VII. became Alphonso I. of Aragon. Killed at Fraga, 1134.

ALPHONSO VIII., called the Emperor, fought vigorously against the Moors. D. in his tent near Toledo, 1157.—The military order of Alcantara was instituted at the close of this reign.

ALPHONSO IX., like his predecessor, was similarly engaged against the Moors. D. at Villanueva de Sarria, in 1230.

ALPHONSO X., surnamed the Learned, king of Leon and Castile, succeeded his father Ferdinand III. in 1252. His reign was unprosperous, but he acquired a great reputation as a man of learning and science. The Alphonsine Tables were drawn up under his direction, and at his expense. B. 1203; D. 1284.—He wrote on the motions of the stars, and a History of Spain.

ALPHONSO XI. in 1312 succeeded his father Ferdinand IV. During a long minority, his kingdom was rent by convulsions. He took Algeciras and Tarifa from the Moors, but died of the plague while besieging Gibraltar, in 1350.

ALPHONSO V., king of Aragon, succeeded his father Ferdinand the Just in 1416. Soon after his accession, a confederacy was formed against him, but he frustrated its object and pardoned the conspirators. He laid claim to the throne of Naples, upon an agreement with Joan, queen of that kingdom, that he should be her heir. This embroiled him in a war with several of the Italian states, and he and his fleet were taken by the Genoese. He was conveyed to Milan, where he made the duke his friend, and was thereby enabled to conquer Naples in 1442. B. 1384; D, at Naples, 1458.—He left his Neapolitan dominions to his natural son Ferdinand, and those of Spain, Sardinia, and Sicily, to his brother Juan, king of Navarre. Besides being a learned prince and a patron of men of letters, he was valiant and liberal, and greatly beloved by his subjects. A courtier remonstrating with him for walking about without a guard: "A father," said Alphonso, "has nothing to dread in the midst of his children." One of his vessels being in danger of perishing, he jumped into a boat, and hastened to her relief, saying, "I had rather partake, than behold, the calamity of my people."—This last is a particularly fine observation, and indicates the magnanimity of the man.

ALPHONSO II., king of Naples, succeeded his father Ferdinand in 1494. He was of so cruel and tyrannical a disposition, that his subjects invited Charles VIII. of France to invade the country. That prince took Naples; and Alphonso, after abdicating the throne, retired to a monastery in Sicily, where he died about 1496.

ALPHTEGIN, alp-teg'-in, a Turk, who, from being a slave, rose to be governor of Khorasan and sovereign of Guzna. He reigned sixteen years, leaving the throne to his son-in-law, Sebek Teghin, whose son Mahmoud founded the dynasty of the Gaznevids.

ALPINI, Prosper, al-pe'-ne, a Venetian physician and botanist. He was at first a soldier, but quitted that profession and went to Padua, where he made so great a progress in learning that he became deputy rector and syndic. In 1578 he took his degree of M.D., and in 1580 went to Egypt as physician to the Venetian consul. He resided there three years, in which time he greatly improved himself in botany. He was the first who discovered the sexes and generation of plants. On his return to Venice, in 1586, Andrew Doria, prince of Melfi, appointed him his physician; and in 1593 he was called to the botanical professorship at Padua, which he held until his death. B. 1553; D. at Padua, 1617.—He has bequeathed to posterity several learned works upon botany and medicine.

ALPINUS, Cornelius, ăl-pi'-nus, a contemptible poet, whom Horace ridicules for the awkward manner in which he introduced the death of Memnon in a tragedy, and the pitiful style in which he described the Rhine, in an epic poem.

ALPNACH, alp'-nak, a town of Switzerland, 8 miles from Lucerne. Pop. about 1,600.—A remarkable wooden railway, called the slide of Alpnach, was here constructed. It was made for slipping timber down to Lake Lucerne from Mount Pilate.

ALPS, ălps, the greatest mountain system in Europe, running in an unbroken line from the Mediterranean round the N.W. of Italy to the eastern side of the Adriatic. The geographical position of the main mass is nearly midway between the north pole and the equator. They divide Italy from all its northern neighbours,—France, Switzerland, and Germany, and stretch in the form of a crescent from the county of Nice through Provence, Dauphiny, Savoy, Switzerland, the Tyrol, Trent, Brixen, Suabia, the electorate of Saltzburg, Carinthia, Carniola, and the territory of the former republic of Venice. Ext. Their length is between 600 and 700 miles, their breadth very various. Divisions and Passes. The principal divisions are the Maritime, the Cottian, the Greek or Graian, the Pennine, the Rhætian,—distinguished into the High Alps, the Lepontine, and the Rhætian proper; the Tyrolese and Tridentine (including those of Suabia), the Noric, the Carnic, and the Julian. The most southern pass of the Maritime Alps is that by the Col-de-Tende, which, until the time of Napoleon I., was practicable only for mules. He made it a carriage-road. This division is terminated by Mont Viso, which rises 12,582 feet above the level of the sea. Across the Cottians, by the Col of Mont-Génèvre, Napoleon also constructed a carriage-road at the height of 6,353 feet above the sea-level. Across the Graian, Napoleon caused another road to be constructed, by the Col of Mont-Cenis. This is the most frequented of all the Alps: its road was begun in 1803, and finished in 1810. Mont-Cenis is now being tunnelled, so as to connect the railroads of France and Savoy with those of Piedmont. This great undertaking was commenced in the early part of 1858; it has the patronage of the Sardinian government, and forms a portion of the Victor Emmanuel Railway: the length of the tunnel will be upwards of 5 miles, and it is computed that it will be completed in about 15 years. At present, travellers who cross into Italy from the south of France, come by the line of rail through Mâcon and Chambery, to St. Jean de Maurienne, where they take diligences over Mont-Cenis to Susa, in Piedmont. The pass by the Little St. Bernard is in the Graian range, and is that by which Hannibal, with his Carthaginian army, is supposed to have entered Italy. The Pennine is the loftiest division of the whole range, and includes Mont-Blanc, 15,777 feet high; Mont-Rosa, 15,206 feet; and Mont-Cervin, 14,835 feet. These are the three loftiest peaks in Europe, lifting themselves far up into the sky, and reflecting the golden rays of the sun for three quarters of an hour after he has set. On each side of Mont-Blanc are the Cols De-la-Seigne and De-Ferret, which are respectively 8,072 and 7,613 feet high, and those by which tourists generally traverse the Alps. The pass by the Great St. Bernard lies between Aosta in Piedmont and Martigny in the Valais, in Switzerland, and is that by which Napoleon and his army crossed in 1800. Between the Great St. Bernard and the Simplon there are other two passes; one, that of Mont-Cervin, is the second highest in Europe, being 11,195 feet above the level of the sea. The most easterly pass of the Pennine division is the Simplon, which leads from the Valais to Milan, and is one of the most stupendous works which was conceived by the genius of Napoleon, and executed amidst the greatest difficulties, notwithstanding that its height is only 6,576 feet. Across the Rhætians there are several carriage-roads, and the Noric Alps are already crossed by the Great Southern Railroad, running from Vienna to Trieste. Minerals. Anthracite coal, iron, copper, lead, silver, quicksilver, gold, and salt. Wild Animals. On the higher part the ibex, chamois, and the white hare; in the upper wooded region, bears, marmots, and moles; and lower down, lynxes, foxes, wolves, and wild cats. Besides the lammergyer, or great vulture of the Alps, there are numerous eagles and other birds of prey Immediately below the line of perpetual snow (8,000 feet) the white partridge is found, and further down, amongst the pine forests, bustards are abundant. Quails and partridges are plentiful in the lower regions, and the lakes are frequented by numbers of palmipedes. Insects are represented in almost every variety as far as vegetation ascends the mountains. Vegetation. Travelling from the base of the Alps upwards, beautiful vineyards, and the forests common to Europe, are passed through, until the elevation of 2,000 feet is obtained, when the vine is no longer found. The chestnut disappears at 1,000 feet higher, and by the time that another thousand feet are climbed, the oak, hardy as we are accustomed to call it, is not to be found in a flourishing condition. At 5,000 feet no deciduous trees are to be seen, and at 6,000 the spruce fir alone appears. At this height the mountains become covered with the Rhododendron ferrugineum, which, in its turn, succumbs to the change of soil and climate, to be succeeded by a few still more hardy plants, which exist until they are lost in the mosses and lichens which fringe the line of perpetual snow. Glaciers. Of these there are about 400 lying between Mont-Blanc and the Tyrol. Several of them are 20 miles long, with, perhaps, an average width of a mile or a mile and a half. They are supposed in the aggregate to cover a space of upwards of 1,000 square miles.—The summits of the greater part of the Alps are capped in perpetual snow. It is on the Jungfrau, in the great chain of the Bernese Alps, that Byron has laid the scene of his wild, weird, but withal grand, dramatic poem of "Manfred."

ALPS, LOWER, a department of France, comprising the lower ranges of the French Alps, and forming the N.E. part of Provence. Ext. About 100 miles, running in a S.W. direction, with an average breadth of 40 miles. Area, 2,680 square miles. Desc. Consisting almost wholly of mountains, upon which immense flocks and herds are depastured. Towns. The principal are Digne, Barcelonnette, Castellane, Forcalquier, and Sisteron. Pop. 155,000. Lat. between 43° 41′ and 44° 40′ N. Lon. between 5° 29′ and 6° 53′ E.

ALPS, UPPER, a department of France, so named from its containing the highest of the French Alps. It is separated from Piedmont by the Cottian Alps. Ext. Between 70 and 80 miles, with an average breadth of 25. Area, 2,136 square miles. Desc. Exceedingly mountainous, with high valleys, in which the snow lies for more than half the year. Towns. The principal are Gap, Briançon, and Embrun. Pop. 133,000. Lat. between 44° 11′ and 45° 7′ N. Lon. between 5° 23′ and 7° 0′ E.

ALPUJARRAS, al-poosh-ar'-ass, a mountainous region in Spain, beginning at the Mediterranean, and ending at the Serra Nevada. In 1834 it was divided between the provinces of Almeira and Grenada.

ALRESFORD, ăl'-res-ford, a market-town of Hants, consisting of two parishes, Old and New Alresford. Manf. Chiefly linseys. Area of both parishes, 4,910 acres. Pop. about 2,000.

ALREWAS, or ALDERWAS, ăl'-ru-ăs, a village and parish of Staffordshire, 5 miles from Lichfield. Area, 4,350 acres. Pop. 1,700.—A station on the South Staffordshire Railway.

ALSACE, al-sas', one of the old German provinces now forming the two French departments of the Upper and Lower Rhine.

ALSEN, al'-sen, a Danish island in the Baltic, between the island of Funen and the E. coast of Sleswick. Area, 132 square miles. The island is pleasant, and, with the exception of wheat, it produces most kinds of grain. Aniseed is greatly cultivated as a condiment much used by the Danes. Towns. The principal are Nordborg and Sonderborg. Pop. 23,000. Lat. between 54° 51′ and 55° 5′ N. Lon. between 9° 37 and 10° 7′ E.

ALSFELD, als'-felt, a town of Hessen-Darmstadt, 26 miles from Giessen, 60 miles N.E. of Frankfort-on-the-Maine. Manf. Cotton, linen, and woollen goods. Pop. about 4,000.

ALSH, LOCH, lok alsh, a picturesque maritime inlet in Ross-shire, Scotland, the shores of which are rendered romantic by the ruins of several feudal castles. It is nearly opposite the south end of the isle of Skye.

ALSTON, or ALSTON MOOR, a town in Cumberland. The terminus of the Alston and Haltwhistle Railway. (See ALDSTONE.)

ALSTONFIELD, al'-ston-feeld, a parish of Staffordshire, 7 miles from Longnor. Area, 21,860 acres. Pop. about 5,000, chiefly employed in silk-mills and button-factories.

ALSTROMER, John, al-stro'-mer, an eminent patriotic Swede, who, after visiting England, returned to his own country, and became remarkable for the great improvements he there introduced into arts and manufactures. For his great efforts he was made a knight of the Polar Star, chancellor of Commerce, and a member of the Academy of Sciences. B. at Alengsoes, 1685; D. 1761.

ALT, alt, a river of England, which rises in Lancashire, and falls into the Irish Sea.

ALTA GRACIA, al'-ta gra'-the-a, the name of several towns in South America with small populations.

ALTAI MOUNTAINS, al-ti or al-ta'-e, a vast mountain system of Asia, extending from Lon. 80° E. to the Sea of Okhotsk, and forming the natural boundary-line which separates the empires of Russia and China. Ext. Including the Aldan range, about 5,000 miles from east to west. Desc. This mountain system comprises several collateral branches, and their mean elevation may be regarded as ranging between 4,000 and 5,000 feet. The Braluka mountain, near the head of the Oby, is estimated at 10,300 feet above the level of the sea. Their summits generally do not taper away into peaks like those of the Alps, but swell into rounded masses of granite, or spread into level plains of considerable extent. There are two chief roads over the Altai. One is from Irkutsk by Lake Baikal to Kiakhta, by which the trade between Russia and China is principally carried on; the other is from Udinsk, on the Seleuga, to the mining district of Nertchinsk, on the Shilker, an affluent of the Amoor. Minerals. Gold, silver, lead, iron, and copper; and the cornelian, the amethyst, the onyx, the topaz, and other gems, are found. Mineral wealth seems to be unfailing so far as regards the more valuable metals. Wild Animals. Altai is the native abode of the wild sheep, which, like the chamois and the baquetin, lives in the most inaccessible places; deer herd on the slopes of the hills, and the marmot has its habitat near the snow-line. Vegetation. The forests consist of the aspen, alder, acacia, larch, birch, fir, and willow, besides the Siberian cedar. This last is found 7,000 feet high, and at 6,000 attains to the circumference of 14 feet. The birch reaches nearly 5,000 feet, and the dwarf willow nearly 6,000. The snow-line has not been accurately determined, but is supposed to be at about 8,000 feet.

ALTAMURA, al'-ta-moo'-ra, a town of Naples, province of Bari, at the foot of the Apennines. Pop. 16,000.

ALTDORFER, Albrecht, alt-dor'-fer, a distinguished German engraver and painter, who employed himself on sacred, profane, historical, and mythological subjects. Holbein is supposed to have studied his cuts. B. at Altdorf, in Bavaria; D. 1538.

ALTEA, al-tai'-a, a maritime town of Spain, in a province of the same name, 27 miles from Alicante. Pop. nearly 6,000.

ALTENA, al-tai'-na, a town in the Prussian grand duchy of the Lower Rhine, 18 miles from Arnsberg. Manf. Principally steel and iron wares. Pop. 4,500.

ALTENAU, al'-ten-ou, a mining town of Hanover, in the middle of the Hartz Mountains. Pop. 2,000.

ALTENBRUCK, al'-ten-brook, a well-built town of Hanover, 27 miles from Stade. Pop. 2,500, trading chiefly in cattle, grain, and fruit.

ALTENBURG, al'-ten-boorg, the capital of the duchy of Saxe-Altenburg, 24 miles from Leipsic. It is well built, has a castle and several public edifices. Manf. Chiefly woollens, ribbons, and brushes. It does an active trade in corn and cattle. Pop. 16,500. It is a station on the Saxon Bavarian Railway.—A town of Hungary, at the influx of the Leitha into the Danube, 40 miles from Vienna. Pop. 3,500.—The name of several small towns in Germany.

ALTENDORF, al'-ten-dorf, a Bavarian village, 8 miles from Bamberg, and of no note, but for the victory which Kleber, the French general, gained here over the Austrians on the 9th of August, 1796.

ALTENGAARD, al'-ten-gord, a Norwegian seaport, 53 miles from Hammerfest. It is situate nearly at the northern limit of the cultivation of barley. Lat. 69° 50′ N. Lon. 23° 6′ E.

ALTHÆA, al-thē'-a, daughter of Thestius and Eurythemis, married Œneus, king of Calydon, by whom she had many children, among whom was Meleager.

ALTHÆMENES, al-thē'-me-nees, a son of Creteus, king of Creto. Hearing that either he or his brothers were to be their father's murderer, he fled to Rhodes, where he made a settlement, to avoid becoming a parricide. After the death of all his other sons, Creteus went after his son Althæmenes. When he landed in Rhodes, the inhabitants attacked him, supposing him to be an enemy, and he was killed by the hand of his own son. When Althæmenes knew that he had killed his father, he entreated the gods to remove him, and the earth immediately opened, and swallowed him up.

ALTHEN, Ghan, or Jean, alt'-hen, a Persian, who was the first to introduce madder (for dycing) to France. He was the son of the governor of a Persian province, but with the exception of himself, all his family were massacred when the Persian empire was overthrown by the usurper Thamas-Kouli-Khan. B. 1711; D. at Caumont, in France, 1774.—Althen, during his life, was treated ungratefully, but, by way of atonement after his death, a tablet was erected in the museum of Avignon, with the following inscription, which we transcribe, as it tells when and where madder was first introduced into France:—"To Jean Althen, a Persian, who was the first to introduce and cultivate madder in the territory of Avignon, under the patronage of the Marquis de Caumont, in 1765." This testimonial was erected in 1821.

ALTHORP, Lord. (See SPENCER, Earl.)

ALTHORP PARK, al'-thorp, 6 miles from Northampton, which has been in the possession of the Spencer family for upward of 300 years.

ALTIS, al'-tis, a sacred grove round Jupiter's temple at Olympia.

ALTKIRCH, alt'-keerch, a town of France, department of the Upper Rhine. Pop. 1,700. A station on the Eastern Railway of France.

ALTMOOR, alt'-moor, a town of Ireland, in the county of Tyrone.

ALTMUHL, alt-mool, a river of Bavaria, which falls into the Danube at Kelheim. From Dietfurt to Bamberg-on-the-Regnitiz, there is a canal, called the Maine and Danube, or Ludwig's Canal, which connects the Black Sea with the German Ocean. The first boat passed through it in August, 1836.

ALTON, al'-ton, a market-town and parish in Hants, on the river Wey, and 16 miles from Winchester. Pop. 3,700, chiefly engaged in the manufacture of woollens, worsteds, and silks. It is a station on the South-Western Railway.—The name of several other parishes in England.

ALTON, a town of the United States, at the junction of the Mississippi with the Missouri. Pop. 13,000.—There are several other towns of the same name in America.

ALTONA, or ALTENA, al'-to-na, a large Danish town, about 2 miles W. of Hamburg, on the Elbe. Both the inland and foreign commerce here are considerable. Ship-building is an important branch of employment. Manf. Velvet, silk stuffs, calico, stockings, leather, gloves, tobacco, vinegar, starch, wax, and looking-glasses, with sugar-refineries and brandy. The principal public establishments are an academy, a library, a house of correction, an orphan-house, and an observatory. Pop. 33,000. Lat. 53° 32′ N. Lon. 9° 56′ E. It is the terminus of the Altona (Hamburg) and Kiel Railway.

ALTORF, al'-torf, a small but well-built town in Switzerland, capital of the canton of Uri, near the southern extremity of Lake Lucerne. Pop. 1,800.—Here is a tower which indicates the spot where Tell stood when he shot the apple off the head of his son, and the small village of Burglen, in the neighbourhood, is pointed out as being the birthplace of that patriot.

ALTRINGHAM, al'-tring-ham, a market-town in Cheshire, 8 miles from Manchester. Manf. Cloths, cottons, and yarns, and the neighbourhood supplies a great quantity of vegetables and fruit for the Manchester market. Pop. about 5,000. It is the terminus of the Manchester and Altringham Railway.

ALUNNO, Niccolo, a-loo'-no, an Italian painter of considerable merit, who flourished in the 15th century. There are few of his works extant, but what there are entitle him to praise. B. at Foligno; D. about 1500.

ALURED, a-lu'-red, of Beverley, an ancient English historian. He was canon and treasurer of the church of St. John, in Beverley, and wrote a chronicle of the English kings, which was published by Hearne in 1716. D. 1128.

ALVA, al'-va, a village and parish of Scotland, in Stirlingshire, 6 miles from Stirling. Pop. 3,300.—Here the Devon Iron Company have their works, which are very extensive.

ALVA, Ferdinand Alvarez, duke of, al'-va, a distinguished soldier, and descended from one of the most ancient families in Spain. He made his first campaign at the age of 17, and was present at the battle of Pavia. He was a great favourite of the emperor Charles V., who made him a general; but though he distinguished himself by the high order of his military talents, he became equally noted for the cruelty of his disposition. At the siege of Metz he performed prodigies of valour; and although he commanded there, the place was so well defended that he was obliged to raise the siege. In the campaign against Pope Paul IV., in 1556, Alva was completely successful, and obliged the pontiff to sue for peace, after which he repaired to Rome, to ask pardon for having opposed his holiness in the war. In 1567 Philip II. sent him into the Low Countries, to reduce the Netherlands to the Spanish yoke, from which they were about to revolt. Here he established a council composed of twelve judges, whom he denominated Judges of the Tumults; but the tribunal over which they presided was called by its victims the "Court of Blood." His tyranny was now as intolerable as his power was extraordinary. Thirty thousand persons fled their country and sought refuge in other parts. He filled the United Provinces with terror and scenes of carnage, for which his memory is held in detestation to this day. He hastily tried and beheaded counts Egmont and Horn, two patriots and friends of the prince of Orange, who had defeated a body of Spaniards at Groningen. He fortified Antwerp, and when the works were completed he caused a statue of himself to be cast in brass and erected in the middle of the fortress. At his feet was an allegorical representation of the nobility and the people, in the shape of a double-headed monster. Insult upon insult he heaped upon those he had subjected to his dominion, until even his friends became disgusted with him; when his inhumanity to the inhabitants of Haarlem brought his unpopularity to a climax. On the surrender of this city, he caused two thousand of its brave inhabitants to be executed. In 1573 he left the country he had ruled with a rod of iron, followed by the curses of the people. It is affirmed that during his administration in the Netherlands, he had caused to be executed eighteen thousand human beings, independent of those who fell in the various battles and sieges. He was afterwards employed against Portugal, where he greatly added to his military renown by driving Don Antonio from the throne in 1581. B. 1508; D. 1582.—Alva was an able general, and had a great strategic genius in the art of war. He never fought if he could gain his object otherwise. When at Cologne he was urged to engage the Dutch by the archbishop, who was struck by his efforts to avoid a conflict. "The object of a general," said he on that occasion, "is not to fight, but to conquer: he fights enough who obtains the victory." He is said never to have lost a battle. The character of this willing servant of the despotism of Charles V. and Philip II. is ably drawn, and his deeds faithfully narrated, in Mr. Motley's History,—"The Rise of the Dutch Republic."

ALVARADO, Pedro de, al'-va-ra'-do, a distinguished companion of Hernando Cortes in the conquest of Mexico. He was engaged in every battle till the final reduction of that kingdom. B. at Badajoz; D. on the coast of Guatemala, 1541.—Alvarado was some time governor of Guatemala, to which was added the province of Honduras, which from being in a state of continual internal warfare, seems to have enjoyed some degree of repose under his administration.

ALVARADO, a large river of Mexico, which runs into the Gulf of Mexico, about 36 miles from Vera Cruz.—A town at the mouth of the Alvarado river. Pop. 2,000.

ALVAREZ, Francis, al-va'-raiz, a Portuguese divine, sent by Emanuel, king of Portugal, on an embassy to Ethiopia or Abyssinia. D. 1540. In the following year a narrative of his mission was published.

ALVAREZ DE LUNA, or ALVARO, was the favourite of John II., king of Castile. He was the natural son of Don Alvaro de Luna, and in 1408 was appointed gentleman of the bedchamber to the king; but the courtiers taking a dislike to him, forced him to retire from court. He was afterwards recalled by the king, who at his request banished his enemies. After enjoying the splendour of royal favour forty-five years, he fell into disgrace, and was beheaded for high treason in 1453. B. 1388.

ALVAREZ, Don José, an eminent Spanish sculptor and artist. A statue of Ganymede, which he executed in 1804, whilst studying at Paris, placed him in the first rank of modern sculptors. His studio was twice visited by Napoleon I., who presented him with a gold medal valued at 500 francs. The conduct of Napoleon towards Spain, however, excited the disgust of Alvarez, who took such an aversion to the French emperor, that he would never model his bust. Subsequently he chiefly resided at Rome, and became court sculptor to Ferdinand VII. of Spain, for whom, in 1818, he executed his famous group of Antilochus and Memnon. He enjoyed a pension from the Spanish crown. B. at Priego, Cordova, 1768; D. at Madrid, 1826.

ALVECHURCH, ăl-ve-church, a town and parish of Worcestershire, on the Worcester canal, and 4½ miles from Bromsgrove. Area, 6,820 acres. Pop. 1,800.—Reached by the Birmingham and Gloucester Railway.

ALVELEY, ăl'-ve-le, a parish and township of Salop, on the Severn, 6 miles from Bridgenorth. Area, 7,640 acres. Pop. 1,100.

ALVENSLEBEN, Philip Charles, Count d', al'-ven-slaï'-ben, a distinguished Prussian statesman and diplomatist. B. 1745; D. 1802.—Also a Prussian general of great bravery, who distinguished himself at the battles of Lutzen, Dresden, and under the walls of Paris. B. at Schochurtz, 1778; D. 1831.

ALVERSTOKE, ăl-ver-stoke, a parish in Hants, on the Solent and Portsmouth harbour. It embraces Gosport, Anglesey, forts Monkton and Blockhouse. Area, 4,010 acres. Pop. 17,000.

ALVESTON, ăl'-ves-ton, the name of two parishes in England with small populations. One is in Gloucester, and the other in Warwick.

ALVETON, or ALTON, al-ton, a parish in Staffordshire, 4 miles from Cheadle. Area, 7,470 acres. Pop. 2,326.

ALVIANO, Bartholomew, al-ve-a'-no, a Venetian general who obtained signal advantages over the emperor Maximilian, for which he received triumphal honours. D. at the siege of Brescia, in 1515.—The state of Venice gave him a magnificent burial, and pensioned his family.

ALVINEZ, al-ve'-naiz, an Austrian town in Transylvania, 6 miles from Karlsburg. Pop. 3,500, mostly Bulgarians and Magyars.

ALVINZI, N., Baron d', al-veen'-ze, a field-marshal in the service of Austria, during the last great war. Being defeated by Napoleon I. both at Rivoli and Arcola, in 1797, he was superseded in the command of the army of Italy. In 1798 he became commander-general in Hungary, where he was greatly beloved. B. 1726; D. in Hungary, 1810.

ALWEN, al-wen, a river of North Wales, falling into the Dee 7 miles from Bala.

ALWUR, or MACHERY, al-wur, a state of Rajpootana, under the control of the Governor-General's agent for the states of that province. Ext. 80 miles in length, running north and south, and 65 in breadth. Area, 3,573 square miles. Desc. Hilly, but interspersed with rich beautiful valleys. Pop. about 300,000. Lat. between 27° 4′ and 28° 13′ N. Lon. between 76° 7′ and 77° 14′ E.

ALWUR, the capital of the above state, estimated to stand on an eminence 1,200 feet above the surrounding country. It is an ill-built town, encompassed by a mud wall defended by bastions. It was formerly the residence of the rajah. Lat. 27° 34′ N. Lon. 76° 40′ E.

ALYATTES, ă-li-ăt'-es, a king of Lydia, who was engaged in perpetual wars with the Cimmerians and the Medes, and took Smyrna. Reigned in the 7th century B.C.

ALYCÆUS, ăl-i-sē'-us, son of Sciron, who was killed by Theseus. A place in Megara was named after him.

ALYMON, ă-lī'-mon, the husband of Circe.

ALYPIUS, ă-lip'-e-us, a geographer, who was employed by the emperor Julian, first in Britain as deputy-governor, and next at Jerusalem in rebuilding the temple. At the close of life he was banished, but for what cause is not known. Lived in the 4th century. A geographical description of the world by him was printed in 4to at Geneva, in 1628.

ALYSSUS, ă-lis'-us, a fountain of Arcadia, the waters of which were said to cure hydrophobia.

ALYTH, ā'-lith, a town and parish of Scotland, in Perthshire, 12 miles from Forfar. Manf. Yarn and brown linens. Pop. 3,300.

ALZEY, allt'-se, a walled town of Hessen-Darmstadt, on the Salzbach, 19 miles from Mainz. Has a trade chiefly in leather. Pop. nearly 5,000.

AM, am, a frontier stronghold of Afghanistan, 50 miles N. of Attock.

AMACURA, a-ma-ku'-ra, a river falling into the south mouth of the Orinoco, South America. In the lower part of its course it forms the boundary between British and Columbian Guiana.

AMADEDDULAT, a-ma-ded'-u-la, the founder of a Persian dynasty, was the son of a fisherman. He and his two brothers took Persia proper, Persian Irak, and Caramania, which they divided between them. He settled at Schiraz, in Persia proper, in 933. D. 949.

AMADEUS V., a-ma-de'-us, count of Savoy, began his government in 1285. He immortalized his name by his defence of Rhodes against the Turks, on which occasion he added to his arms the cross of the order of St. John of Jerusalem. D. 1323.

AMADEUS VI., count of Savoy, was one of the most warlike princes of his age. He assisted John, king of France, against Edward, king of England, and in 1366 passed into Greece to the assistance of the emperor John Palcologus. On his return he presented the patriarch of Constantinople, who accompanied him, to Pope Urban V. at Viterbo. D. 1383.

AMADEUS VIII., count of Savoy, entered upon the sovereignty in 1391. In 1416 Savoy was created a duchy, and not long after the duke retired from the throne and his family to a monastery, where he instituted an order of knighthood, by the name of the Annunciata. The knights, however, lived in a luxurious style, without any of the severities of monachism. In 1439 he caused himself to be elected pope by the council of Basil, on which he took the name of Felix V., but he was dispossessed of his title, and in 1449 made a formal abdication in favour of Nicholas V., who gave him a cardinalship, and made him dean of the Sacred College. D. 1451.

AMADEUS IX, duke of Savoy, was a very charitable prince, and so beloved by his subjects, that they called him the "blessed Amadeus." D. 1472.—There were nine rulers in Savoy of this name, but the above are the only remarkable men.

AMADIAH, or AMADIEH, a-ma'-de-a, a fortified town of Asiatic Turkey, Kurdistan, on a tributary of the Tigris, 65 miles from Mosul.

AMADOCUS, ă-năd'-o-kus, a king of Thrace, defeated by his antagonist Scuthes.

AMAFINIUS, ă-ma-fin'-e-us, a Roman, who first taught his countrymen the tenets of Epicurus, which they embraced with avidity.

AMAGE, ăm'-ā-je, a queen of Sarmatia, remarkable for her justice and fortitude.

AMAK, or AMAGER, a'-mak, a-ma'-ger, a Danish island to the S. of Copenhagen, on which its suburb Christianshavn is built. Pop. about 8,000.

AMAK, or ABULNAGIE AL BOKHARI, a'-mak, a Persian poet, entertained at the court of the sultan Khedar Khan, who instituted an academy of poets, of which he made Amak president. Flourished in the 5th century, and lived to a great age.—His chief poem is the "History of the Loves of Joseph and Zoleiskah."

AMAKUTAN, a-ma-ku'-tan, an island of the Pacific. (See KURILL ISLANDS.)

AMAL, o'-mal, a town of Sweden, 50 miles from Weversborg. Its harbour is in Lake Wever, and its trade principally consists of deals, iron, and steel. Pop. 11,500.

AMALARIC, or AMAURY, ă-măl'-a-rik, king of the Visigoths, was the son of Alaric II. He succeeded his grandfather Theodoric in 526. He married Clotilda, the daughter of Clovis, king of France, whom he used barbarously to make her embrace Arianism. At length she complained to her brother Childebert, king of Paris, who, in 531, marched against him and defeated him in a battle fought in Catalonia. He fled to a church, where he was slain.

AMALEK, the son of Eliphaz, and grandson of Esau. Some have supposed him to be the father of the Amalekites, but they are mentioned as a powerful people long before his birth.

AMALEKITES, ă-măl'-e-kites, a great people, of uncertain origin and residence. They are called the first of all the nations, and they were the first who attacked the Israelites. For this they became the objects of God's most terrible wrath.

AMALFI, or AMALPHI, a-mal'-fe, a seaport city and an archbishop's see of Naples, in the principality of Citra, 8 miles from Salerno. Pop. not more than 8,000. —In the 11th century the inhabitants of this city took an active part in the crusades, and founded the order of the Knights of Malta. It was then a place of about 50,000 inhabitants. Masaniello the fisherman, and a short time ruler of Naples, was born here, as was Flavio Gioia, the improver of the mariner's compass.

AMALIE, or AMELIA, Anna, a-ma-lie, princess of Prussia, daughter of Frederick William I., and sister of Frederick the Great. This princess was greatly distinguished by her musical talents, to the cultivation of which she devoted nearly all her time. At the age of 21 she became princess-abbess of Quedlinburg. B. 1723; D. 1787.

AMALIE, the wife of the duke of Saxe-Weimar, who, at an early age, lost her husband, but managed to preserve her little state intact during some of the most troublous times of the continental wars. She resided in the city of Weimar, and invited the most distinguished men of letters to her capital. Wieland, Herder, Schiller, and Goethe settled here, and enjoyed her patronage as well as her company. D. 1807.

AMALRIC, or ARNAULD, a-mal'-rick, a Spanish military churchman, who distinguished himself by his cruelties against the Albigenses. In 1209 he laid siege to Beziers, and commanded 60,000 of the inhabitants to be slaughtered after the town had surrendered. "How are we to distinguish the Catholics from the heretics?" inquired one of his officers. "Kill them all—God knows his own," replied Amalric. D. 1225.

AMALTEO, Pomponio, a-mal'-tai-o, an eminent painter of the Venetian school. B. at San Vito, in Friuli, 1505. The year of his death is not known.

AMALTHÆA, ă-măl-the'-a, a daughter of Melissus, king of Crete, who fed Jupiter with goat's milk. Hence she has been called a goat, and some have maintained that Jupiter, to reward her kindness, placed her in heaven as a constellation, and presented one of her horns to the nymphs who had superintended his infant years. This horn was called the Cornucopia, or horn of plenty, and had the power of giving the nymphs whatever they desired.

AMALTHEA, the Cumean Sibyl, who offered Tarquin nine books on the fate of Rome, for which she demanded 300 crowns. He refused to make the purchase, when she burnt three of them, and demanded the same sum for the remainder. Tarquin still refusing, she burnt three more, and required as much for those which were left. The king, astonished, consulted the priests, and by their advice made the purchase of the remaining three, which were committed to the care of two magistrates, who were to consult them on extraordinary occasions. They are known as the Sibylline oracles.

AMALTHEUM, ă-măl-the'-um, a public place which Atticus had opened in his country house called Amalthea, in Epirus, and furnished with everything which could give entertainment and convey instruction.

AMAMA, Sixtinus, a-ma'-ma, a learned Dutchman, who became eminent for his knowledge of the Oriental languages. He was at Oxford in 1613, and taught Hebrew in Exeter College. After residing there some years, he returned to Francker, and became Hebrew professor. D. 1629.—His greatest work is a censure of the Vulgate.

AMAN, Johann, a'-man, an eminent German architect, who was employed in various public buildings by several princes of Germany, and by the emperor of Austria. D. 1765; D. 1834.

AMANA, or AMANUS, ăm'-a-na, now Almadag, a branch of Mount Taurus, which separates Syria from Cilicia.

AMAND, Mark Anthony Gerard, sieur de Saint, a'-mang, a French poet, whose father was a commander in the English navy, and was three years confined in the Black Tower at Constantinople. B. at Rouen, 1594; D. 1661.—The poems of Amand, which are chiefly comic, were published in 8 vols., 1649, Paris.

AMAND, ST., sant a'-mang, a town and parish of France, in the department of the Cher, on which river it is situate, 26 miles from Bourges. Commerce. Chiefly carried on in leather, iron, wood, wool, corn, and wine. Pop. upwards of 8,000.—There are several other towns in France of this name, but none of them has a population over 3,000, and there is nothing remarkable to be said about them.

AMAND, ST., a town and parish of Belgium, on the Scheld, 15 miles from Antwerp. Manf. Woven fabrics, oil-cloth, and chicory. It has also some breweries and tan-works. Pop. 3,000.

AMAND-LES-EAUX, ST., a'-mang-lais-o, a town and parish of France, in the department of the Nord, 6 miles from Valenciennes. Manf. Cambrics, cottons, woollens, soap, leather, porcelain, and linseed-oil. Pop. about 10,000.—This place is visited for its thermal baths.

AMANTEA, a-man'-tai-a, a fortified seaport town of Naples, on the coast of Calabria Citra, 15 miles from Cosenza. Pop. 3,000.

AMAPALLA, a-ma-pal'-a, a town of Central America, province of Nicaragua. This town gives name to a large gulf of the same name, 220 leagues S.E. of Guatemala.

AMARA, WELL OF, a-mar'-a, a caravan-station of Arabia, on the east coast of the Gulf of Suez. Lat. 29° 37′ N. Lon. 32° 55′ E.—It is thought to be the Marah of Holy Writ, the waters of which were rendered wholesome in answer to the prayer of Moses.

AMARAL, Andres do, am'-a-ral, a Portuguese knight of the order of St. John of Jerusalem, beheaded for secretly inviting the Turks to invade the island of Rhodes, 1522.—The result of this invasion was the surrender of Rhodes to Sultan Solyman, on the Christmas-day of 1522.

AMARANTH, a-ma-ranth'-tai, a town of Portugal, in the province of Entre Douro e Minho, on the river Tamega, 36 miles from Oporto. Pop. 4,000.—The possession of this town was frequently contested during the peninsular war in 1809.

AMARAPURA, or UMMERAPOORA, a'-ma-ra-poo'-ra, the City of Immortals, and former capital of the Burmese dominions, 6 miles from Ava. In 1819, the seat of government being transferred to Ava, this town began to decline. It is still, however, a splendid city, and no European town has a better-organized police system. Near it is the temple with the bronze statue of Guadama, taken and brought here from Aracan in 1784, when it was conquered by the Burmese. Pop. 150,000. Lat. 21° 55′ N. Lon. 96° 0′ E.

AMARI, Michele, am'-ar-e, an Italian historian of marked progressive tendencies in his political opinions, and devoted to literary pursuits. He translated the "Marmion" of Scott into Italian, and wrote a history of the Sicilian Vespers, which brought him into immediate notice. With a view to the production of a history of Sicily under the Mussulman rule, he is generally believed to have applied himself successfully to the study of Arabic. B. at Palermo, 1806.

AMARYLLIS, ă-ma-ril'-is, the name of a country woman in Virgil's eclogues. Some commentators have supposed that the poet spoke of Rome under this fictitious name.

AMARYNTHUS, ăm-a-rin'-thus, a village of Eubœa, whence Diana is called Amarysia, and her festivals in that town Amarynthia.

AMASA, ă-mai'-sa, a son of Jether, who is elsewhere called Ithra. He was pardoned by David though he fought against him in the army of Absalom.

AMASAI, ă-mās'-a-i, a Levite, and one of the sons of Elkanah, who assisted David against Saul.

AMASIA, or AMASIAYAH, a-mai'-se-a, a town of Asiatic Turkey, in the province of Natolia, intersected by the river Yeshil-Irmak (the ancient Iris), winding at the bottom of the hills whereon it is built. The town is embosomed in an amphitheatre of mountains, and is commanded by a fort, situate on a sharp-pointed rock. Although an extensive and populous place, the streets are narrow and dirty. Most of the houses are built of wood, but many are built of stone, and are covered with tiles. There is only one mosque, a fine edifice, with two lofty minarets of hewn stone; of which material the numerous baths are also constructed. It stands on both banks of the river, and is connected by a stone bridge. Exp. Principally salt and silk. In 1840 there were no less than 132,000 lb. of silk produced in its neighbourhood, which, however, is an unusually large crop. Pop. about 30,000. Lat. 40° 35′ N. Lon. 36° 18′ E.—Strabo, the geographer, is said to have been born in this city, and also King Mithridates. It was anciently the capital of the kings of Pontus.

AMASIS, ă-mai'-sis, king of Egypt; he was prime minister to Apries, king of that country, on whose deposition he mounted the throne, B.C. 569, and immediately put Apries to death. Egypt flourished greatly in his reign. D. 525 B.C.

AMASREH, AMASERAH, or AMASTRA, a-mas'-rai, a fortified town of Asiatic Turkey, in Natolia, on a cape in the Black Sea, 60 miles from Erekli. Pop. 1,000.—In its neighbourhood are the remains of a temple of Neptune.

AMASTRIS, ă-mās'-tris, the wife of Dionysius, the tyrant of Sicily. She was sister to the Persian king Darius, whom Alexander conquered.—Also the wife of Xerxes, king of Persia. (See AMESTRIS.)—Another, a friend of Æneas, killed by Camilla in the Rutulian war.

AMATA, a-mat'-ta, the wife of King Latinus. She had betrothed her daughter Lavinia to Turnus, whose interest she favoured, before the arrival of Æneas in Italy; and when her daughter was given in marriage to Æneas, she hung herself to avoid the sight of her son-in-law.

AMATHUS, ă-mai'-thus, or ăm'-a-thus, a city on the southern side of the island of Cyprus, especially dedicated to Venus. The island is sometimes called Amathusia. Amathus is now named Limmesol, or Limmesol antica.

AMATI, Andrea and Antonio, a-ma'-te, father and son, eminent as violin-makers. Their instruments are called Cremonas, from their having their residence and carrying on their business in that town. Andrea lived in the 16th, and Antonio in the 17th century.

AMATLAN, a-mat'-tlan, a district of Central America, with a rich and fertile soil. Cochineal is produced here. 20 miles from Guatemala.

AMATO, a-ma'-to, a distinguished Jewish physician, who had the honour of being called from Ancona to Rome to attend Pope Julius III. B. at Castle Branco, Beira, Portugal, 1511. The time of his death is unknown.

AMATO, Giovanni Antonio d', one of the best of the Neapolitan painters. He possessed the venerative faculty in a high degree, and carried his sentiments of propriety so far as to consider it wrong to paint a woman in a state of even partial nudity. B. at Naples, 1475; D. 1555.

AMATRICI, a-ma-tre'-che, a town of Naples, 22 miles from Aquila. Pop. 5,000, chiefly engaged in the manufacture of woollens.

AMAURI I., a-maw'-re, king of Jerusalem, succeeded his brother Baldwin III in 1163. D. 1174.—He was a courageous and enterprising prince; but these qualities were sullied by avarice and cruelty.

AMAURI II., king of Jerusalem, succeeded his brother Guy de Lusignan in 1194. His title was contested by Isabella, second daughter of Amauri I.; but on her becoming a widow, he married her, and was crowned. The Saracens having taken his capital, he applied for assistance to the European princes; but before the succours arrived, he died, in 1205.

AMAURY DE CHARTRES, a-maw'-re, a French visionary, who maintained the eternity of matter, and that religion has three epochs, agreeably to the three persons of the Trinity. His opinions were condemned by the council of Paris in 1209, and some of his followers were burned. To avoid a similar fate, he renounced his errors, and retired to St. Martin des Champs, where he died of vexation. Lived in the 13th century.

AMAXAMPEUS, ă-măx'-ăm-pe-us, a fountain of Scythia, whose waters embitter the stream of the river Hypanis.

AMAXICHI, a'-maks-e'-che, a seaport town and capital of Santa Maura, or Leucadia, one of the Ionian islands. It is separated from the castle of Santa Maura by a lagoon a mile wide. Here an English governor and a Greek bishop reside. Pop. town and citadel, 6,300.

AMAZIAH, ă-mă-zi'-a, king of Judah, succeeded his father Joash at the age of 25. He blended idolatry with the worship of God. With the assistance of the Israelites, he defeated the Edomites in the Valley of Salt; but afterwards commenced war on his allies, by whom he was taken prisoner. Slain by his own subjects, 810 B.C.

AMAZON, MARANON, or ORELLANA, ă'-ma-zon, the largest river in the world, rising in the Andes, South America, traversing the entire breadth of the continent, from west to east, and falling into the North Atlantic Ocean at about Lon. 50° W. Ext. About 4,000 miles, draining an area, according to some authorities, of two millions and a half, and according to others, of one million and a half of square miles. It is 96 miles wide at its mouth, is navigable for 2,200 miles from the sea, forms during its course many islands in itself, receives nearly 200 other rivers, many of which have a course of 500 or 600 leagues, and, in pouring itself into the ocean, repels the waters of the sea to the distance of 300 miles from the land.—The mouth of the Amazon was discovered in 1500, by Viscount Yanez Pinçon, a companion of Columbus. The first European who made the descent of its stream was Francis d'Orellana, a Spaniard, who, in 1539, sailed from the Rio Nasso to its mouth.

AMAZONIA, ăm'-az-o'-ne-a, the country of the Amazons, near the Caspian Sea.

AMAZONES, or AMAZONIDES, ăm-az'-o-nes, ăm-a-zon'-e-des (Amazons), a nation of famous women, who lived near the river Thermodon, in Cappadocia. All their life was employed in wars and manly exercises. Their right breast was burnt off, that they might hurl a javelin with more force, and make a better use of the bow; from that circumstance, therefore, their name is derived (a, 'non,' maza, 'mamma'). They founded an extensive empire in Asia Minor, along the shores of the Euxine Sea, and near the Thermodon. Themyscyra was the capital of their country. They were conquered by Bellerophon and Hercules. Among their queens, Hippolyte, Antiope, Lampeto, and Marpesia, are the most famous.

AMAZONIUS, ă-ma-zo'-ne-us, a surname of Apollo at Lacedæmon.

AMBALAGA, am-ba'-la-ga, a town in the island of Madura, Indian Archipelago. Pop. 4,000.

AMBARVALIA, ăm-bar-vai'-le-a, processions round the ploughed fields, in honour of Ceres, the goddess of corn, celebrated by the Romans, one in April, the other in July. They went three times round their fields crowned with oak leaves, singing hymns to Ceres, and entreating her to preserve their corn. The word is derived ab ambiendis arvis, i.e. going round the fields. A sow, a sheep, and a bull, called ambarvalice hostiæ, were afterwards immolated, and the sacrifice has sometimes been called suovetaurilia, from sus, ovis, and taurus.

AMBATIKI, am'-ba-te-ke, an island in the South Pacific, of the Feejee group. Pop. 500. Lat. 17° 47′ S. Lon. 179° 11′ W.—It attains an elevation of 750 feet, in the form of a dome.

AMBATO, am-ba'-to, a town, near the foot of Mount Chimborazo, 8,859 feet above the level of the sea. Pop. 13,000.

AMBAZAC, am-ba'-zak, a town and parish of France, 10 miles from Limoges. Pop. 3,000, principally engaged in the manufacture of iron wire. Lat. 39° 48′ N. Lon. 22° 36′ E.

AMBELAKIA, am-be-la'-ke-a, a large town of Thessaly, situate in the vale of Salympria, the ancient Peneus. It carries on a flourishing trade in dyeing red Turkish yarn. Pop. 4,000.

AMBERG, am'-berg, a walled city of Bavaria, and formerly the capital of what was the Upper Palatinate. It stands on the river Vils, which runs through its centre, dividing it into the upper and lower towns. The houses are mostly of wood, but well built, and the streets broad and clean. In the principal square are the town-house, an old Gothic building, the magnificent parish church of St. Martin, adorned with valuable paintings, monuments, and other curiosities. The town has an academy and lyceum; also a well-endowed hospital, and several religious houses. The other public buildings are the Castle, Arsenal, government buildings, and the Mint, which is considered one of the finest buildings of the kind in Germany. Manf. Fire-arms, earthenware, tobacco, iron, and woollen and linen fabrics. It has also some breweries, besides a great repository for salt. Pop. 11,000. Lat. 49° 27′ N. Lon. 11° 50′ E.—Near Amberg the Austrians defeated the French in 1796.

AMBERGATE, ăm'-ber-gait, a small town of Derbyshire, and the junction of the Midland and the Ambergate and Rowsley railways.

AMBERGER, Christoph, am-bair'-ger, a distinguished German painter, some of whose copies pass for originals of Holbein. B. at Nurnberg, 1490; D. 1568-9.

AMBERGRIS KEY, ăm'-ber-gris, an island in the Bay of Honduras, 30 miles from Belize. It is about 20 miles long and 3 broad. Lat. 18° 50′ N. Lon. 87° 48′ W.

AMBERT, am'-bair, a town of France, on the Dore, in the department of the Puy-de-Dôme, and 36 miles from Clermont. Manf. Woollen stuffs, ribbons, lace, linens, needles, pins, and playing-cards. From 50 to 60 mills are employed in making fine printing-paper, and the principal market for Auvergne cheeses is held in this town. Pop. about 4,000.

AMBIORIX, ăm-bi'-o-rix, a king of the Eburones, in Gaul. He was a great enemy to Rome, and was killed in a battle with Cæsar, in which 60,000 of his countrymen were slain.

AMBLESIDE, ăm'-bel-side, an old and irregularly built market-town and chapelry of Westmoreland. Manf. Chiefly woollens. Pop. 1,500.—This town is beautifully situate at the northern extremity of Lake Windermere, and many Roman remains have, from time to time, been found in it.

AMBLETEUSE, am'-bel-tu(r)z, a small maritime town of France, 5 miles from Boulogne-sur-mer, in the department Pas-de-Calais. Pop. 600.—It was here that James II. landed when he fled from England in 1689. It was here also that Napoleon I. collected his flat-bottomed boats for the invasion of England, in 1804.

AMBOISE, am'-bwawse, a town of France, at the confluence of the Amasse and Loire, 12 miles from Tours. It stands at the foot of a hill on the summit of which there is an ancient fortress, the site of which is said to have been chosen by Julius Cæsar for the erection of a fort. The town, though well built, presents, on the whole, a dull appearance. Manf. Woollens, druggets, bombazines, steel, rasps, and files. Its commerce is considerable in vinegar, brandy, and wine. Pop. 5,000.—This town has an historical interest, from its castle being that in which the Huguenots implicated in what is known as the conspiracy of Amboise met their doom. It was here too, some say, that the Calvinists, in 1568, were first called Huguenots, a term which, though applied to them contemptuously, signifies only confederates. The town and neighbourhood suffered severely in 1856 from the inundation caused by the overflowing of the Loire, which burst over its banks and dikes, carrying destruction everywhere.—It is a station on the Orleans Railway.

AMBOISE, George d', a cardinal, who became successively bishop of Montauban, archbishop of Narbonne, and lastly of Rouen. Louis XII. made him prime-minister, and he soon acquired great popularity, by taking off the taxes which had usually been levied on the people at the accession of every new monarch. Subsequently to this he was appointed the pope's legate in France, with the dignity of cardinal, and in that capacity, effected a considerable reform among the religious orders. B. 1460; D. 1510.—D'Amboise was one of the wisest statesmen France ever had. He reformed the church, purified the courts of justice, remitted the burdens of the people, and conscientiously laboured to promote the public happiness.

AMBOISE, Frances d', the wife of Peter II., duke of Brittany, who treated her with great brutality, which she bore with meekness. She distinguished herself by effecting a reformation in the manners of the Bretons. On the death of the duke, in 1457, she was solicited in marriage by the prince of Savoy, but refused the offer, and retired into a monastery, where she died in 1485.

AMBOOR, am'-boor, a town and district of Hindostan, in the territory of Arcot, 108 miles from Madras. Lat. 12° 51′ N. Lon. 78° 50′ E.

AMBOYNA, or AMBOINA, ăm-boi'-na, an island in the Eastern seas, the chief of the Moluccas, the others being dependent on its jurisdiction. Ext. 30 miles long and 10 broad at its widest part, but generally it is not more than 5 or 6 miles broad. Area, 282 square miles. Desc. This island is composed of two peninsulas, called Hittoo and Leitimor, joined by the narrow isthmus Bagoovala, which is not more than 2 miles across. It is in general hilly, but the verdure is rich and the vegetation vigorous. Water is plentiful, although the streams are small. Pro. The great production of Amboyna is the clove-tree, which has been carefully cultivated for centuries. The cloves are collected twice a year; the average quantity produced in the island exceeds 600,000 lb.; in some years it amounts to a million. Coffee is plentiful, and the soil and climate are well adapted for the culture of indigo, which is produced of a very fine quality. The sagotree flourishes, and supplies the inhabitants with a wholesome article of diet. Cotton and cinnamon are also successfully cultivated. Animals. Deer and wild boars are found in the woods; there are few sheep, and still fewer black cattle, scarcely enough being reared to supply the European part of the population. Buffaloes, horses, and goats are kept; but of the domesticated animals none, except hogs, are indigenous to the country. Birds, though not numerous in point of species, are abundant, whilst insects of the most brilliant hues are everywhere to be seen. Climate. Healthy, and more agreeable than the generality of intertropical situations. Pop. between 30,000 and 40,000; comprising the aboriginal Malay race, Chinese, and Europeans. Lat. 3° 46′ S. Lon. 127° 59′ E.—In 1515 this island was discovered by the Portuguese, who, in 1564, took possession of it, and introduced the Roman Catholic religion. In 1605 the Dutch expelled the Portuguese, and introduced Protestantism, and in 1615 the English made an unsuccessful attempt to share in their conquest. They contrived, however, to keep a factory here until 1622, when the Dutch governor, by unexampled treachery, got the whole members of it into his power, and put them to death by the most cruel tortures. Amboyna, after having enjoyed a long period of undisturbed repose, was conquered by a British force under Admiral Rainier, in 1796. It was restored on the peace of Amiens in 1801, and in February, 1810, was recaptured, during the war. The island was, in 1814, again ceded to Holland by the treaty of Paris.

AMBOYNA, or AMBOINA, a town, the capital of the above island, is situate in the peninsula of Leitimor, in a deep bay, which, at the site of the town, is 2 miles across, with deep water. It is of a triangular form, and is clean, neat, and regularly built. Pop. about 9,000. Lat. 3° 41′ 7″ S. Lon. 128° 10′ E.

AMBOYNA, BAY OF, about 20 miles long, and from 2 to 7 broad, with a depth of water of from 20 to 25 fathoms close up to the jetty of Amboyna, on which vessels discharge their cargo.

AMBROZES, ăm-bo'-zes, three small islands on the coast of Benin. Lat. 4° 15′ N.

AMBRACIA, ăm-brai'-she-a, a city of Epirus, near the Acheron, the residence of King Pyrrhus. Augustus, after the battle of Actium, called it Nicopolis.

AMBRACIUS SINUS, ăm-brai'-she-us si'-nus, a bay of the Ionian Sea, near Ambracia, about 35 miles long, narrow at the entrance, but, within, about 12 miles in breadth.

AMBRONES, ăm-bro'-nes, certain nations of Gaul, who subsisted by rapine and plunder. They were conquered by Marius.

AMBROSE, ST., ăm'-brose, the son of a prefect of Gaul, who became archbishop of Milan, and governor of Liguria and Æmilia. On the death of Auxentius, archbishop of Milan, in 374, and after a contest between the Arians and Catholics, he was consecrated bishop. In 383 he was deputed by the emperor Valentinian to prevail upon the tyrant Maximus not to enter Italy, and was successful in his mission. Subsequently, however, Maximus entered Italy, made himself master of the Western empire, and entered Milan in triumph. Valentinian sought refuge with Theodosius, who defeated Maximus, and restored the fugitive monarch to his throne. While Theodosius was in Italy, an insurrection arose in Thessalonica, in which the emperor's lieutenant was slain. Theodosius in revenge put to death a vast number of persons in cold blood. Soon after this massacre, he came to Milan, and was about to enter the great church, when he was met on its threshold by Ambrose, who refused him admittance as a homicide; and it was not till a year afterwards, and his showing tokens of repentance, that the prelate would admit him to Christian communion. B. at Milan, 340; D. 397.—The best edition of the works of St. Ambrose is that of Paris, in 2 vols. folio, 1691. He composed that noble hymn, "Te Deum laudamus."

AMBROSE, Isaac, a nonconformist divine, who, on the breaking out of the civil wars, quitted the Church of England, took the Covenant, and became a Presbyterian preacher, first at Garstang, and afterwards at Preston. B. in Lancashire; D. 1674.—His works are much esteemed by the Calvinists, particularly one entitled "Looking unto Jesus."

AMBROSIA, ăm-bro'-she-a, festivals held in honour of Bacchus, in some cities in Greece, the same as the Brumalia of the Romans.—The food of the gods was called ambrosia, and their drink nectar. The word signifies immortal. It had the power of bestowing immortality on all who ate it. It was sweeter than honey, and of a most odoriferous smell. Berenice, Tithonus, and others, were rendered immortal by eating it. It had also the power of healing wounds. Apollo, in Homer's Iliad, saves Sarpedon's body from putrefaction by rubbing it with ambrosia; and Venus heals the wounds of her son, in Virgil's Æneid, with the same.

AMBROSIUS AURELIANUS, ăm-bro'-se-us aw-re'-le-ai'-nus, king of the Britons. About A.D. 457 he came from Armorica, to assist in expelling the Saxons, who had been invited over by Vortigern. On the death of that monarch, the sovereignty was vested in him, and he maintained the dignity with credit. The famous king Arthur was brought up under him. D. at Winchester, 508.

AMBRYSSUS, ăm-bris'-us, a city of Phocis, so called from a hero of the same name. It was situate in a country which abounded in a plant producing a scarlet dye, by means of an insect which was found in its berries. This city was destroyed by the Amphictyons, and rebuilt and fortified by the Thebans before the battle of Chæronea. It was taken by Quintius Flaminius in the Macedonian war, and its ruins may be seen near the village of Dystomo.

AMBUBAJÆ, ăm-bu-bai'-je, dissolute women of Syria, resembling the dancing-girls of eastern nations, who were in the habit of attending the festivals and public assemblies of Rome as minstrels. Their name is derived either from the Syriac word abub, signifying a flute, or from am, round, and Baiæ, the place which they generally frequented.

AMBULLI, ăm-bul'-i, a surname of Castor and Pollux, n Sparta.

AMEILHON, Hubert Pascal, a'-mail-hawng, a Frenchman who was the means of saving many valuable libraries, amounting in all to 800,000 volumes, during the revolutionary triumph of the populace of Paris. He was also a considerable contributor to periodical literature, and wrote a work entitled "The History of the Commerce and Navigation of the Egyptians under the Ptolemies."—B. 1730; D. 1811.

AMELES, ăm'-e-les, a river of hell, whose waters no vessel could contain.

AMELIA, ă-me'-le-a, a county of Virginia, U.S. Pop. 10,594; slaves, 7,186. At the court-house is a post village, 58 miles S.W. of Richmond.

AMELIA, an island in the Atlantic, on the coast of East Florida, 7 leagues N. of St. Augustine, at the mouth of St. Mary's river. Lat. 30° 28′ N. It is 13 miles long and 2 broad. Its chief town is Fernandina.

AMENANUS, ăm'-e-nai-nus, a river of Sicily, near Mount Ætna, now Judicello.

AMENOCLES, ă-men'-o-kles, a Corinthian, said to be the first Grecian who built a three-oared galley at Samos and Corinth.

AMERBACH, John, a'-mer-bak, a Swiss printer of Basil, who was the first to make use of the Roman type instead of the Gothic and Italian. D. 1515. His son John was professor of law at Basil, and syndic of that city: he was the intimate friend of Erasmus, and died in 1562, aged 67.

AMERCATE, or OMERKOTE, a'-mer-kat, a celebrated fortress in the desert of Scinde, India, where the emperor Akbar was born, in 1542. It formerly contained treasure of the ameers of Scinde, who, in 1813, took it from the rajah of Joudpoor. Lat. 25° 22′ N. Lon. 69° 47′ E.

AMERIA, ă-mer'-e-a, an ancient town of Umbria, S.W. of Spoletum, the birthplace of Sextus Roscius. Its low and moist valleys were famous for willow-trees.

AMERICA, ă-mer'-e-ka, one of the great divisions of the earth, and, with the exception of Asia, the largest. It is bounded on the E. by the North and South Atlantic Ocean, which separates it from Africa and Europe; and on the W. by the North and South Pacific Ocean, which separates it from Asia and Australia. From Asia, however, it is divided only by Behring's Straits, not more than 48 miles wide at their narrowest part. This vast continent consists of two peninsulas and a central part, named, respectively, North and South, and Central America; and as Africa is joined to Asia by a narrow neck of land, called the Isthmus of Suez, so the two great divisions, N. and S. of this continent, are connected by the Isthmus of Panama or Darien, which, at its narrowest part, is only 28 miles in width. Its average width, however, is about 40 miles. Ext. The length of America cannot be accurately ascertained; but taking it from Point Barrow, in the N., to Cape Horn, it is over 10,000 miles. Its greatest breadth S. of the equator is between Cape St. Roque, in Brazil, and Cape Parina, in Peru, where it is over 3,250 miles. Its greatest breadth N. of the equator is between Cape Canso, in Nova Scotia, and Cape Look-out, where it is more than 3,100 miles. Area, including its islands, nearly 16,000,000 square miles. Coast. With the exception of Europe, the most extended of any of the great divisions of the globe. Physical Features. In America, nature appears on the grandest scale of magnificence and sublimity. Whether we regard her mountains, cataracts, rivers, lakes, forests, or plains, she is distinguished by a vastness unapproached in any other part of the globe. Out of the 270 active volcanoes, the estimated number on the face of the earth, 190 are on the shores and islands of America; and although, in height, some of the peaks of the Asiatic Himalayas surpass those of the Andes, in extent the range of the former is inferior to that of the latter. Pop. about 60,000,000, islands inclusive. Lat. extending from 55° S. to 80° N. ISLANDS. In the ARCTIC OCEAN, the principal are Greenland, Iceland, Cockburn, Southampton, Melville, Bathurst, and Cornwallis. In the ATLANTIC, Newfoundland, Prince Edward's, Cape Breton; the West Indies, composed of the Bahamas; the Bermudas; the Great Antilles, consisting of Cuba, Hayti, or St. Domingo, Jamaica, and Porto Rico; the Lesser Antilles, comprehending the Leeward and Windward Islands. The principal of the former are the Virgin Islands, Dominica, and Guadaloupe; of the latter, Martinique, Barbadoes, Trinidad, Antigua, and Falkland. In the PACIFIC, the Patagonian archipelago, of which Wellington is the largest; Chiloe, Juan Fernandez, Galapagos, Vancouver's, Queen Charlotte's, Prince of Wales, Sitka, and the Aleutian Islands. In the ANTARCTIC OCEAN, Terra del Fuego (the land of fire), Staten, Desolation; S. Georgia, S. Orkneys, S. Shetlands, Graham Land, and Trinity Land. With the exception of Greenland, which has been considered as part of the continent, and Iceland, which has sometimes been given to Europe, the islands of the Arctic and Antarctic oceans are uninhabited. The S. Shetlands have the lowest known volcano, it being not more than 80 feet high, and the West-India islands are the most volcanic and mountainous. Pop. of islands, about 3,500,000.—We will now speak of North, Central, and South America separately.

AMERICA, NORTH. This division, although, on the whole, exhibiting a greater degree of irregularity in its form than that of the South, is more uniform in its width, and consequently has a larger surface. Area, 9,500,000 square miles. Coast-line. About 4,800 miles, from Hudson's Straits to the Florida channel, and thence to Panama 4,500. The whole length on the side of the Pacific to Behring's Straits, inclusive of the Gulf of California, has been estimated at 10,500 miles. Of the extent of the N. and N.E. shores no calculation can be made with accuracy; but it may be taken at not less than 3,000 miles. Thus the whole coast-line of North America may be computed at about 22,800 miles. Such an immense extent of coast renders this division favourable for commerce, whilst the irregularity of its form produces the peninsulas of Aliaska and California on the W., and Yucatan, Florida, Nova Scotia, and Labrador on the E. Capes. The principal are Point Barrow, the most northern; Bathurst, Farewell, Chudleigh, Charles, Breton, Race, Sable, Cod, Hatteras, Tancha or Sable, Catoche, Gracias á Dios, and St. Antonio, on the N. and E.; on the W. Corrientes, St. Lucas, Mendocino, and Prince of Wales, which is the most western point. Straits. Davis's, Barrow's, Hudson's, Belleisle, Bahama Channel, Windward Passage, Mona Passage, on the N. and W.; and Behring's Straits, which separate N. America from Asia, as already observed. Bays, Gulfs, Seas, and Inlets. Baffin's Bay, Hudson's Bay, with James's Bay and Chesterfield Inlet; the Gulf of St. Lawrence, Bay of Fundy, Delaware Bay, Chesapeake Bay, the Gulf of Mexico, and the Bay of Campeachy; the Carribean Sea, the Bay of Honduras, on the N. and E.; on the W. the Bay of Panama, the Gulf of California, Queen Charlotte's Sound, and Behring's Sea, or Sea of Kamchatka. On account of nearly all the seas of this division being on the E. side, and their tidal currents travelling west, they are much higher than the inland seas of the Old World, such as the Baltic and Mediterranean, which open to the W. In the Bay of Fundy the tide rises 70 feet, which is higher than any other known. The Carribean Sea and the Gulf of Mexico have been collectively denominated the Colombian Mediterranean; and Hudson's and Baffin's bays, the Arctic Mediterranean. Desc. North America may be regarded as a vast central valley, bounded on the N. by an extensive system of lakes, on the S. by the Gulf of Mexico, on the W. by the Rocky Mountains, and on the E. by the Alleghanies, and drained by the mighty Mississippi. In this valley the most luxuriant vegetation is to be found, stretching from the shores of the Gulf of Mexico on the S. to the banks of the great lakes and the Gulf of St. Lawrence on the N.; whilst towards the bases of the western boundary are vast steppes, or plains, destitute of trees, and desolate, dreary, and uninviting by their very immensity. During the summer heats these are burned to a melancholy brown; vegetation is scorched and shrivelled up as a thin piece of leather touched with fire; whilst during the winter, they are swept by the winds of the Rocky Mountains to such a degree as to render their atmosphere so intensely cold as scarcely to be borne. Along the base of these mountains a series of sandy deserts, with an average breadth of from 400 to 600 miles, stretch to the 41st degree of N. latitude. Towards the mouth of the Mississippi there are marshes covering a space of 35,000 square miles. In the valley itself occur extensive elevated prairies or savannahs, as treeless as they are boundless to the view—in some places waving with long grass in the spring, and painted with beautiful flowers, exhaling an ineffable perfume; in others destitute of vegetation, stricken with a hideous sterility; so that they may be traversed for days without a shrub being seen, except on the banks of the wandering streams by which they are watered. Notwithstanding the advances which civilization has made in this valley, immense tracts, estimated in the aggregate at from 600 to 800 square miles, are still covered with primeval woods; with all these drawbacks, however, millions of acres of the richest and most fertile land still remain waiting the culture of man to yield him subsistence. Mountains. The Rocky Mountains, the Alleghany or Appalachian, the Cordilleras of Mexico and Guatemala, the Ozark, and the Californian or Maritime range. The Rocky Mountains stretch along the west coast at a distance varying from 50 to 300 miles from the sea, and in Mounts Hooker and Brown attain respectively an elevation of 15,700 feet and 16,000 feet above the level of the sea. This range terminates at the Frozen Ocean, on the west side of the Mackenzie river; its whole length being not less than 8,700 miles. The Allegnany range stretches along the east coast, with a mean elevation of 2,500 feet, and in four separate groups, traversing the country, generally from a north-east to a south-west direction. The group known as the White Mountains belongs to this chain, of which Mount Washington ascends to the height of 6,620 feet, which is the loftiest point of the entire system. This range is about 1,200 miles in length, beginning at about the 34th degree N. lat., and terminating at the banks of the St. Lawrence. The Ozark Mountains are a branch of the Rocky Mountains, crossing the Arkansas, and appearing, under that name, in the state of Missouri. Their general direction is parallel to that of the Alleghanies, on the west side of the continent. The Californian or Maritime chain lies to the west of the Rocky Mountains, and is connected with them by a remarkable table-land, named by its explorers the Great Basin. This country may, even up to this time, be emphatically pronounced the unknown. It is the land of salt lakes, the largest of which lies at an elevation of 4,220 feet above the level of the sea, and the territory occupies 130,000 square miles. This saline solitude is almost entirely uninhabited, and not one of the rivers by which it is watered finds its way to the sea. This is the character of the plateau which, with transverse ridges, amongst which are the Snowy Mountains, connects the Rocky Mountains with the Californian Maritime Alps, wherein Mounts Hood, Fairweather, and St. Elias, lift their heads respectively to the heights of 12,000, 14,700, and 18,000 feet above the level of the sea. The general height of this range far exceeds that of the Rocky Mountains. Mount Elias is the culminating point of North America, and is situate in Russian America, in the 60th degree of N. latitude. The Mexican and Guatemala Cordilleras may be regarded as a continuation of the Andes of South America, and in Orizaba and Popocatapetl attain respectively an elevation of 17,400 and 17,700 feet above the sea-level. Volcanoes. In no other part of the globe are these terrific phenomena so appalling as in the New World. In Guatemala, Agua burns at 15,000 feet above the level of the sea; in Mexico, Popocatapetl (smoky mountain), at 17,700 feet; and in the Maritime range, St. Elias at 18,000 feet. In the mountains of Guatemala there are 38 volcanoes, in Mexico 6, in Aliaska 4, in the Aleutian islands 32; whilst in the West-India islands of St. Vincent, Guadaloupe, and St. Kitt's, others exist in activity. With the exception of Java, there is no more powerful volcanic agency in the world than that which is found in the Aleutian islands and Mexico. What they generally eject are scoriæ and ashes, in place of lava, which probably, from their great height, becomes partially solid before it reaches the mouths of their craters. Rivers. The Mississippi (great river), and its tributaries the Missouri (mud river), which receives the Yellow-stone and the Platte; the Arkansas, which receives the Red River; and the Illinois and Ohio, which receives the Tenessee. These drain the great plain or valley of the Mississippi. The Mackenzie, with its tributaries Peace River and Athabasca, the Coppermine and the Back. These run north. The St. Lawrence, with its tributary the Ottawa; the Nelson, with its tributary the Saskatchawan; and the Churchill, with its tributary the Beaver. These run east. The St. John, the Hudson, the Delaware, and the Susquehana drain the country east of the Alleghanies; the Rio del Norte (river of the north) drains the country east of the Mexican mountains; the Oregon or Columbia, with its tributary the Snake, and the Colorado (coloured), and the Sacramento, the country west of the Rocky Mountains. The Frazer takes its course through British Columbia. The Mississippi is the second largest river in the world, notwithstanding that the Missouri is the main stream, and has a course considerably more than a thousand miles longer than has the Mississippi proper, from its source to the sea. The basin of the Mississippi and its tributaries comprises about 1,400,000 square miles, and its delta is nothing more than an immense marsh or swamp, as we have already said, covered with reeds and infested with alligators. It is navigable to nearly 3,000 miles from the sea. The St. Lawrence, at Montreal, has a breadth of 3 or 4 miles, and its length from the lower extremity of Lake Ontario to the sea is about 700 miles. For ships of the line it is navigable as far as Quebec, and for vessels of 600 tons as far as Montreal. It has been estimated that the basin of this river, including the lakes whence it flows, contains more than the half of the fresh water on the earth. Lakes. The largest in the world. The principal are Superior, Huron, Michigan, Erie, Great Slave Lake, Winnipeg, Great Bear Lake, Ontario, Lake Champlain, Little Winnipeg, Deer Lake, Athabasca, Lake of the Woods, and the Great Salt Lake. Lakes Superior, Huron, and Michigan, may be considered to form, in fact, but one lake, as they are all connected, and include by far the largest body of fresh water on the globe. Between lakes Ontario and Erie are the celebrated Niagara Falls, the greatest cataract in the world. The latest estimated sizes of the American lakes are thus given. The greatest length of Lake Superior is 335 miles; breadth 160 miles; mean depth, 988 feet; elevation, 627 feet; area, 32,000 square miles. Greatest length of Michigan is 360 miles; breadth, 108 miles; mean depth, 900 feet; elevation, 687 feet; area, 20,000 square miles. Greatest length of Huron is 200 miles; breadth, 160 miles; mean depth, 300 feet; elevation, 574 feet; area, 20,000 square miles. Greatest length of Erie is 250 miles; breadth, 80 miles; mean depth, 200 feet; elevation, 555 feet; area, 6,000 square miles. Greatest length of Ontario is 180 miles; breadth, 65 miles; mean depth, 500 feet; elevation, 262 feet; area, 6,000 square miles. The total length of these five is 1,534 miles, covering an area altogether of upwards of 90,000 square miles. Forests. The most extensive on the globe, some of them covering an area of 60,000 square miles, distinguished by the height and variety of the trees of which they are composed, and in some cases, by the dazzling beauty of the flowers with which they are adorned. Within the tropics, palms and tree ferns spread out their sheltering foliage, where the mahogany, logwood, and other dye-trees attain perfection. In the United States, the sycamore, black walnut, chestnut, maple, hickory, white cedar, red birch, wild cherry, locust-tree, oak, and ash abound; whilst the tulip-tree, the pride of the American forest, attains the highest perfection. The woods of Canada consist principally of pines and birches, oaks and ashes, the red beech, the hickory, and the tall Canadian poplar. Penetrating the Arctic regions, the flora of America, like that of other high latitudes, becomes less and less abundant, more stinted in growth, until almost every trace of vegetation is buried beneath a sheet of perpetual snow. Not a single heath is indigenous to America, whilst the cactus is peculiar to it. Wild Animals. These consist of polar and grizzly bears, the puma, wolf, fox, and Newfoundland dog; the beaver, racoon, and other fur animals; the elk, the bison, musk-ox, moose-deer, and rein-deer; the big-horned sheep, and the goat of the Rocky Mountains. The grizzly bear (Ursus ferox) is the most formidable of all the animals of N. America, ranging from Mexico as far north as the 61st degree of latitude. The bison, or American buffalo, is the largest native quadruped of the New World, and may be considered as the monarch of the prairie lands of the Rocky Mountains, where his species is to be seen in herds of 10,000. The musk-ox roams over the sterile tracts which lie N. of the 60th parallel, and several species of deer browse among the barren valleys and brown hills of the mountain districts. The Rocky Mountain goat, like the chamois of the Alps, inhabits the most inaccessible heights of its native region, and the Rocky Mountain sheep is much larger than the largest varieties of the domestic breeds. The wolf of America is a fierce animal, running down and devouring deer, and if severely pressed with hunger, even breaking into huts and destroying the dogs. The prairie wolf hunts in packs, and is an animal of great speed. The dogs of America are now domesticated, and the most remarkable among them are the Newfoundland and the Mackenzie River dog, a small, slight, and affectionate animal. All the other kinds are both big and fierce. Foxes abound, and the American red fox supplies England annually with about 8,000 skins. Beavers, otters, racoons, hares, marmots, squirrels, opossums, musk-rats, and porcupines are all to be found, and are more or less sought after by the inhabitants as objects of pleasure or profit. With the exception of bears, the beasts of prey are neither many nor formidable. Birds. These are extremely numerous. There are in N. America nearly 500 species of birds, and of these nearly 400 are peculiar to the country. Eagles, hawks, and owls are plentiful; turkeys abound in the woods, and the passenger pigeon flies in such flocks as to darken the country over which they pass. These flocks are seen about a mile in width and 200 miles in length. When they alight on the trees, the branches crack beneath their weight, and thousands of them may be knocked down without difficulty. Their breeding-places have been found to consist of about 40 square miles of forests. Reptiles. Numerous, especially in the United States, and some of them dangerous. The most noted is the rattle-snake, whose bite is fatal to man and beast, unless a remedy is immediately applied. The hog is the only animal which is not injured by the bite of this reptile, and which feeds upon them. The pike-muzzled cayman is a native of the southern states, and haunts the Mississippi, and frogs and toads, measuring from 6 to 15 inches long, are abundant. Insects. In the tropical regions especially, almost every description of these appear in myriads. The mosquitoes are such intolerable pests that they greatly interfere with the happiness of the natives. In the back-woods of N. America, however, they are turned to some profitable account. The Indians set fire to the woods, and the bisons knowing that mosquitoes will not follow them where there is smoke, take shelter among the burning forests, where they become an easy prey to the hunts-man, who is lying in wait for them. Fish. Every description abounds along the coasts and in the rivers. In no part of the world are there to be found so many cod as to the E. of Cape Breton, and on the banks of Newfoundland. Domestic Animals. The same as in Europe. At the discovery of America there were no domestic animals except the lama; but since then the different varieties of the European kinds have been introduced, and are now common. Climate. Healthy and variable, according to latitude and locality. On account of the severity of the climate N. of 50°, the greater part of America is barren; but in other parts the temperature is generally lower than in corresponding latitudes in the Old World. Every variety of temperature, however, is to be found, in accordance with the difference of latitude and elevation. The temperate zone is often marked by sudden and violent changes, and the torrid by the extremes of wet and drought; but as this feature will be particularly noticed under the different countries composing the American continents, it is unnecessary to do more here than thus generally indicate the characteristics of the climate. Pro. Maize, or Indian corn, is the only important farinaceous plant peculiar to America, and it is extensively cultivated. All the European cerealia are largely produced; and millet, pimento, cocoa, vanilla, copaiba, sassafras, nux vomica, jalap, tobacco, and the cochineal plant and the potato, are indigenous. The native fruits are mostly of the nut kind; but apples, oranges, lemons, and peaches arrive at a high state of perfection. The vine and the tea-plant do not succeed, whilst cotton, sugar, and coffee are amongst the staple productions. The pine-apple is grown largely in fields, as we grow turnips, and great quantities of it are now regularly shipped to England. Minerals. Gold, silver, tin, copper, lead, iron, coal, and salt. Gold is produced in large quantities in Mexico and California, and in 1857 was discovered at the Frazer river, in British Columbia. Silver and precious stones are found in Mexico; copper in Mexico, Cuba, and the United States; lead, iron, and coal, in the United States and the British possessions; and salt in most countries. Race. The Aborigines, the Indian, or copper-coloured; the settlers, Circassian, from Europe; the Negro, from Africa; and the Esquimaux. The British and their descendants are found principally in the United States, Canada, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Newfoundland, and some of the West-India islands; the Spanish, in Mexico; the French, in Lower Canada, and along the banks of the lower Mississippi; the Negroes, in the southern states and the West Indies. A large portion of N. America is still possessed by the aboriginal tribes, comprising the N.W. parts of British America; the W. parts of the United States, and the N. parts of Spanish America. They are estimated to number about 500,000, and upwards of 300,000 of them are within the boundaries of the United States. Rel. Christianity amongst the Whites, and Fetishism among the Blacks. Most of the Indians are professedly Christians, but idolatry is largely mixed up with their religious rites. Political Divisions. The principal are the United States, British America, Russian America, and Mexico. The United States extend from the British possessions on the N. to the Gulf of Mexico on the S., and from the Pacific Ocean on the W. to the Atlantic on the E. British America comprises the Canadian provinces, Hudson's Bay territory, British Columbia, Vancouver's Island, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Cape Breton, Newfoundland, Prince Edward's Island, and the island of Anticosti. Russian America begins at the S. extremity of Prince of Wales Island, in Lat. 54° 40′ N., and about Lon. 132° W. All the American coast to the N. of this point, and all the islands off that coast, are recognized as Russian territory. Mexico is embraced between Lat. 15° 30′ and 34° 0′ N., and the boundaries of the Pacific Ocean on the W. and the Gulf of Mexico on the E. Under their several heads, however, these countries will be fully described. Pop. 44,000,000, islands inclusive. Lat. extending from 18° to 80° N. Lon. between 55° and 165° W.—In 1497, North America was discovered by Sebastian Cabot. The first part of it colonized by the English was Virginia, when, in 1607, James-town was built. New England was first settled in 1614. In 1620 the Puritans fled thither from England, and built New Plymouth, Boston, and other towns. Part of New York was settled by the Dutch in 1608. The Swedes arrived shortly after, and fixed themselves in another part; but they were both dispossessed in 1664 by the English. Pennsylvania was first settled by William Penn, in 1681; Maryland by Lord Baltimore in 1633; Carolina in 1670; and Georgia by General Oglethorpe in 1732. All these colonies, from New England in the N. to Georgia in the S., revolted from Great Britan in 1775, and the next year asserted their independence, which was conceded in 1783. Nova Scotia was settled by Sir William Alexander in the time of Charles I., but was soon afterwards sold to the French. It was taken again in 1654, but restored in 1662. It was again taken by Sir William Phipps in 1690, and ceded again to the French in 1697; in 1710, however, the English conquered it once more, and it was confirmed to them at the peace of Utrecht in 1714. Canada was taken possession of by the French in 1525; Quebec was fortified in 1608, and the whole territory conquered by the English in 1759, and it has been in their hands ever since.

AMERICA, CENTRAL, connects the two continents of N. and S. America, but its limits have not been exactly defined. Ext. 800 or 900 miles long, with a breadth varying from between 20 and 30 miles to 340 to 400. Area, 266,000 square miles. Desc. Mountainous and volcanic. Its whole length is traversed by a chain of mountains, which is connected with the Andes of S. and the Rocky Mountains of N. America. This chain divides itself into three groups; the Costa Rica, the Honduras and Nicaragua, and the Guatemala groups. The first traverses the Isthmus of Panama; the second is detached from the other by Lake Nicaragua and the river San Juan; and the third is remarkable as containing the largest number of active volcanoes to be found anywhere within the same space, with the exception of the island of Java. (See AMERICA, NORTH.) Rivers. These, though numerous, are in general small, from the narrowness of the territory in which they flow, and their courses rarely exceed 250 miles, and many of them are under 50. The Usumasinta, falling into the Gulf of Campeachy, is the largest. Lakes. The principal are Nicaragua, 100 miles long and 50 broad, the Leon or Managua, Golfo Doce, Golfete, Atitlan, Peten, Amatitlan, Guija, and Cojutepeque. Forests. Extensive and valuable. The woods of Panama are composed of 100 different kinds of trees, luxuriating in a hot, moist climate, destructive to animal life. Here grow the mahogany-tree, the lignum vitæ, and logwood; and here are obtained sarsaparilla, pimento, black or Peruvian balsam, vanilla, and various other drugs and gums of great value in a commercial point of view. Zoology.

The animals differ but little from those in some other parts of America. The manati, found at the mouth of the Rio Juan, and the winged squirrel are peculiar to it; and the most remarkable of the feathered tribes are its humming-birds. The quezel and the great macaw spread out their magnificent plumage of green and gold, and seem, beneath the rays of a tropical sun, as if they were created only to dazzle by the variety of their splendours. Serpents and insects abound, whilst along the coasts, and in the rivers and lakes, fish are plentiful. Climate. Owing to the inequality of the surface, this is exceedingly various. The dry season lasts from October to May, and the rest of the year is called the wet season, although it rains only during the night. Pro. In the higher table-lands all the European cereals, as well as fruits and vegetables, besides plantations of aloe, whence a spirituous liquor is distilled. In the warmer regions, maize, sugar-cane, mandioca, bananas, and all the kinds of tropical fruits. Indigo, tobacco, cotton, and cochineal are produced, and the sweet potato is cultivated to a considerable extent. Minerals. Gold, silver, iron, lead, and mercury are found. Jasper and marble are quarried in Honduras, and brimstone is collected near a volcano, called Quezaltenango. Salt is obtained in large quantities on the shores of the Pacific. Political Divisions. Central America was formerly composed of one federal state, but it is now divided into five republics and one kingdom. The republics are Guatemala, San Salvador, Honduras, Nicaragua, and Costa Rica; the kingdom is Mosquita. But the politically disturbed state in which these separate powers continually are, must, before long, induce other changes. The former confederacy existed till 1839, when it was dissolved. Pop. about 2,300,000, composed of Whites and Creoles, Mestizoes, or the offspring of Whites and Indians, and the aborigines. Lat. extending from about 7° to 18° N.—In 1502 Columbus visited the E. coast of this country, and in 1505 it was conquered by Pedro Alvarado, a distinguished officer of Cortes, the conqueror of Mexico. Since that time, down to 1823, it remained subject to Spain; but in that year it effected its independence, and formed itself into a federative government.—By the Isthmus of Panama a connection has been formed between the Atlantic and the Pacific oceans; but on account of the disturbed state of the country it has hitherto been of little general benefit. At present it is receiving a large amount of consideration from the government of the United States, as well as from those governments of the Old World whose commercial communications would be greatly facilitated by an easy mode of transit being effected between the two great oceans of the globe. (See PANAMA.)

AMERICA, SOUTH, may be viewed as an irregular triangle, with its apex pointing to the south. Area, about 7,000,500 square miles. Coast-line. On the side of the Carribean Sea and that of the Atlantic Ocean, this has been roughly estimated at 10,000 miles, and on that of the Pacific at 5,800. Thus its line of coast as a whole may be taken at about 16,000 miles. Capes. The principal are Del Norte, St. Roque, Branco, which is the most eastern point; Frio, St. Antonio, Corrientes, and Froward, the most southern on the continent; Horn and Pilares, in Terra del Fuego, and Blanco, on the west. The land stretches both further north and south in the New World than it does in the Old. Point Barrow is 72° N. and Cape Froward is 20° further south than Cape Agulhas, in Africa. Straits. Magellan's and the Straits of Le Maire. Gulfs and Bays. The gulfs of Darien, Maracaybo, and Para, on the E.; the Bay of Panama on the W. Desc. Mountainous in the west, wonderfully fertile in the basin of the Amazon, but barren towards the extreme south. Plains. These are called the La Plata and the plain of the Orinoco. In N. America, the treeless plains called prairies or savannahs, exhibit, in some parts, a boundless extent of grass, waving like a sea, and rising to the height of several feet. In the south these are called Llanos, and in Orinoco are alternately dry and wet, now baked by the sun as hard almost as burned bricks, and now covered with a luxuriant carpet of verdure vivified by the rains. At the 34th degree down to the 40th, they are called the Pampas of Buenos Ayres, and in more southern latitudes the Pampas of Patagonia. They have all the same or similar characteristics. Mountains. The Andes, the Guiana or Guayana, and the Brazilian, of which the principal chain is the Sierra do Espinhazo. The Andes extend from Cape Pilares, in the Straits of Magellan, where the high land begins to appear, northwards to the Isthmus of Panama or Darien, a distance of 4,180 miles in a straight line. Passing through this isthmus, they spread over the kingdom of New Spain, and continue their course through North America, under the name of the Rocky Mountains, until they reach the northern limits of the American coast on the Frozen Ocean. They are of no great width, but in elevation they rank next to the Himalayas of Asia. Their mean height has been estimated at 15,000 feet; but from all the ridges, mountainous summits arise to the prodigious height of 18,000 and 19,000 feet; and Chimborazo has been ascertained, by barometrical measurement, to attain the extraordinary elevation of 21,440 feet, equal to about four miles above the level of the sea. This, however, is not the loftiest peak. Illimani is 24,400, and Mount Sorata 25,400 feet. The Highlands of Guiana consist of a number of irregular groups running for 600 or 700 miles from E. to W., and separating the plains of the lower Orinoco from those of the Amazon and the Rio Negro. The highest points of this system are the Duida, 7,149, and Maravaca, 10,500 feet. The Brazilian mountains consist of two great ranges running parallel to the coast, and at no great distance from the sea. They throw out numerous branches, which stretch into the interior, and traverse the country in various directions. Volcanoes. There are 30 of these in S. America, all belonging to the Andes, and consisting of three separate and distinct series,—of Chili, of Quito, and of Peru and Bolivia. The highest of these is that of Gualatieri or Sehama, which is 22,000 feet, and is one of the Peru series. The heights of the others vary between 12,000 and 18,000 feet. Rivers. The principal are the Amazon or Maranon, with its affluents the Yavari, Purus, Madeira, Topajos, Xingu, and Tocantin, which receives the Araguay. All these flow into the right side of the stream. The Yapura and the Negro flow into the left, and they all take an eastern direction. The Rio de la Plata is formed by the Parana and the Uruguay. The Parana has a tributary in the Paraguay, which again receives the Vermejo and the Pilcomayo, the Salado, and the Colorado. All these have a south direction. The Orinoco, with its tributary the Casiquiare, the Magdalena, with its tributary the Canca, and the San Francisco, drain the vast portion of country lying to the north of the Great Plain. The Amazon is the largest river in the world, draining a basin of 2,500,000 square miles: the basin of the Rio de la Plata is 1,250,000 square miles. Lakes. Titicaca and Maracaybo may be considered as the only large lakes proper in S. America, the rest being rather swamps or morasses, instead of that clear body of water to which the name of lake is usually applied. Indeed, Maracaybo can hardly be called a lake, being rather an inlet from the Carribean Sea. Titicaca, however, covers an area of 4,000 square miles, and lies at an elevation of 12,795 feet above the level of the sea. It is situate on the N. W. frontier of Upper Peru. Besides these, there are various collections of water in the elevated valleys of the Andes, but none very large; and where the Paraguay overflows, between the 15th and 20th degree S., a body of water of some thousands of square miles is collected, and is called Lake Xarayes. Forests. The silva, the largest in the world. Regarding the woods generally of S. America, Humboldt observes, that they are so thick and uninterrupted in the plains between the Orinoco and the Amazon, that were it not for intervening rivers, the monkeys, almost the only inhabitants, might pass along the tops of the trees, for several hundred miles, without touching the earth. Wild Animals. The most remarkable are the jaguar, or American tiger, which in size and ferocity is little inferior to the Asiatic tiger; the cougar, which is not so thick and strong as the jaguar, but equally ferocious: the puma, or American lion, which is smaller than the lion of Africa; the spectacled bear, and the chinchilla, the panther, the leopard, the ounce, the lama, which is about four feet high and five or six feet long, the neck like that of the camel, to which the animal itself bears a strong resemblance, excepting the hunch on the back. The paco, or vicunna, is a species of animal subordinate to that of the lama, in the same degree as the ass is to the horse. Both the lama and the vicunna inhabit the most mountainous districts, and seem to be most vigorous and thriving where the climate is coldest. In addition to these, there is the tapir, the horse, armadillo, sloth, ant-eater, tiger-cat, lynx, and monkeys of every variety. The immense herds of wild horses and cattle which browse upon the Pampas and Llanos of S. America are the descendants of tame animals introduced by the Spaniards. Both were unknown there in the time of Columbus. Birds. The condor, harpy eagle, nandu or American ostrich, toucan, parrots, and humming-birds. The condor usually frequents the higher Andes, and for size and strength, combined with rapidity of flight and rapacity, takes pre-eminence over all the feathered creation. According to Humboldt, the size of this bird across the wings is nine feet, and its extreme length 3½ feet. Many of the birds which inhabit both the northern and southern parts of America are merely simple varieties of species that are found in Europe. Of this number are the geese, ducks, divers, plovers, herons, kites, falcons, blackbirds, pigeons, crows, partridges, and domestic fowls. Carrion vultures are very common, and fly in large flocks. They feed upon the numerous carcasses of cattle slaughtered for the sake of their hides. They are also found extremely useful in devouring snakes and other vermin. Of eagles there are various sorts. The nandu, which is found in the Pampas, has a long neck, small head, and the bill flattened like that of the ostrich; but in other respects it more resembles the cassowary. It runs with such swiftness, that the fleetest dogs are thrown out in its pursuit. In the tropical regions of America, it is impossible to enumerate the different species of birds, far less to give a distinct account of each, particularly of the beauty of their various plumage. Reptiles. The alligator, boa-constrictor, lizards, and turtles. Owing to the uncleared state of the country, America abounds in a variety of disagreeable reptiles. In the tropical regions this pest is most severely felt. Serpents of various kinds abound, particularly snakes. Of these, the most common, and, at the same time, the most poisonous, are the corales, or coral snakes, and the cascabeles, or rattle-snakes. There are also serpents of a larger species, similar to the boa-constrictor, found on several of the islands in the Indian Ocean. Insects. South America swarms with monstrous centipedes, spiders of an enormous size, scorpions, chigoes, a species of insect which insinuates itself into the legs, the soles of the feet, or toes, and pierces the skin with such subtlety that it is not perceptible until it has made its way into the flesh; flies of various sorts, mountain maggots, and bots of every species. Great varieties of butterflies, vying with each other in the richness of their colours, people the air; and the mosquito, which is a source of continual torment, abounds in most parts. Fish. The rivers are well stored with fish of every different species. The lakes of the Caraccas and Venezuela are inhabited by the electric eel, possessing the singular power of stunning its prey by an electric discharge. Domestic Animals. With the exception of the lama, the same as in Europe. Climate. Variable. In Peru, rain scarcely ever falls, and along the low parts of the tropical countries it is exceedingly unhealthy. On the coast of the Carribean Sea, yellow fever prevails, and frightful hurricanes sweep over the Pampas. The south of South America is both cold and dry, but as two-thirds of the peninsula lie within the tropics, it has a higher temperature than North America. Pro. Maize, rice, bread-fruit, plantain, yam, manioc, sugar-cane, cotton, cocoa, coffee, all-spice, pepper, Peruvian bark, jalap, indigo, vanilla, and ipecacuanha. Of these, rice, bread-fruit, and sugar-cane were introduced by Europeans; but from America the Old World has received maize, tobacco, all-spice, and the potato, with numerous trees and flowers; as the rhododendron, the American aloe, magnolias, dahlias, fuchsias, nasturtiums, and the passion-flower. Minerals. Gold, diamonds, and precious stones, from Brazil, Colombia, Chili, Peru, and Bolivia; silver from Bolivia, Chili, and La Plata; tin and mercury from Peru; and copper from Chili and Peru. Brazil supplies more diamonds than any other country in the world; but gold is now less plentiful than it is in California and Australia. Race. The Aborigines, Circassians, and Negroes. The Spanish prevail in Colombia, Bolivia, Chili, Peru, and La Plata; the Portuguese and the Negroes mostly in Brazil. Rel. Catholicism and Fetishism. Political Divisions. These consist of Colombia, now divided into the republics of New Grenada, Ecuador, and Venezuela; British, French, and Dutch Guiana; the republics of Peru, Bolivia, and Chili; the united provinces of La Plata, or Argentine Republic; the empire of Brazil, Paraguay, Banda Oriental, or Uruquay, Patagonia, Terra del Fuego, and the Falkland Islands. Pop. about 20,000,000. Lat. extending from 12° 30′ N. to 55° 59′ S. South America was discovered in 1498, on the third voyage of Christopher Columbus, who first landed at the mouth of the Orinoco. The name given to it is taken from that of Amerigo Vespucci, who, in 1499, visited the N. coast of South America, and on his return to Europe, published the first account of the newly-discovered countries. According to the authority of Humboldt, it is not true that this adventurer claimed the honour of being the first discoverer of America, or even gave his name to the new continent, which arose out of many concurrent circumstances, with which he had no concern. Most of the West-India islands were discovered some years earlier, San Salvador, or Guanahani, being the first land discovered, which was in 1492. Terra Firma, which reached from Darien to Nicaragua, was conquered by the Spaniards under Pedrarias in 1514, and the other parts, as far as the river Orinoco, were reduced by private adventurers. Brazil was discovered by the Portuguese in 1500. In 1623 the Dutch took possession of the northern part, but were expelled in 1664. Peru was conquered by Pizarro in 1532, and Chili, by Balivia, a Spanish general, in 1540.—For further information regarding South America see the various countries, &c. of which it is composed.

AMERSFORT, a′-mers-fort, a Dutch fortified town in the province of Utrecht, on the Eem, 12 miles from Utrecht. Manf. Dimities, bombazines, and stuffs, glass and other wares. It has a tobacco and herring trade. Pop. about 14,000.

AMERSHAM, ăm′-er-sham, a town and parish of Buckingham, near the river Colne, and 27 miles from Buckingham. The town consists of one long street, crossed by another of smaller dimensions. Manf. The principal are cotton, sacking, and lace. Area, 8,230 acres. Pop. about 4,000.—In this parish the poet Waller was born.

AMES, William, aims, a Puritan divine, who went to Franeker, in Holland, and was chosen professor of divinity. He afterwards settled at Rotterdam as associate with Hugh Peters, who had gathered a congregation of Brownists in that city. D. in Norfolk, 1576; D. 1633.—The principal of his works is entitled "Medulla Theologica."

AMES, Joseph, a secretary to the Society of Antiquaries, was originally a ship-chandler in Wapping. He devoted himself to the study of antiquities, in which he acquired great eminence. D. 1759.—He published a work entitled "Typographical Antiquities; being an Historical Account of Printing in England, &c." 4to. 1749.

AMES, Fisher, an American legislator, distinguished as a speaker and supporter of Washington. B. at Dedham, Massachusetts, 1758; D. 1808.

AMESBURY, or AMBRESBURY, aims′-ber-e, a town and parish in the county of Wilts, on the Avon, 7 miles from Salisbury. Area, 6,060 acres. Pop. 1,200.—It is now an inconsiderable place, noted for the ruins of an abbey, the vicinity of Stonehenge, and for having been the birthplace of Addison.

AMESTRATUS, ă-mes′-trā-tus, a town of Sicily, near the Halesus. It held out against the Romans seven months; but was obliged to yield after a third siege, when the inhabitants were sold for slaves. It is now Mistretta, in the Val de Demona.

AMESTRIS, ă-mes′-tris, queen of Persia, and wife of Xerxes. She cruelly treated the mother of Artiante, her husband's mistress, and also buried alive fourteen noble Persian youths, to appease the deities under the earth.

AMETHIE, a′-me-thē′, a town in the district of Partabgurh, Oude. Pop. 10,000. Here is a small fort, the rajah of which surrendered to Lord Clyde at the commencement of the winter campaign of 1858 against the mutineers. Lat. 26° 8′. Lon. 82° 2′.

AMGA, am'-ga, a river of Siberia, rising in the mountains of Yablonoi Krebet; and after a course of 466 miles falling into the Aldan in Lon. 135° E.

AMHARA, am-ha'-ra, formerly a province, but now an independent kingdom of Abyssinia. Lat. between 10° and 14° N. Lon. between 35° 10′ and 38° 30′ E.—The capital of this kingdom is Gondar. (See GONDAR.)

AMHERST, ăm'-herst, a seaport town of British India, and the capital of the most northern of the Tenasserim provinces. It is the principal military station of the Amherst peninsula, 30 miles from Moulmein. Lat. 16° 4′ N. Lon. 97° 45′ E. Pop. about 500.—This town was founded in 1826; and it has a splendid harbour, in which vessels may lie in perfect safety within 100 yards of the shore.

AMHERST, Jeffrey, Lord, a distinguished British general, and descended from an ancient Kentish family. He entered the army 1731, and in 1741 was aide-de-camp to General Ligonier, under whom he served at the battles of Dettingen, Fontenoy, and Rocoux. In 1756 he was appointed colonel of the 15th regiment of foot; and in 1758 was made major-general, and went to America, commanding at the siege of Louisburg. Forts Duquesne, Ticonderoga, Crown Point, and Niagara, were afterwards reduced, and the British prestige, which had suffered considerably in Canada, was entirely restored. In 1763 he returned to England, having been previously made a Knight of the Bath, received the thanks of Parliament, and was appointed governor of Virginia. He subsequently was appointed to the governorship of Guernsey, and in 1776 was created Baron Amherst of Holmsdale. In 1778 he was made commander-in-chief of the army in England, and was active, but humane, in suppressing the London riots of 1780. A change of the ministry occurring, he lost his military appointments, but received them again, to voluntarily resign them in 1795, when he was made a field-marshal. B. at Sevenoaks, 1717; D. 1798.

AMHERST, William Amherst, Lord, nephew of the above, who, having no child, procured the reversion of his barony for this gentleman. He was a pensioned politician and diplomatist of the Pitt administration, and in 1816 was sent out to Pekin to effect a treaty of commerce with the emperor of China; but as he would not prostrate himself before that sovereign, nothing was effected. On his return home he was wrecked in the Indian Seas, and suffered considerable hardships. B. 1770; D. 1845.

AMHERST, a county in Virginia, U.S., on the James river, 130 miles from Richmond. Area, 418 square miles. Pop. 14,000, of whom nearly one half are slaves.—There are several small townships in America of this name, also some islands so called in the river St. Lawrence and Lake Ontario.

AMHERSTBURG, ăm'-herst-berg, a town of West Canada, North America, 3 miles above the entrance of the river Detroit into Lake Erie. Pop. about 2,000.

AMHURST, Nicholas, ăm'-herst, a political and satirical writer, first educated at Merchant Taylors' School, whence he was removed to St. John's College, Oxford, but thence expelled for irregularity, without taking a degree. In consequence of this disgrace, he wrote several satires against the university, under the title of "Terræ Filius," 2 vols. 12mo, 1726, and settled in London as a writer by profession. B. at Marden, Kent, 1706; D. 1742.—His most celebrated undertaking was "The Craftsman," which was carried on for many years with great success. In this publication he was assisted by Lord Bolingbroke and Mr. Pulteney, by whom he was neglected when they got into place.

AMICONI, Giacomo, am'-e-ko'-ne, an historical and portrait painter of Venice, who, in 1729, came to England, and painted many fine pieces for the principal nobility. He afterwards went to Spain, and was appointed portrait-painter to the king. D. 1752.

AMICUS, Artonius, ă-mi'-kus, a Sicilian priest, who distinguished himself by some works in history and antiquities. Philip IV. of Spain conferred on him the title of historiographer royal. D. 1641. His principal work is entitled "Siciliæ Regum Annales ab Anno 960 usque ad præsens Sæculum."

AMIDA, ă-mi'-da, a city of Mesopotamia, taken by Sapor, king of Persia. It was called Constantia, in honour of the emperor Constantius, who fortified it. It is now named Diarbekir, or Cara-Amid.

AMIENS, a'-me-ens, formerly the chief town of Picardy, now the capital of the department of the Somme. It is the centre of a large general trade, and stands on the banks of the Somme, at a distance of about 35 miles from the English Channel. The town is agreeably situate, and its streets are straight, broad, and well-built. It contains a public library with 60,000 volumes, a museum, a theatre, a corn-hall, and cavalry barracks; is a bishop's see, and has a royal court, a royal college, an academy of sciences, a university, a school of design, a botanical garden, a court of assize, and commercial tribunals. Manf. Woollens, kerseymeres, cotton, and velvets, linen and cotton goods. There are dyeing, bleaching, and chemical works; beetroot-sugar and soap factories, besides tanneries and paper-mills. Pop. 53,000.—Amiens was once a place of considerable strength, and played an important part in the wars of the middle ages. Its most celebrated building is a magnificent Gothic cathedral, which is one of the finest in Europe, and, although founded in the 12th, was not entirely finished till the end of the 14th century. Its interior exhibits one of the grandest spectacles which architectural skill has ever produced; whilst the mind is deeply impressed by the exquisite proportions, the great height, and the noble simplicity which everywhere meet the eye. Its length is 442 feet, and the vault is 110 feet high, which is half as high again as that of Westminster. The spire has an elevation of 420 feet. In 1597 the Spanish troops took the city by the stratagem of a small body disguising themselves as peasants. On March 27, 1802, the celebrated treaty styled "The Peace of Amiens" was signed in the Hôtel de Ville. It is the birthplace of Peter the Hermit, Gabrielle d'Estrées, Ducange, and the astronomer Delambre, and is a principal station on the Northern Railway of France.

AMILCAR, ă-mil'-kar, a Carthaginian general, surnamed Rhodanus. The Athenians, suspecting and fearing the projects of Alexander, Amilcar went to his camp, gained his confidence, and secretly transmitted an account of all his schemes to Athens.

AMILCAR. (See HAMILCAR.)

AMILCAR, a son of Hanno, defeated in Sicily by Gelon, the same day that Xerxes was defeated at Salamis by Themistocles. He burnt himself, that his body might not be found among the slain. Sacrifices were offered to him.

AMILOS, or ANULUS, ăm'-e-los, a river of Mauritania, where the elephants went to wash themselves by moonlight.

AMIMONE, or AMYMONE, ă-mim'-o-ne, a daughter of Danaus, changed into a fountain near Argos, which flows into Lake Lerna.

AMINADAB, ă-min'-ă-dăb, 'prince of my people,' the father of Elisheba, Aaron's wife.

AMINIAS, ă-min'-e-as, a famous pirate, whom Antigonus employed against Apollodorus, tyrant of Cassandrea.

AMINIUS, a-min'-e-us, a river of Arcadia.

AMIRANTE ISLANDS, ăm'-e-răn'-te, a group of small islands in the Indian Ocean, lying about 300 miles to the north of the island of Madagascar. They are generally from 1½ to 2½ miles in length, and from 20 to 25 feet in height. Lat. between 4° and 6° S. Lon. between 54° and 56° E. —They came into the possession of Britain in 1814.

AMITE, ăm-eet, a county in Mississippi, United States, watered by a river of the same name. Area, 800 square miles. Pop. 10,000 or 12,000, of whom one half are slaves.

AMITERNUM, ăm-i-ter-num, a town of Italy, the birthplace of Sallust. It surrendered to the consul Sp. Carvilius, A.U.C. 459, and subsisted until the quarrels of the Guelphs and Ghibellines. The ruins of this town are to be seen near St. Vittorino.

AMLA, am'-la, one of the Andreanov islands, in the North Pacific Ocean, immediately east of Atcha. It is 40 miles long and 10 broad.

AMLWCH, ăm'-look, a seaport town and parish of Wales, in the island of Anglesey, 15 miles from Beaumaris. It has a good port, which is an excavation from the solid rock. The mines, about 2 miles distant from the town, contain inexhaustible veins and masses of copper ore. Pop. about 6,000. Lat. 53° 25′ N. Lon. 4° 19′ W.

AMMALAPOOR, am-al'-a-poor, a town of British India, in the presidency of Madras, 65 miles from Masulipatam.

AMMALO, am-al'-o, in Greece, a festival held in honour of Jupiter.

AMMAN, Jost, am'-an, a celebrated designer and engraver of Switzerland. Very little is known of his life; but Strutt mentions his style as "neat and decided," although perhaps wanting in "freedom and spirit." B. at Zurich, 1539; D. at Nurnberg, 1591.

AMMANATI, am'-a-na'-te, Laura Battiferri, wife of a Florentine sculptor, was the daughter of John Antonio Battiferri, and a poetess of considerable reputation. B. at Urbino, 1513; D. at Florence, 1589. Her poems, which were published at Florence in 1560, and at Naples in 1594, are held in great esteem. She was elected a member of the academy of Intronati, at Sienna.

AMMER, am'-mer, the name of two small rivers and a lake in Germany, one of the rivers joining the Neckar at Tübingen, and the other falling into the Isar 2 miles from Mosburg. The lake Ammer is traversed by this one, and is 10 miles long and 4 broad.

AMMERPOOR, am'-er-poor, a town of Hindostan, in Nepaul, 110 miles from Khatmandoo.

AMMIANUS, Marcellinus, ăm'-i-ai-nus, a Latin historian, who served in the army of Julian. B. at Antioch; D. 390. He wrote the Roman history from the reign of Nerva to the death of Valens, in thirty-one books, of which only eighteen are extant. The best edition is that of Gronovius, in 1693.

AMMON, ăm'-on, the son of Lot, and father of the Ammonites, who were generally at war with the Israelites. He lived about 1900 B.C.

AMMON and HAMMON, a name of Jupiter, worshipped in Libya. He appeared in the form of a ram to Hercules, or, according to others, to Bacchus, who, with his army, was suffering the greatest extremities for want of water, in the deserts of Africa, and showed him a fountain. Upon this, Bacchus erected a temple to his father, under the name of Jupiter Ammon, which had a famous oracle, established about eighteen centuries before the time of Augustus; but when it pronounced Alexander to be the son of Jupiter, such flattery destroyed its reputation, and in the age of Plutarch, it was scarcely known. The situation of the temple was pleasant, and, according to Herodotus, there was near it a fountain whose water was tepid in the morning, cool in the forenoon, extremely cold at mid-day, diminishing in coldness as the day declined; warm at sunset, and boiling hot at midnight. In 1792 the site of the temple of Ammon was discovered in a fertile spot called the Oasis of Siwah, situate in the midst of deserts, five degrees from Cairo. In 1798 Horneman discovered the fountain; in 1816, Belzoni visited the spot, and found the fountain situate in the middle of a beautiful wood of palm-trees. He visited it at noon, evening, midnight, and morning. He had no thermometer with him, but, judging from his feelings at these different periods, it might be 40° at noon, 60° in the evening, 100° at midnight, and 80° in the morning.

AMMON and BROTEAS, ăm'-on, bro'-te-as, two brothers, famous for their skill in boxing.

AMMONITES, ăm'-o-nites, the descendants of Ammon, a corrupt people, worshippers of Moloch.

AMMONIUS, am'-o-ne-us, a Peripatetic philosopher, who taught at Alexandria. He was the disciple of Proclus, and obtained great reputation as a preceptor. Lived in the 6th century. His commentaries on Aristotle and Porphyry are still extant.

AMMONIUS SACCAS, săk'-kas, a Christian philosopher, and the founder of the Eclectic sect. He studied under Athenagoras Pantœnus and Clemens Alexandrinus, which seems to refute the assertion that he took the surname of Saccas from being a porter. Porphyry says that he renounced the Christian religion, in which he had been educated, and embraced paganism; but Eusebius and others deny it. He instituted an academy at Alexandria to reconcile the principles of Plato and Aristotle; and among other eminent disciples he had the celebrated Longinus. B. at Alexandria; D. about 243.

AMMOTHEA, ăm-o-the-a, one of the Nereides.

AMNON, ăm'-non, the eldest son of David, but a wicked man.

AMO, Antony William, a'-mo, a negro, who in 1703 was brought an infant to Europe, and subsequently was made councillor of state by the court of Berlin. He afterwards returned to Guinea, where he was born; and little more is known of him.

AMCEBÆUS, ă-me-be'-us, an Athenian player, of great reputation, who sang at the nuptials of Demetrius and Nicæa.

AMOL, a-mol, a city of Persia, on the S. coast of the Caspian Sea, from which, during the summer months, many of the inhabitants retire to the Elburz Mountains. Lat. 36° 30′ N. Lon. 52° 23′ E. Pop. estimated at 30,000.—The only interesting building in Amol is the ruin of a mausoleum erected by Shah Abbas over the remains of a maternal ancestor who died in 1378.

AMOND, a'-mond, a river of Wales, in the county of Caermarthen. It falls into the Loughen.

AMONTONS, William, a-mon'-tawng, a French philosopher, inventor of a system of telegraphing, who, on becoming deaf, applied himself to the study of mechanics and practical mathematics. In 1687 he presented to the Academy of Sciences a new hygroscope, which was approved, and originated a method of telegraphing by signals and ciphers. B. in Normandy, 1663; D. 1705.—In 1695 Amontons published a book on the construction of barometers, thermometers, &c., which is the only production of his in print, except some papers in the Memoirs of the Academy of Sciences. In 1699, on account of the merit of his discoveries, he was admitted a member of that learned body.

AMOO, a'-moo, a name of the river OXUS. (See OXUS.)

AMOOR, AMOUR, or SAGHALIN, a'-moor, a large river of Eastern Asia, formed by the union of the Shilka and Argun; the first rising in the Russian government of Irkutsk, and the second near Ourga, in Mongolia, and hitherto for 400 miles forming the boundary-line between the Chinese and Russian empires. The Amoor traverses the centre of Mantchooria, entering the Gulf of Saghalin, opposite the island of the same name, in Lat. 52° 27′ N., and Lon. 140° E.—The entire course of this river, when taken from the head of either the Shilka or the Argun, is estimated at 2,200 miles. (See MANTCHOORIA.)

AMOR, aï'-mor, the son of Venus, and the god of love.

AMORBACH, a-mor'-bak, a town of Lower Franconia, Bavaria, 23 miles from Aschaffenburg. Manf. Principally paper and woollen goods. Pop. 3,500.

AMORGO POULOS, po'-los, an uninhabited island in the Greek Archipelago, 12 miles W. of Amorgos.

AMORGOS, a-mor'-gos, an island in the Greek Archipelago, in the government of Thera, belonging to Greece, and 18 miles from Naxos. Ext. 13 miles long and 6 broad. Desc. Mountainous, and producing excellent oil. Pop. 3,000.—The chief town of this island of the same name, and is situate, with the port of St. Anna, on the N.E. shore. It is the birthplace of Simonides. Lat. 36° 52′ N. Lon. 25° 56′ E.

AMORITES, ăm'-o-rites, 'rebels or babblers,' a tribe of the Canaanites.

AMOROS, Colonel Francis, a-mor'-os, a Spaniard, and the founder of gymnastic establishments in France. He rose rapidly in the military service of his country, until he attained the rank of colonel. Under Charles IV. of Spain and Joseph Bonaparte he successively became a councillor of state, governor of a province, minister of police, and commissary-royal of the army in Portugal. When the French were expelled from Spain, he went to France, where he was the first to establish a gymnasium for the development of the physical forces, and subsequently became director of the normal military gymnasium at Paris. B. at Valencia, 1769; D. at Paris, 1843.

AMORY, Thomas, aï'-mor-e, a dissenting divine, who, in 1772, was chosen one of the committee appointed by the dissenters to procure an extension of the Act of Toleration. B. at Taunton, 1700; D. in London, 1774.

AMORY, Thomas, an extraordinary writer, and the son of Counsellor Amory, who was appointed by King William secretary for the forfeited estates in Ireland. He appears to have been intended for the medical profession, but never practised that or any other. He led a very recluse life in his house in Westminster, shunning society, and never stirring out till the evening. D. at the age of 97, in 1788. He wrote, "Memoirs, containing the Lives of several Ladies of Great Britain." This singular work is of the novel kind, and it is made the vehicle of his own Unitarianism, as also is his next publication, "The Life of John Buncle, Esq.," in 4 vols. 12mo. These productions have been considered by one writer as evidencing a high order of intellect, but Chalmers pronounces them to be the emanations of a diseased mind. He wrote likewise two letters in the "Theological Repository," on the natural proofs of a future state.

AMOS, aï'-mos, the fourth of the minor prophets, a shepherd of Tekoa, and supposed to have been the father of Isaiah. He prophesied in the reigns of Jehoram, king of Israel, and Uzziah, king of Judah. Lived A.M. 3215.

AMOUR, Lewis de St., a'-moor, a doctor of the Sorbonne, and rector of the university of Paris, who went to Rome as the advocate of the Jansenists. He was expelled the Sorbonne for not signing the condemnation of Arnauld. D. 1687.

AMOUR, St., a town of France, in the department of the Jura, 19 miles from Lous-le-Saulnier. It carries on a small trade in swine, cattle, horses, and poultry. It has, besides, some potteries, tanneries, and iron-works. Pop. 2,000.—This place is celebrated for the number of sieges it has from time to time sustained.

AMOY, a'-moi, a city and seaport in the province of Fo-Kien, China. It is built on an island of the same name, opposite Formosa, in a bay of the China Sea. A line of rocky hills separates the city from the suburbs, and commands it by means of a fortified citadel. The town is large, containing many public buildings, and carrying on a considerable trade, especially with Formosa. It possesses an excellent harbour, in which ships can lie close to the quays. Manf. Porcelain, paper, umbrellas, and grass cloth, which, with tea and sugar-candy, are its chief exports. Imp. Rice, camphor, and European produce. Pop. about 270,000. Lat. 24° N. Lon. 118° E.—Amoy was the great military depôt of the province till 1841, when it was captured by the British, who kept it until the payment of 6,000,000 dollars, demanded, by the treaty of Nankin, from the Chinese government.

AMOZ. (See AMOS.)

AMPANAM, am'-pa-nam, a town on the island of Lombok, in the Eastern Archipelago. It trades in rice, poultry, and other products. Lat. 8° 25′ S. Lon. 116° E.

AMPELUS, ăm'-pe-lus, a promontory of Samos.—A town of Crete,—Macedonia,—Liguria,—and Cyrene.

AMPELUSIA, ăm'-pe-lu'-se-a, a promontory of Africa, in Mauritania.

AMPERE, André Marie, am'-pair, a scientific French annalist, and professor of physics in the central school of the department of Ain, and subsequently in the Polytechnic school of Paris. His life has little interest or variety, having been principally passed in scientific pursuits. B. at Lyons, 1775; D. in Paris, 1836.—He published several works on electricity, light, and magnetism.

AMPFING, amp'-feeng, a village of Upper Bavaria, 5 miles from Muhldorf, where, in 1322, Frederick of Austria was defeated by Louis of Bavaria, and where, in 1800, Moreau began his famous retreat from Germany to the French frontier.

AMPHIARAUS, ăm'-fi-a-raï'-us, a celebrated soothsayer, son of Oicleus, or, according to others, of Apollo, by Hypermnestra, was present at the chase of the Calydonian boar, and accompanied the Argonauts in their expedition. He married Eriphyle, the sister of Adrastus, king of Argos, by whom he had two sons, Alcmæon and Amphilochus. When Adrastus, at the request of Polynices, declared war against Thebes, Amphiaraus secreted himself, so that he should not accompany his brother-in-law in an expedition in which he knew he was to perish. But Eriphyle, who knew his hiding-place, was prevailed on by Polynices to betray him, and she received, as a reward, a famous golden necklace, set with diamonds. Amphiaraus being thus discovered, went to the war, but previously charged his son Alcmæon to put to death his mother Eriphyle, as soon as he was informed that he was killed. The Theban war was fatal to the Argives, and Amphiaraus was swallowed up in his chariot by the earth in retiring from the battle-field. The news of his death was brought to Alcmæon, who immediately executed his father's command by murdering Eriphyle. Amphiaraus received divine honours after death, and had a celebrated temple and oracle at Oropios, in Attica. (See ADRASTUS, ALCMÆON.)

AMPHICRATES, ăm-fik'-ra-tes, an historian who wrote the lives of illustrious men.

AMPHICTYON, ăm-fik'-te-on, son of Deucalion and Pyrrha, reigned at Athens after Cranaus, and was the first to interpret dreams and to draw omens. Some say that the Deluge happened in his age.

AMPHICTYON, son of Helenus, was the first to establish the celebrated council of the Amphictyons, composed of the wisest and most virtuous citizens of Greece. This assembly consisted of twelve persons, originally sent by the following states: the Ionians, Dorians, Perhæbians, Bœotians, Magnesians, Phthians, and Æninians. Other cities in process of time were added to their number, and by the time of Antoninus Pius they had increased to thirty. The members generally met twice every year at Delphi, and sometimes sat at Thermopylæ. They took into consideration all matters of disagreement which might exist between the different states of Greece. Before they proceeded to business, the Amphictyons sacrificed an ox to the god of Delphi, and cut his flesh into small pieces; intimating that union and unanimity prevailed in the several cities which they represented. Their decisions were held sacred and inviolable, and even armies were raised to enforce them.

AMPHIDROMIA, ăm-fe-dro'-me-a, a festival observed by private families at Athens on the fifth day after the birth of every child. It was customary to run round the fire with a child in their arms; whence the name of the festival.

AMPHILA, am-fi'-la, an island in a bay of the same name, in the Red Sea. Lat. 14° N Lon. 40° 22′ E.

AMPHILOCHIUS, ăm'-fe-lo'-ke-us, bishop of Iconium, who was at the council of Constantinople in 381, and president of that of Sida in 385. He zealously opposed the Arians, and recovered Theodosius from that party. D. 394.

AMPHILOCHUS, ăm-fil'-o-kus, a son of Amphiaraus and Eriphyle. After the Trojan war he left Argos, his native country, and built Amphilochus, a town of Epirus.

AMPHILYTUS, ăm-fil'-i-tus, a soothsayer of Acarnania, who encouraged Pisistratus to seize the sovereign power of Athens.

AMPHINOME, ăm-fin'-o-me, the name of one of the attendants of Thetis.

AMPHINOMUS and ANAPIUS, ăm-fin-o-mus, ă-nai'-pe-us, two brothers, who, when Catana and the neighbouring cities were in flames, caused by an eruption from Mount Ætna, saved their parents upon their shoulders. Pluto, to reward their uncommon piety, placed them after death in the island of Leuce, and they received divine honours in Sicily.

AMPHION, am-fi'-on, son of Jupiter, by Antiope. He was born at the same birth as Zethus, on Mount Cytheron, where Antiope had fled to avoid the resentment of Dirce; and the two children were exposed in the woods, but preserved by a shepherd. (See ANTIOPE.) When Amphion grew up, he made such progress in music, that he is said to have been the inventor of it, and to have built the walls of Thebes by the sound of his lyre. Mercury taught him the art, and gave him the lyre. The fable of Amphion's moving stones and raising the walls of Thebes by his harmony, has been explained by supposing that he persuaded, by his eloquence, a wild and uncivilized people to unite together and build a town to protect themselves against the attacks of their enemies.—Another, the son of Jasus, king of Orchomenos, who married Niobe, daughter of Tantalus, by whom he had many children; among whom was Chloris, the wife of Neleus.

AMPHIPOLES, ăm-fip'-o-les, magistrates appointed at Syracuse by Timoleon, after the expulsion of Dionysius the younger. The office existed more than 300 years.

AMPHIPOLIS, ăm-fip'-o-lis, a town on the Strymon, between Macedonia and Thrace, built by an Athenian colony. It had also other names; such as Acra, Myrica, Eion, the town of Mars, &c. It is now called Iamboli. It was the cause of many wars between the Athenians and Spartans.

AMPHIPYROS, ăm-fip'-e-ros, one of Diana's surnames, because she carries a torch in both her hands.

AMPHIS, ăm'-fis, a comic poet of Athens, son of Amphicrates, a contemporary of Plato. Besides his comedies, he wrote other pieces, which are now lost.

AMPHISBÆNA, ăm'-fis-be'-na, a double-headed serpent in the deserts of Libya, whose bite was venomous and deadly.

AMPHISSA, ăm-fis'-a, the capital of the Locri Ozolæ, situate at the head of the Sinus Crissæus, about 7 miles from Delphi. It is now called Salona.—A town of the Bruttii, between Locri and Caulon, now called Rocella.

AMPHISTIDES, ăm-fis-ti'-des, a man so naturally destitute of intellect, that he seldom remembered that he ever had a father. He had a desire to learn arithmetic, but never could comprehend beyond the figure 4.

AMPHISTRATUS and RHECAS, ăm-fis'-tra-tus, re'-kas, two men of Laconia, charioteers to Castor and Pollux.

AMPHITHEATRUM, ăm-fe-the-ai'-trum (ampitheatre), a building of an oval form, in which were exhibited various kinds of games and spectacles, especially combats of gladiators and wild beasts. The building was open at the top, and was provided with an awning, which could be let down or drawn up at pleasure, and was occasionally used to defend the spectators from the rain and sun. The first amphitheatre of stone was erected by Statilius Taurus, by desire of Augustus. The largest was the Flavian amphitheatre, or, as its ruins are generally called, the Colosseum; built, as Suetonius informs us, on the ancient site of the gardens of Nero. It was commenced by Flavius Vespasian, A.D. 72, and completed by his son Titus, and was capable of seating 87,000 persons, leaving standing-room for 20,000 more. It is recorded that 30,000 Jews, the victims of war, were employed in its construction.—There are amphitheatres still in existence, in various degrees of perfection, at other places than Rome. The most remarkable are those of Capua, Verona, Nismes, Pola, and Pæstum.

AMPHITRITE, ăm'-fi-tri'-te, a daughter of Oceanus and Tethys, or of Nereus and Doris. Though she had made a vow of perpetual celibacy, yet she was induced to marry Neptune, and rewarded the fidelity of the dolphin, who had so powerfully pleaded the cause of the god, by placing him among the stars. She is sometimes called Salatia, and is often taken for the sea itself.

AMPHITRYON, ăm-fit'-re-on, a Theban prince, son of Alcæus and Hippomene. His sister Anaxo had married Electryon, king of Mycenæ, whose sons were killed in a battle by the Teleboans. Electryon promised his crown and daughter Alcmena to him who could revenge the death of his sons upon the Teleboans. Amphitryon offered himself, and was received, on condition that he should not approach Alcmena before he had obtained a victory. (See ALCMENA.) When Amphitryon returned from the war, he brought back to Electryon the herds which the Teleboans had taken from him. One of the cows strayed from the rest, and Amphitryon, to bring them together, threw a stick, which struck the horns of the cow, and rebounded with such violence upon Electryon, that he died on the spot After this accident, Sthenelus, Electryon's brother, seized the kingdom of Mycenæ, and obliged Amphitryon to leave Argolis and retire to Thebes with Alcmena. Creon, king of Thebes, purified him of the murder.—Hercules has been called Amphitryonidas, though he was not in reality the son of Amphitryon.

AMPHRYSUS, am-fri'-sus, a river of Thessaly, near which Apollo, when banished from heaven, fed the flocks of King Admetus.

AMPLEPUIS, ampl'-pwe, a town of France, department of the Rhone, 19 miles from Villefranche. Manf. Linen and cotton threads. Pop. 5,000.

AMPNEY, ămp'-ne, the name of several small parishes in Gloucestershire, with none of their populations more than 700.

AMPTHILL, ămt'-hill, formerly AMETULLE, a market-town and parish in Bedfordshire, 8 miles from Bedford. Area of parish, 1,923 acres. Pop. 2,000. A station on the London and North-Western Railway.

AMPUDIA, am-poo'-de-a, a town and district of Spain, 18 miles from Palencia. Pop. about 2,000. On the 6th June, 1813, this place was the head-quarters of Wellington's army.

AMPURIAS, am-poo'-re-as, a walled town of Spain, in Catalonia, on the site of the ancient Emporica, 24 miles from Gerona.

AMRAN MOUNTAINS, am'-ran, a Southern Afghanistan mountain-range, the highest peak of which attains an elevation of 9,000 feet. It is crossed by the Kajuk pass, 7,457 feet high.

AMRAN, a town and fortress of Hindostan, province of Gujerat, 22 miles from Mallia. Lat. 22° 35′ N. Lon. 70° 35′ E.

AMRAWUTTI, or AMARAVATI, am'-ra-woot'-e, a considerable town of India, in the Deccan, 28 miles from Ellichpoor. It has an active trade, and excellent cotton is grown in its neighbourhood.

AMRETSIR, or AMRITSIR, am-ret'-sir, the 'pool of immortality,' formerly called Chak, a town of the Punjab, in the Barri Doab, 40 miles from Lahore. This is the chief place of religious worship of the Sikh nation, who resort hither to immerse themselves in the sacred basin constructed by Ram Dass, the fourth Guru or spiritual leader of the Sikhs. This place has upwards of 8,000 shops, and about 450 Hindoo and Mahometan places of worship. Manf. Chiefly shawls, silks, and linen and woollen cloths. A large transit trade is carried on with various parts of India, and it is a great emporium for many of the productions of the East. Pop. 120,000. Lat. 31° 40′ N. Lon. 74° 56′ E.

AMRU-EBN-AL-AS, am'-roo-en-a'-las, a famous Saracen general, at first a great enemy of Mahomet, but afterwards his zealous disciple. He conquered Syria and Egypt, whence he extended his victorious arms to Africa. He died governor of Egypt, which flourished greatly under his administration, A.D. 663.

AMSTEL, ăm'-stel, a small river of Holland, which, running through the city of Amsterdam, joins the arm of the Zuyder Zee called the Wye. It is canalized, and made navigable for vessels of considerable size.

AMSTELVEEN, ăm'-stel-vene, a town of Holland, on the Amstel, 6 miles S. of Amsterdam; consisting of one long street. Pop. about 2,500.

AMSTERDAM, formerly AMSTELDAM, ăm'-ster-dăm', 'the dike or dam of Amstel,' the capital of the province and kingdom of Holland, situate on the arm of the Zuyder Zee called the Y or Wye, in Lower

Holland. The river Amstel divides it into the Old and the New towns. From the marshy nature of the soil, it has been necessary to erect nearly the whole city on oaken piles driven into the ground. It is intersected throughout by canals, which cut each other in a thousand different ways, there being in all nearly 300 bridges in the city, whilst several of the streets are lined with trees, and form agreeable promenades. On the land side the city is defended by a wall and regular bastions, with a broad and deep ditch; and by means of the sluices the whole adjoining country can be laid under water. Towards the sea it is undefended by fortifications; but the entrance to the harbour is guarded by two rows of piles, with openings for the admission of vessels, which are shut at night. Opposite Amsterdam commences the great ship canal, the most stupendous undertaking of the kind ever executed, extending to Helder and the Texel, a distance of 50 miles, and which required the labour of eight years, and cost more than a million sterling. The Stadthouse stands on a foundation of 13,659 piles, in an open square in the centre of the city. It is built of freestone (except the ground floor, which is brick), is 282 feet long, 235 broad, and, without reckoning the tower, 116 high. Its interior is adorned with marble, jasper, statues, paintings, and other costly ornaments. Among the other edifices, are the East and West-India Houses, Exchange, Bank, Admiralty, three weigh-houses, Corn Exchange, and Tower. In the Old Church is a chapel, with windows of painted glass. The New Church contains the tombs of De Ruyter and the poet

AMSTERDAM.

Vondel. The synagogues of the Jews are of the most splendid description. The principal public establishments are the arsenals and dock-yards, the academy, anatomical and surgical college, house of correction, or Rasp-huis, orphan-house, hospital for old men, establishment for widows, lazaretto, lunatic asylum, the botanic garden, &c. The famous Bourse or Exchange is a plain but stately fabric of free-stone, covered with tiles, and is in length 230 feet, and in breadth 130. It will contain about 4,500 persons, and is daily resorted to after mid-day by all concerned in exchange or other mercantile business. The Bank was instituted by the States of Holland in 1609, when the magistrates of the city, under authority of the States, declared themselves the perpetual bankers of the inhabitants, and ordered that all payments above 300 guilders (£27), and all bills of exchange, should be made at the bank. The motives to this measure are to be found in the then debased state of the current coin of Holland, which the trade of Amsterdam brought from all quarters of Europe. The transactions of this bank ceased, however, in 1814; and the present Bank of the Netherlands is on the same model as the Bank of England. Commerce. Extensive in almost every article of trade. In former days it was not uncommon to see 100 vessels enter the port with the same tide; and there commonly lay together in the harbour 600 vessels and upwards. The articles of this commerce were grain, wine, groceries, spiceries, dye-stuffs, fish, Virginian and Brazilian tobacco, all Baltic merchandise, cotton and other productions from the Levant and Barbary; the products of Italy, Spain, France, and the north of Europe; gold, silver, jewellery, and all kinds of colonial produce. During the 20 years that preceded the pacification of 1814, the trade of Amsterdam suffered considerably. From 1810 to the fall of Bonaparte, Amsterdam was the chief town of the French department of the Zuyder Zee, and the third town in the French empire, taking rank after Paris and Rome. Manf. In the town and adjoining country all sorts of stuffs, damasks, galloon, lace, velvet, woollen cloths, carpets, leather, borax, camphor, cinnabar, sulphur, &c.; there are also refineries of sugar. Pop. about 230,000. Lat. 52° 22′ 30″ N. Lon. 4° 53′ 15″ E.—In former ages Amsterdam consisted of a single village, meanly built, and inhabited by fishermen. It first acquired the name of a commercial town about the year 1370, was encompassed with walls and other fortifications in 1482, and after receiving successive accessions in size and population (particularly in the years 1585, 1599, 1612, and 1658), became, in the 17th century, one of the greatest trading cities of Europe. By water, Amsterdam has communication with all parts of Holland, and by railway it communicates on the one side with Haarlem, the Hague, and Rotterdam; and on the other side with Utrecht, Arnheim, and Prussia.

AMSTERDAM, a post township of the United States, in Montgomery county, New York, 32 miles from Albany. Manf. Scythes, saws, and carpets. Pop. 4,300.—It is a station on the Utica Railway.

AMSTERDAM, a small island in the Pacific Ocean. Ext. 4½ miles long and 2½ broad. Height, 2,760 feet. Uninhabited. Lat. 37° 47′ S. Lon. 77° 54′ E.

AMSTERDAM, NEW, a seaport-town in Guiana, S. America, near the confluence of the Berbice and Canje. Lat. 6° 20′ N. Lon. 57° 15′ W. This town was originally settled by the Dutch, and is protected by three batteries at the entrance of the river.

AMSTETTEN, am-stet′-en, an Austrian village, 28 miles from Linz. Here the Austrians and Russians were defeated by the French on the 5th November, 1805.—Another, a small town of Wurtemberg, a station on the Wurtemberg and Bavarian Railway.

AMTZELL, amt-zel, a market-town of Wurtemberg, in the district of the Lake Constance, and 8 miles from Ravensburg. Pop. 2,130.

AMUCU, a′-moo-koo′, a lake, or rather marsh, between the Amazon and Essequibo, S. America. It is the site of Sir W. Raleigh's "lake with the golden banks," and of the "El Dorado" of the Spaniards. Lat. 3° 40′ N. Lon. 59° 20′ W.

AMULIUS, ă-mu′-le-us, king of Alba, was son of Procas, and youngest brother to Numitor. The crown belonged to Numitor by right of birth, but Amulius dispossessed him of it, and even put to death his son Lausus, and consecrated his daughter Rhea Sylvia to the service of Vesta, to prevent her ever becoming a mother. In spite of all these precautions, however, Rhea brought forth the twins Romulus and Remus. Amulius being informed of this, ordered her to be buried alive for violating the laws of Vesta, which enjoined perpetual chastity, and the two children were thrown into the river as soon as born.

AMURATH I., a′-mu-rath, a sultan of the Turks, who succeeded his father Orchan in 1360. He completed the conquest of the Greek empire. He founded the corps of Janissaries, conquered Phrygia, and, on the plains of Cassova, defeated the Christians. In this battle he was wounded by an Albanian soldier, and died the next day, 1389.

AMURATH II. succeeded his father, Mahomet I., in 1422. The beginning of his reign was disturbed by pretenders to his throne; but, after suppressing these, he abdicated in favour of his son Mahomet, and retired to a society of dervishes, whence he was soon recalled to engage against the Hungarians, who had invaded the Turkish dominions. He gained a great victory over the Christians at Varna, and, in 1446, quelled a revolt of the Janissaries, and succeeded in resisting the famous Scanderbeg in making advances upon his territories. He then turned his arms against the Hungarians with his wonted good fortune. Finding his son inadequate to the responsibilities of an imperial station, he sent him to govern Asia Minor, and resumed the throne. B. 1399; D. 1451.

AMURATH III. succeeded his father, Selim II., in 1575. He added several of the best provinces of Persia to the Turkish empire. B. 1544; D. 1595.

AMURATH IV. succeeded his uncle Mustapha in 1622. In 1638 he recovered Bagdad from the Persians, after which he put 30,000 of the enemy, who had surrendered at discretion, to the sword. D. 1640.—The excessive cruelty and debauchery of this prince have stamped him with the character of being one of the worst sovereigns that ever reigned over the Ottomans.

AMWELL, ăm'-wel, a village and parish of Hertfordshire, 21 miles N. of London, where is one of the feeders of the New River, which so largely supplies the English metropolis with water.

AMWELL, a post township of the United States, in Hunterdon county, New Jersey. Pop. 5,000.—Also a township of Washington county, Pennsylvania.

AMYCLAS, ă-mi'-clas, the master of a ship, with whom Cæsar embarked in disguise, and whom, in the midst of a storm, he bade pursue his voyage with this exclamation, Cæsarem vehis, Cæsarisque fortunam.

AMYOT, James, a'-me-o, bishop of Auxerre, and great almoner of France. Though meanly born and educated on charity, he rose by merit and patronage to be professor of Greek and Latin in the university of Bourges. Here he translated into French the memoirs of Theagenes and Charicles, which procured him an abbey. B. at Melun, 1513; D. at Auxerre, 1593.—His translation of Plutarch is admired rather for its style than its correctness, and the French critics consider him to have done much towards determining and improving their language.

AMYTHAON, ăm-i-thaï'-on, a son of Cretheus, king of Iolchos, who re-established or regulated the Olympic games.

ANABARA, an'-a-ba'-ra, a river in Siberia, in the government of Tobolsk. It rises in lat. 66° N., and after a course of 400 miles falls into the Arctic Ocean at lat. 72° N.; and lon. 112° E.

ANABON, or ANNO-BOM, a'-na-bon, an island belonging to Spain, in the Gulf of Guinea. Ext. 4 miles long and 2 broad. There is a village on the island, which, in 1827, was taken possession of by the British, but in 1843 was restored to Spain. Pop. about 3,000 negroes, who profess Catholicism. Lat. 1° 24′ S. Lon. 5° 37′ E.

ANA CAPRI, a-na ka'-pre, a small town on the Neapolitan island of Capri, on a rocky elevation, where there are a castle and some vestiges of antiquity. Pop. 1,800.—This town can only be reached by a flight of 552 steps, cut in the rock; and it is said that its inhabitants are so much attached to it as a place of residence, that many of them have never descended these steps.

ANACHARSIS, ăn-a-kar'-sis, a Scythian philosopher, who, in the time of Solon, visited Athens, where he was so much esteemed as to be the only barbarian ever admitted to the honour of citizenship. Lived in the 7th century B.C.—The life of this philosopher was written by Lælius, who, with Plutarch and others, has preserved many of his apothegms.

ANACLACHE, a'-na-clash, a snowy peak of the Bolivian Andes. Height, 18,500 feet. Lat. 18° 12′ S. Lon. 69° 20′ W.

ANACREON, ă-năk'-re-on, one of the most famous of the lyric poets, whose muse is supposed to have been greatly inspired by the juice of the grape. His odes are still extant, and their wonderful sweetness and elegance have been the admiration of every age and country. Plato says that he was descended from Codrus, the last king of Athens. He resided a long time at Samos, in the court of Polycrates. B. in Teos. Flourished in the 6th century B.C.—It is said that Anacreon, in his 80th year, was choked by a stone of a grape. His statue was placed in the citadel of Athens, representing him as an old drunken man, singing, with every mark of dissipation and intemperance. All that he wrote is not extant.

ANACTES, ă-năk'-tes, feasts in honour of Castor and Pollux.

ANADYR, or ANADIR, a'-na-dir, a river of Siberia, rising in Lake Ivachno, and after a course of 450 miles falling into an inlet of the Sea of Anadyr (North Pacific), in lon. 177° E.—There is only one station on its banks, which is called Anadyrsk. Lat. 65° N. Lon. 167° E.

ANAGNI, a-nan'-ye, a decayed town in the Campagna di Roma, 37 miles from Rome. Pop. 5,500.—Here popes Innocent III., Gregory IX., Alexander IV., and Boniface VIII., were born.

ANAH, a-na, a town in Asiatic Turkey, 160 miles from Bagdad. It forms a resting station for the caravans that traverse the great desert of Mesopotamia. Pop. about 3,000 or 4,000.

ANAHUAC, a'-na-hoo-ak', the ancient Indian name of New Spain, or Mexico. (See MEXICO.)

ANAM, or ANNAM, a-nam, a country of Asia, occupying the E. portion of a promontory to the N.E. of the Malay peninsula, from which it is separated by the Gulf of Siam. Ext. about 970 miles, running N. to S., with a breadth which expands from 85 miles at its narrowest part, about the centre, to 400 miles N., and to 270 S. Desc. Varied as a beautiful landscape, comprising charming vallcys, which run up into the slopes of well-cultivated hills, rising into mountain-ranges of considerable extent. It is well watered, but little is as yet known of the interior generally. It is composed of the three provinces Tonquin, on the N.; Cochin-China, on the S.E.; and Cambodia, on the S.W.

NATIVES OF ANAM.

Agriculture. Defective. Manf. Imperfect. In the manufacture of cotton, silk, and porcelain, the inhabitants cannot equal the Hindoos, Japanese, or Chinese. Exp. Sugar, pepper, tin, teak, sandal-wood, silk, and cotton. Imp. Tea, opium, and manufactured goods. Pop. about 6,000,000, consisting principally of Chinese and Malays. Lat. between 9° 40′ and 23° N. Lon. 102° and 109° 30′ E. (See TONQUIN, COCHIN CHINA, CAMBODIA.)

ANAMBAS, a-nam'-bas, a group of fifteen islands in the China Sea, mostly inhabited by poor Malays, who support themselves by the cultivation of rice, sago, cocoa-nuts, and fishing. Pop. about 1,500.

ANAMIRAPASUM, a-nam'-e-ra-pas-um, a river in Brazil, in the province of Para, which, after a course of 200 miles, falls into the estuary of the Amazon, at lat. 0° 15′ S.; lon. 50° 55′ W.

ANAMMELECH, ă-năm'-e-lek, an idol deity of the Sepharvites.

ANAMUR, a'-na-mur, the most southern point of Asia Minor. Lat. 36° 2′ N. Lon. 32° 50′ E.

ANANIAS, ăn'-a-ni'-as, 'the cloud of the Lord,' a hypocrite in the primitive church at Jerusalem, who was struck dead, with his wife Sapphira, for lying.—An evangelist of Damascus.—A tyrannical high-priest of the Jews.

ANAPA, ăn'-a-pa', a fortified town on Sundjik Bay, in the Black Sea, 47 miles S.E. of Yenikale. Exp. Grain, tallow, butter, hides, peltries, wax, &c. Pop. 3,000, consisting of Tartars, Circassians, Greeks, Jews, Armenians, and Russians. Lat. 44° 54′ N. Lon. 37° 16′ E. The constant wars which have existed between the Russians and the tribes inhabiting the mountain country in the rear of this place, have almost neutralized the great advantages offered by its situation, and prevented its growth. As a military post it has been greatly prized by Russia. Its fort was built by the Turks in 1784, and taken by the Russians in 1791 and in 1807, and only given up with the greatest reluctance. In May, 1828, it was forced to surrender to the Russians, and at the peace of Adrianople was ceded to Russia, with all the coast towns and forts from the Kouban to Fort St. Nicholas. During the war of 1855, it, with other ports on the Circassian coast, was destroyed by the Russians, but in the following year was again occupied by them.

ANASTASIUS I., ăn'-a-stai'-she-us, emperor of the East, was an officer in the imperial palace for many years, and in 1491 became emperor by marrying the empress Ariadne, widow of Zeno. His reign was disturbed by religious feuds.—B. at Duras, in Illyricum, 430; D. 518.—There were several other emperors of this name.

ANASTASIUS I., Pope, succeeded Siricius about the year 398.—There are several other popes of this name, but with nothing remarkable in their history to record.

ANATHOTH, ăn'-a-thoth, 'answer,' 'song,' 'affliction,' or 'poverty;' a grandson of Benjamin.—A city of the Levites, the birthplace of Jeremiah.

ANATOLIA. (See NATOLIA.)

ANATOLICO, a-nat-o-le'-ko, a town of Ætolia, in Greece, 6 miles from Missolonghi, standing on a rocky island in a salt lagune on the W. side of the Gulf of Patras. The inhabitants are mostly fishermen. Lat. 38° 21′ N. Lon. 21° 18′ E.—The houses of this town are mostly built upon piles, and number about 400. In March, 1826, the town surrendered to the Egyptian troops of Ibrahim Pasha.

ANAVA, an-a-va, a river of Brazil, and a tributary of the Branca or Parinia. Length, about 200 miles.

ANAVELHANA, a-na-vel-ha'-na, a river of Brazil and an affluent of the Rio Negro, into which it falls near Toroma. Length, about 220 miles.

ANAXAGORAS, ăn-ax-ăg'-o-ras, an illustrious philosopher of antiquity, who held that the moon was inhabited, and that the sun was a mass of burning matter, from which the other heavenly bodies derived light and heat. For these opinions he was banished by the Athenians. B. at Clazomene; D. at Lampsacus, 428 B.C.—Euripides and Pericles were pupils of this philosopher, whose only dying wish was that the day of his death should be kept as a holiday yearly by the boys of Lampsacus, which was complied with.

ANAXANDRIDES, ăn'-ax-ăn'-dri-des, king of Sparta and the father of Leonidas, who fell at Thermopylæ. Reigned about 550 B.C. (See LEONIDAS.)

ANAXIMANDER, ăn-ăx'-e-man'-der, a philosopher of Miletus, and the first to observe the obliquity of the ecliptic; he taught that the moon was the recipient of the light of the sun, and that the earth is globular. To him is ascribed the invention of the sphere and geographical charts. Lived 547 B.C.

ANAXIMENES, ăn-ax-im'-e-nes, a philosopher, who maintained that air was the first principle of all things. Pliny attributes to him the invention of the sun-dial. Lived 548 B.C.

ANAXIPPUS, ăn'-ax-ip'-us, a comic writer in the age of Demetrius. He used to say that philosophers were wise only in their speeches, but fools in their actions.

ANCASTER, ăn-kas-ter, a village and parish of Lincolnshire, 6 miles from Grantham. Area, 2,800 acres. Pop. about 700. It is a station on the Great Northern Railway.

ANCENIS, an-sen'-e, a town of France, on the Loire, department of the Lower Loire, 20 miles from Nantes. Commerce. It trades in wood, corn, wine, vinegar, coal, iron, and timber. Pop. 3,500.—When the revolutionary war of La Vendée was at its height, this town was the scene of some severe contests.

ANCHOLME, ănk'-home, a river of England, rising in Lincolnshire, and joining the Humber 9 miles from Glanford Brigg.

ANCILLON, Johann Peter Friedrich, an-tsil-on, a Prussian statesman who, during the wars of Napoleon I., took an active part in directing the affairs of his country. At his death he held the appointment of minister of foreign affairs. B. at Berlin, 1766; D. 1837.

ANCLIFF, ăn'-klif, a hamlet near Wigan, in Lancashire, where there is a well remarkable for emitting an inflammable gas.

ANCOBAR, ăn'-ko-bar, a river on the Gold Coast, Africa, which there forms the west boundary of the Dutch possessions. Lat. 4° N. Lon. 2° 16′ W.

ANCONA, an-ko'-na, a large province of Italy, in the states of the Church, lying between the Apennines and the Adriatic Sea; bounded on the S. by the province of Macerata, on the E. by the Adriatic, and on the N. and W. by the province of Urbino. Ext. about 38 miles long, with an average breadth of 16 miles. Area, 403 square miles. Desc. Generally mountainous, but intersected with fertile valleys, with many acres covered with copses and laid out in meadows, olive-grounds, and pasture-land. Pro. Maize, wheat, hemp, wine, tobacco, hay, oil, beans, and silk. Hogs, sheep, and horned cattle are also reared in large numbers. Towns. The principal are Ancona, Jesi, and Osimo.

ANCONA, a large trading town in the above province, standing on a point of land which projects into the Gulf of Venice. It is seated between two hills, on one of which is the citadel (a place of considerable strength), and on the other the cathedral church. On one of the moles in the harbour is a triumphal arch, erected A.D. 112, in honour of Trajan, by his wife Plotina and his sister Marciana, and said to be the finest marble arch in the world. The new mole has also a triumphal arch, erected by Clement XII., whilst the harbour is defended by several forts. Manf. Leather, paper, wax-candles, silk stockings, and verdigris. COMMERCE. Exp. Grain, bacon, hemp, fruits, hides, sulphur, cordage, linseed, raw silk, and native tobacco. Imp. Chiefly manufactured goods, dye-stuffs, colonial produce, drugs, wool, wax, hardware, salt-fish, oils, &c. Pop. from 30,000 to 40,000. Lat. 43° 38′ N. Lon. 13° 35′ E.—Ancona was one of the principal naval stations of the Romans, and was anciently famous for its purple dye. It was a favourite place of Trajan, who greatly improved its harbour. In every period of its history it has been one of the chief commercial cities of Central Italy. In 1797 it was occupied by the French, but in 1799, after a long siege, it was retaken by the Austrians. In 1832 the French again took possession of its citadel, which they did not leave till 1838. Steamers sail from Ancona to Corfu, Athens, Patras, Smyrna, and Constantinople.

ANCRE, a town of France. (See ALBERT.)

ANCRUM, ăn'-krum, a village and parish of Roxburghshire, on the Teviot, in Scotland. Area, 8,316 acres. Pop. 600.—Here, in 1544, the battle of Ancrum Moor was fought between the English and Scotch, the latter being the victors.

ANCUD, the Gulf of, an'-kud, lies between the island of Chiloe and the mainland of S. America. Ext. nearly 150 miles long, with an average width of 60. Lat. extending from 41° 30′ to 43° 30′ S. Lon. from 72° to 73° W.

ANCUS MARTIUS, ăn-cus mar'-she-us, fourth king of Rome, was the grandson of Numa Pompilius. He was elected 634 B.C. He obtained triumphs for victories gained over the Latins, Sabines, and Veientes, and extended his territories to the seacoast, where he built the port of Ostia. D. after a reign of 42 years.

ANCYRA. (See ANGORA.)

ANDALUSIA, or ANDALUCIA, an'-da-loo'-se-a, a division of Spain, which embraces the four ancient provinces of Seville, Cordova, Jaen, and Grenada, and the modern ones of Seville, Cadiz, Jaen, Huelva, Cordova, Almeria, Grenada, and Malaga. It is bounded on the N. by Estremadura and La Mancha, on the S. by the Mediterranean, on the W. by Portugal, and on the E. by Murcia and the Mediterranean. Ext. 320 miles long, with an average breadth of 140. Area, estimated at 27,221 square miles. Desc. Extremely uneven, except the basin of the Guadalquiver, which for the greater part may be regarded as a wide plain. The Sierra Morena mountain-range runs along its north frontier, and is cut by the great road from Madrid to Seville at the pass called the Des-peña-perros, with an elevation of 7,560 feet above the level of the sea. Another mountain-range, called the Sierra Nevada, runs across Andalusia, from Cartagena to Tarifa and Cape Trafalgar. Many of the summits of this range are covered with perpetual snow, and two of them, the Picacho de Mulahacen and the Picacho de Veleta, attain respectively the heights of 11,658 and 11,382 feet above the level of the sea. On the Mulahacen Sierra is the Lake of Calderra, 10,112 feet high. Rivers. The principal are the Guadalquiver, rising in the province of Jaen, near Cazorla, and after a course of 320 miles, falling into the Mediterranean at San Lucar. The Guadalimar, Guadiato, and Xenil are its chief affluents, which, altogether, drain an area of more than 15,000 square miles, and considerably more than half the size of Andalusia. The rivers on the south of the Sierra Nevada are of little importance. Zoology. Wolves and bears are occasionally found in the mountain-ranges, and venomous reptiles lurk in the crevices of rocks, and amongst the brushwood of the milder parts of the country. Deer, hares, and rabbits are abundant, as are bustards, partridges, and plovers. The horses of Andalusia are the best breed in the peninsula, and its bulls are the most distinguished for indomitable stamina in the bull-fights of the country. Sheep are plentiful, and its hogs, reared on the acorns of the woods, supply as excellent hams and bacon as are to be had in Europe. Climate. Various, though extremely warm on the coasts. Pro. Grain, olives, figs, cotton, sugar, silk, cochineal, and wine. Minerals. Silver, lead, antimony, copper, sulphur, coal, and marble. Manf. These are not extensive. Silks, woollens, and leather are the most important. Pop. about 3,000,000. Lat. between 36° 0′ and 38° 39′ N. Lon. between 1° 38′ and 7° 20′ W.

ANDAMAN ISLANDS, ăn'-da-man, several islands on the eastern side of the Bay of Bengal, called the Great and Little Andaman. Area, 3,000 square miles. They are separated by Duncan Passage, and have been chosen for the place of banishment for the sepoys concerned in the Indian mutiny of 1857. Their inhabitants are in the lowest state of civilization. Lat. between 10° and 13° N. Lon. traversed by the meridian 93° E.—In 1791 a settlement was endeavoured to be made on S. Andaman and N. Andaman by the English, but, on account of the unsuitable character of the climate for Europeans, it was abandoned in 1796.

ANDELYS, LES, lais ăn'-de-le, a town of France, in Upper Normandy, properly consisting of two, the Great and the Little Andely, situate on the Seine, 20 miles from Evreux. Manf. Artificial pearls, cloths, cottons, and bonnets. Pop. 5,200.—The ruins of Château Gaillard, a fortress built by Richard Cœur de Lion, are in the neighbourhood of Little Andely, and in a neighbouring village, called Villiers, the painter Poussin was born, in 1594.

ANDENNE, ăn'-den, a town of Belgium, on the Maese, 10 miles from Namur. Manf. Tobacco-pipes and porcelain. Pop. about 5,000. It is a station on the Northern Belgium Railway.

ANDERMATT, ăn-der-măt', a Swiss village in the valley of Ursern, 18 miles from Altorf, in the neighbourhood of which is the celebrated Devil's Bridge, which crosses the Reuss, and which is part of the route leading across Mont St. Gothard into Italy. Pop. 700.

ANDERNACH, ăn'-der-nak, a town of Rhenish Prussia, beautifully situate on the Rhine, between Coblentz and Bonn. Manf. Hydraulic cement, made from volcanic tufa, used in the construction of the dikes in Holland. Pop. 4,000.

ANDERSEN, Hans Christian, ăn-der-sen, an ingenious Danish writer, who, though born in the humblest circumstances, has risen to considerable eminence among his contemporaries. Most of his works are of an imaginative, poetical, or light character, and have procured him not only the patronage of the crown of Denmark, but the approbation of a large portion of the literary circles of foreign countries, and the highest praise has been assigned to his juvenile tales. B. at Funen, 1805.—A collected edition of his works was published at Leipsic in 1847. They extend to thirty-five volumes 12mo.

ANDERSON, ăn'-der-son, a county of the United States, in East Tennessee. Area, 750 square miles. Pop. 7,000, of which a portion are slaves. Chief Town. Clinton.

ANDERSON, James, LL.D., a Scotch political, scientific, and agricultural writer, and one of the founders of the Scotch school of husbandry. He has written about thirty different works, and was a large contributor to the "Encyclopædia Britannica." B. at Hermiston, near Edinburgh, 1739; D. in London, 1808.

ANDERSON, Sir Edmund, an English judge, who was in the commission for trying Mary, queen of Scots; and presided at the trial of secretary Davison, for issuing the warrant by which that unhappy princess was executed. B. in Lincolnshire; D. 1605.

ANDERSON, John, one of the earliest promoters of scientific instruction among the working classes, and the founder of the Glasgow Andersonian Institution. D. at Roseneath, Dumbartonshire, 1726; D. Glasgow, 1796. —It was from Anderson that the plan came of sending, by gas-inflated paper balloons, newspapers and other communications from France into Germany, when all other means of conveyance were intercepted by acordon of troops between the countries.

ANDERSON, George, an English mathematician, who attained to considerable eminence, though born of peasants and himself a day-labourer. B. at Weston, Buckinghamshire, 1760; D. 1806.

ANDERSON, James, M.D., a physician-general in the service of the East-India Company at Madras, who zealously laboured for the introduction of the cultivation of the coffee-plant, American cotton, sugar-cane, and the European apple, into those parts of Hindostan, but more especially in the presidency of Madras, where the climate and soil were favourable to their production. Lived in the last century; but the dates of his birth and death are not precisely known.

ANDES. (See AMERICA, SOUTH.)

ANDORNO, an-dor'-no, a town of Sardinia, 6 miles from Biella, situate in one of the most prosperous districts of Piedmont. Pop. upwards of 4,000, chiefly employed in the lead, copper, and iron mines of the neighbouring mountains.—The painter Cagliari was born here.

ANDORRA, or ANDORRE, an-dor'-a. In Arabic, the name of this place signifies being 'thick with trees.' It is a small independent neutral state in the north of Catalonia, in Spain, and on the south side of the Pyrenees. Ext. 30 miles long and nearly the same in breadth. Area, 191 square miles. Desc. Amongst the mildest districts of the Pyrenees, having little arable land, but exhibiting extensive pastures, with mountains entirely surrounding it. Little grain is grown, the inhabitants being mostly shepherds, who live an austere life, remote from the luxuries of cities. Manf. These are few and of the most primitive description. Iron is produced in the mines, and some rude implements and tools are made, but nothing that deserves the name of manufactures, as these are now understood in larger and more advanced communities. Gov. Under the protection of Spain, but the administration is carried on by twenty-four consuls elected by the whole population. COMMERCE. Exp. Iron to Spain, and wool and skins to France. Imp. The necessaries of life; and an active contraband trade is carried on by the republic between Spain and France. Pop. variously estimated at 6,000, 10,000, and 18,000.—In 790 Charlemagne defeated the Moors in a neighbouring valley, with the assistance of the Andorrans, and from that period they date the independence of their little state. As a recompense for their services, the French monarch allowed them to make their own laws, a privilege which they have continued ever since to enjoy.

ANDOVER, ăn'-do-ver, a town of Hampshire, on a rivulet called Ande, 12 miles from Winchester. It has an ancient Gothic church, is well paved, lighted with gas, and plentifully supplied with water. Manf. Principally silk, and it has a trade in timber. Pop. 5,500.—This place gives the title of viscount to the earl of Suffolk, and is a station on the London and South-Western Railway.

ANDOVER, a small town, 21 miles from Boston, U.S. Amongst other educational establishments, there is here the Theological Seminary, having a large library, and being richly endowed.

ANDRADA, Anthony d', an-dra'-da, a Portuguese Jesuit, who, in 1624, discovered the country of Cathay and Tibet, of which he published an account. D. 1634.

ANDRÉ, John, an'-drai, originally a merchant's clerk, but quitting the counting-house for the camp, so greatly distinguished himself in the American war as to be raised to the rank of major. General Clinton had such an opinion of his address, that when the American general Arnold made a secret offer of surrendering an important post to the British, he employed Major André to negotiate the conditions. Having been taken in the performance of his mission, General Washington caused him to be tried as a spy, when he was condemned to suffer death. On going to the place of execution, he asked, with a revulsive feeling to the conceived ignominy of his end, "Must I die in this manner?" Being told it was unavoidable, he replied, "I am reconciled to my fate, but not to the mode; it will, however, be but a momentary pang." His fortitude excited the admiration and melted the hearts of the spectators. On being asked if he had anything to say: "Nothing," he replied, "but to request that you will witness to the world that I die like a brave man." The intelligence of his death was received in England with general indignation. A monument was erected to his memory in Westminster Abbey, on which is an inscription describing his virtues and merits, and recording his age and the date of his execution. B. 1751; D. 1780.

ANDRE, ST., sänt andre, the name of three small towns in Hungary, Illyria, and Savoy.

ANDREA, ST., an'-drai-a, the name of a small town of Naples, another of Calabria, and of an island in the Adriatic Sea.

ANDREA, ST., Cape, on the N. promontory of the island of Cyprus.

ANDREAS, James, an'-dre-as, an eminent German reformer, and secretary to the conference at Worms. B. at Wurtemberg, 1528; D. 1590.

ANDREAS, John, a canonist and professor of civil law at Padua and Bologna. Lived in the 14th century. —His daughter Novella, in his absence, read lectures to his pupils, and a curtain was drawn before her, that the attention of the auditors might not be taken off by her beauty. His affection for her was so great, that he entitled his commentary on the decretals of Gregory X. the "Novellæ." She married John Calderinus, a famous canonist.

ANDREAS, ST., the name of a group of islands in the Gulf of Venice, N. of Ragusa, in one of which is a small town of the same name.

ANDREASBERG, an-drai'-as-berg, a mining town of Hanover, in the Hartz, 10 miles from Clausthal. The mine is of silver, and, with some manufactories of thread and lace, employs the inhabitants. Pop. about 4,500.

ANDREOSSI, Count, an-dre-os-e, a Frenchman of Italian descent, who took an active part in the great revolution, and subsequently served under Napoleon I., and distinguished himself at the siege of Mantua. He was with Napoleon in Egypt, and was one of the few officers chosen to return with him secretly to France. He gradually rose under the Bonaparte régime, and was successively appointed ambassador at the court of Vienna, governor of Vienna, and afterwards ambassador to the Sublime Porte, where he was much esteemed both by the Turks and the Franks. On the abdication of Napoleon, in 1814, he was recalled from Constantinople, by Louis XVIII., who nevertheless conferred upon him the cross of St. Louis. He now withdrew from public life, but on the escape of his old master from Elba, he once more joined him, and during the Hundred Days was created a peer of France. After Waterloo, he again retired from public life, and employed himself in writing memoirs and reminiscences of those scenes and events which had engaged his attention whilst following the destinies of Napoleon. Several of his works are much esteemed, especially his "Constantinople and the Thracian Bosphorus." B. at Castelnaudry, 1761; D. at Montauban, 1828.

ANDREW I., ăn'-droo, king of Hungary, was the eldest son of Ladislaus the Bald. On the accession of Peter, in 1044, he and his brother Bala were obliged to quit Hungary; but on promising to abolish Christianity and to restore paganism, they were recalled. When Andrew, however, obtained the throne, he broke his engagement, and compelled his subjects to turn Christians. He was defeated and slain by his brother in 1059.—There were other kings of Hungary of this name, but there is nothing important to record of them.

ANDREW, ST. (See SAINT ANDREW.)

ANDREWS, Lancelot, ăn'-droos, an English prelate, who became chaplain to Queen Elizabeth, and who was employed by James I. to defend the sovereignty of kings against Bellarmine, who had attacked it under the name of Matthew Tortus. Dr. Andrews did this in a piece called "Tortura Torti," for which he was made almoner to the king, a privy councillor, dean of the chapel royal, and successively bishop of Chichester, Ely, and Winchester. B. in London, 1565; D. 1626.—It is of this bishop that the following anecdote is told. Waller the poet was one day at court, while King James was at dinner, who was attended by the bishop of Winchester, and Neale, bishop of Durham. His majesty said to the prelates, "My lords, cannot I take my subjects' money when I want it, without all this formality in parliament?" Bishop Neale quickly replied, "God forbid, sir, that you shouldn't; you are the breath of our nostrils." On which the king said to the bishop of Winchester, "Well, my lord, and what say you?" "Sir," replied Bishop Andrews, "I have no skill to judge of parliamentary cases." The king answered, "No put-offs, my lord; answer me presently." "Then, sir," said he, "I think it lawful for you to take brother Neale's money, for he offers it." He had a share in the translation of the present version of the Bible.

ANDREWS, ST., Scotland and United States. (See ST. ANDREWS.)

ANDREZIEUX, an-dres'-e-u(r), a town of France, in the department of Loire. It is a great coal depôt, and a terminus of the St. Etienne and Andrezieux Railway. Pop. 1,000.

ANDRIA, an'-dre-a, a town of Naples, built in a plain, the seat of a bishop, and having a large almond trade. Pop. 24,000.

ANDRIEUX, François-Guillaume-Jean-Stanislas, an'-dre-u(r), a professor of belles-lettres in Paris, who distinguished himself by the independence of his views during the Revolution. He became professor of literature in the College of France, and exceedingly popular as a lecturer. B. at Strasburg, 1759; D. at Paris, 1833.—He wrote fifteen plays and several professional works.

ANDRINOPLE. (See ADRIANOPLE.)

ANDROMACHE, ăn-drom'-a-ke, the wife of Hector of Troy, whom she loved with great tenderness. The parting of her and her husband during the siege in which he fell, is considered amongst the most beautiful and pathetic passages of the Iliad.

ANDROMACHUS, ăn-drom'-a-kus, physician to the emperor Nero, and the inventor of a celebrated compound medicine called theriake, described in Galen's works.—Lived in the 1st century A.D.

ANDRONICUS, Comnenus, ăn-dro-ni'-kus, a Greek emperor, grandson of Alexis Comnenus, put to death by his own subjects, 1185. There are other two emperors of this name, whose lives present nothing remarkable.

ANDRONICUS, Cyrestes, an Athenian, who first applied himself to the study of the winds. He built the famous octagonal Temple of the Winds at Athens, and was the inventor of weathercocks.

ANDRONICUS, Livius, the oldest dramatic author in the Latin language. His first piece was performed about 240 years before Christ. His works are lost.

ANDRONICUS of Rhodes, a Peripatetic philosopher, to whom we are indebted for restoring and publishing the works of Aristotle, in the time of Sylla.—Lived 63 B.C.

ANDROS, ăn'-dros, the most northern island of the Cyclades, in the Greek Archipelago. Ext. 25 miles long and 6 broad. Desc. Mountainous, and fertile in the valleys. Pro. Corn, fruit, wine, and silk. Pop. about 14,000. Lat. 37° 50′ N. Lon. 24° 50′ E.

ANDROS, the capital of the above island, situate on its east coast. Pop. 5,000.

ANDROS ISLANDS, a range of islands among the Bahamas, extending about 120 miles from N. to S. Pop. about 1,000, mostly coloured. Lat. between 23° 21 and 25° 10′ N. Lon. 77° 30′ and 78° 32′ W.

ANDROSCOGGIN, ăn′-dro-scog′-in, a river of Maine, U.S., which rises in Umbagog lake, and falls into the Atlantic 20 miles from Portland. Length, 150 miles.

ANDROUET DU CERCEAU, James, an′-droo-ai doo seerso, a French architect, who designed the grand gallery of the Louvre, the Pont-neuf, and many other noble erections. Lived in the 16th century.

ANDUJAR, an-doosh′-ar, a town of Andalusia, Spain, 20 miles from Jaen. Manf. Principally delfware. Pop. about 10,000.—Here, in 1808, the convention of Baylen was signed; and in 1823 the decree of the duc d'Angoulême, when he assumed for the French authority over Spain.

ANDUSE, a town of France, 6 miles from Alais, in the department of the Gard. Manf. Woollen stuffs, stockings, and hats. Pop. 5,000, chiefly Protestants.

ANER, ai′-ner, 'answer,' 'song,' 'affliction,' or 'light;' a Canaanite chief, who confederated with Abraham.

ANERLEY, ăn′-er-le, a small town and station on the London and Brighton Railway, 7 miles from London.

ANET, a′-nai, a town of France, department of the Eure and Loire. Pop. 1,500.—The plain of Ivry, where, in 1590, Henry IV. gained a complete victory over the armies of the League under Mayenne, is in this neighbourhood.

ANEURIN, ăn-u′-rin, a British poet, called the sovereign of bards and of flowing muse. He was a chieftain among the Olodinian Britons, who bore a conspicuous part in the battle of Cattraeth, which he made the subject of a poem, to be found in the Welsh Archæology, with another piece of his, entitled the "Odes of the Months," being all that is preserved of his works. D. 570 A.D.—It is supposed, with some plausibility, that Aneurin was the celebrated Gildas, the ecclesiastical historian.

ANGELO. (See BUONAROTTI.)

ANGELO, ST., an′-shai-lo, a town of Naples, 20 miles from Avellino. Pop. 6,500.—This is the name of several other smaller towns in Italy.

ANGELONI, Luigi, an′-shai-lo′-ne, an Italian, who took an active part in the affairs of the Roman states during their occupation by the French army under Berthier and Massena. In 1799 he became an emigrant, and went to Paris, where he entered into some secret plans of conspiracy against the government of Napoleon I.; but as no proof could be brought against him, he was released. On the overthrow of Napoleon, he was the first to claim for his country the restitution of the paintings, sculptures, and manuscripts of which she had been despoiled by the French in 1797-8. In 1823 he was shipped to England on account of suspicions being excited against him in reference to the political movements of Naples and Piedmont. B. 1758, at Frosinone; D. at London, 1842.

ANGERBURG, an′-ger-boorg, a town of East Prussia, 55 miles from Konigsberg. Manf. Principally woollens. Pop. 3,500.

ANGERMANNLAND, an′-ger-man-land, or ANGERMANIA, an old and extensive district of Sweden, now part of the province of West Nordland, 150 miles in length and 100 in breadth.

ANGERMUNDE, an′-ger-munde, a town of Brandenburg, Prussia, 42 miles from Berlin. Manf. Hosiery and woollen cloth. Pop. about 5,000.—It is a station on the Berlin and Stettin Railway.

ANGERONA, ăn′-je-ro′-na, the goddess of silence.

ANGERS, ansh′-air, a handsome city of France, 160 miles from Paris, formerly the capital of Anjou, and now of the department of the Maine and Loire. It had, before the Revolution, a celebrated university, and an academy of great celebrity, and two commanderies of the order of Malta. The cathedral church is accounted one of the finest in France. Manf. Fine camlets, serge, and other stuffs, hats, and all sorts of leather goods. There are some sugar and wax refineries, and it has a considerable trade in corn, wine, and slates, quarried in the neighbourhood. Pop. 47,000. Lat. 47° 28′ N. Lon. 0° 33′ 10″ W.—Angers is divided by the Mayenne into an upper and lower town, and is surrounded by an old wall, converted into boulevards and planted with trees. In its military college both Lord Chatham and the Duke of Wellington studied, and it is the birthplace of David the sculptor, and Bernier the traveller. In 1793 it was the scene of several sanguinary conflicts. It is connected with Paris by railway.

ANGERSTEIN, Julius, ăn′-ger-stine, a Russian, who, coming to London, became an eminent merchant, and a member of Lloyd's Coffee-house. He was remarkable for the practically benevolent tone of his public spirit, and was the first to propose a reward of £2,000 from the fund at Lloyd's to the inventor of lifeboats. He was a great patron of the fine arts, and his collection of paintings was purchased by the British government for £60,000, and formed the nucleus of the National Gallery. B. at St. Petersburg, 1735; D. at London, 1823.

ANGHIARI, an′-ge-a′-re, a well-built town of Italy, in the grand duchy of Tuscany, standing in a district fertile in producing vines, olives, and grain. Pop. about 7,000.

ANGLES, or ANGLE, angl, the name of a number of small towns and communes in France.

ANGLESEY, or ANGLESEA, ăn′-gel-se, an island and county of North Wales, in the Irish Sea, separated from the mainland by a narrow strait called Menai, across which there is a bridge of the same name. (See MENAI STRAITS.) Ext. 20 miles long and 17 broad. Area, 173,440 acres. Desc. Its form is triangular, whilst its land is mostly uninclosed, though well cultivated, and yielding the usual cerealia. It is well supplied with fish. Rivers or Streams. The principal are the Alam, Braint, Cefni, Fraw, and Dulas. Manf. Trifling; but its copper and lead mines, from the time of their discovery in 1768 to 1800, were the most important in the kingdom. Since that period they have declined. Towns. Beaumaris, Amlwch, and Holyhead. Pop. about 58,000.—This island is the Mona of Tacitus, and was the last stronghold of the Druids, of whose works it has many remains. Curious stone tables are to be seen in it; and there are several remains of architectural and monumental antiquities in the island. Coins, implements, and arms, both Roman and British, are still occasionally found.

ANGLESEY, earl of, Annesley, Arthur, a native of Dublin, who, in the Civil War, joined the royalist party, and, in 1643, sat in the parliament at Oxford; but afterwards made his peace with the parliamentarians, and was dispatched as a commissioner to Ulster. He took an active part in the restoration of Charles II., for which he was created earl of Anglesey, and in 1667 was made treasurer of the navy. He subsequently became lord privy seal, and in 1680 was accused by Dangerfield, at the bar of the House of Commons, of endeavouring to stifle evidence concering the popish plot. In 1682 he presented a spirited remonstrance to Charles II., relative to the state of the nation, and the danger to be apprehended from the duke of York's being a papist. Soon after this he was dismissed from office, when he retired to his country seat, where he died, leaving several children. B. 1614; D. 1686.—He wrote a "History of the Troubles of Ireland," from 1641 to 1660, which is lost; but his Memoirs, published in 1608, 8vo, are full of interesting matter.

ANGLESEY, marquis of, Henry William Paget, was the eldest son of the first earl of Uxbridge, and at an early age entered upon a military life. On the breaking out of the revolutionary war in 1793, he raised among his father's tenantry a regiment, which was at first called the Staffordshire militia, but was subsequently admitted into the regular army as the 80th foot. Of this regiment he became lieutenant-colonel, and in 1794 was with the duke of York in Flanders, where he greatly distinguished himself. When he returned to England, he was appointed to the command of a cavalry regiment, and devoted himself so successfully to his military duties, as to be recognized as the first cavalry officer in the service. He continued to be actively engaged throughout the wars with Napoleon. On the death of his father, in 1812, he succeeded to the title of earl of Uxbridge. At Waterloo he led the final charge which destroyed the French Guards, and near the close of the battle received a shot in the knee, which caused him the loss of his limb. It was for his services in this great conflict that he was created a marquis, and made a knight of the Grand Cross of the order of the Bath. In 1818 he was elected a knight of the Garter, and in the following year was made a general of the army. In 1842 he was made colonel of the Horse Guards, and in 1846 was appointed field marshal. B. 1768; D. 1854.

ANGLI, ăn'-gli, an ancient people of Germany, from whom the English name is derived.

ANGOLA, ăn-go'-la, a state of western Africa, situate immediately S. of Congo. Its area has not been accurately defined, although a country of considerable importance. Desc. Flat and sterile along the coast, but mountainous in the interior, where the valleys are extremely fertile. Rivers. The principal are the Coanza, Bengo, and Danda. The country generally is well watered with numerous smaller streams. Zoology. Lions, tigers, elephants, rhinoceroses, and almost all the known wild animals of tropical Africa. Birds, reptiles, and insects are numerous. The rivers are infested with crocodiles, and the seacoasts teem with almost every description of fish. Hares, rabbits, antelopes, stags, and goats are abundant, and for domestic purposes, the horse, the ass, and the cow are in use. Climate. Although situate near the equator, this is, on account of the trade-winds, more temperate and healthy than other regions in the same latitude. Pro. Rice, millet, sugar, mandioca, potatoes, yams, and all kinds of tropical fruits. Minerals. Iron, gold, and copper; though none of these have, as yet, been produced in large quantities. Its chief town is Loanda Sah Paulo. Pop. estimated at 2,000,000, whose religion is chiefly Fetishism. Lat. between 8° 20′ and 9° 20′ S. Lon. extending from 14° to 19° E.—Angola was, in 1186, discovered by the Portuguese, who began to form settlements in it, and who still hold it, and traffic with the natives in ivory and other native products. It has been for its extensive traffic in slaves, however, that Angola has been principally notorious. (See LOANDA and BENGUELA.)

ANGORA, or ENKURE, an'-gor'-a, a city of Asia Minor, standing on a hill, at the distance of 142 miles from Konieh. It is a place containing extensive remains, of which its citadel is built. Here the famous Monumentum Ancyranum, erected in honour of Augustus, stood. It was constructed of white marble. Manf. Chiefly yarn and stuffs from the wool of the Angora goat. It has also a trade in grain, honey, wax, goat-hides, and Angora cat-skins. Pop. about 12,000, composed of Armenians, Mahometans, Greeks, and Jews. Lat. 39° 56′ N. Lon. 32° 50′ E.

ANGORNOW, an-gor'-no, a town of Bornou, situate on the west bank of Lake Tchad, in Central Africa. It is nothing more than a straggling aggregation of mud huts, but it is the centre of a large trade in cotton, amber, coral, and slaves. Pop. estimated at 25,000.

ANGOSTURA, an-gos-too'-ra, a city of Venezuela, S. America. Pop. 6,000.

ANGOULEME, an'-goo-laim, a town of France, on the Charente, 66 miles from Bordeaux. It is meanly built, and has an old castle, a cathedral, and a public library containing 65,000 volumes. Manf. Earthenware and serges, and it has some distilleries, a foundry for cannon-balls, and paper-mills. Pop. 22,000.—It is the birthplace of Margaret of Navarre, Balsac, and Montalembert, and is a station on the railway which runs from Paris to Bordeaux.

ANGOULEME, duke of, Charles de Valois, was the illegitimate son of Charles XI. Catherine de Medici bequeathed to him her estates of Auvergne and Lauragnais, when he married the daughter of Henry Montmorenci, constable of France. The will of Catherine, however, was set aside in favour of Margaret of Valois. Charles retained the title of count d'Auvergne, and in 1619 was created duke of Angoulême. He was actuated by a restless and an ambitious spirit, and, as a military commander, acquired considerable reputation. In 1628, the siege of Rochelle was commenced under him, and he was engaged in the wars of Germany, Languedoc, and Flanders. B. 1573; D. 1650.

ANGRA, an'-gra, a seaport-town, the capital of Terceira, one of the Azores. It was formerly very strong, and the fortifications on these islands have been extended. The town contains a cathedral, some monasteries and nunneries, also the royal magazines of naval stores. Pop. 12,000. Lat. 38° 39′ N. Lon. 27° 14′ W.

ANGUILLA, an-guil'-a, one of the leeward West-India islands. Area, 35 square miles. Pop. upwards of 3,000.

ANGUISCIOLA, Sofonisba, an-ge'-se-o'-la, a celebrated female painter of Cremona. She was patronized by Philip II. of Spain, and Vandyck said that he was taught more by her conversation than he had learned from the study of the works of the great masters. She was twice married, and became blind in her old days. A portrait of her is said to be at Althorp, Northamptonshire, in which she is represented as playing on the harpsichord. B. 1533; D. at Genoa, 1626.

ANGUS. (See FORFAR, county of.)

ANGUS, ăn'-gus, earls of, several members of the Douglas family, who, under the reign of the Stuarts in Scotland, distinguished themselves by the fierceness with which they exercised the great power which they possessed.

ANHALT, an'-halt, a principality of central Germany, surrounded by Prussian Saxony. Area, 1,077 square miles. This measurement embraces Anhalt-Bernburg in the west, Anhalt-Dessau in the east, and Anhalt-Kothen in the middle. Desc. Fertile in the centre, hilly in the south, and barren in the east. Rivers. The principal are the Elbe and the Salle. Forests. Considerable. Those of Bernburg occupy 50 square miles. Manf. Woollens chiefly, and a trade in earthen and metallic wares is carried on. The chief exports, however, consist of raw material, and the inhabitants may be considered as agricultural in their pursuits. Pop. 164,000, chiefly Protestant.

ANHALT, princes and dukes of, one of the oldest Saxon dynasties in northern Germany, now separated into the branches of Anhalt-Dessau and Anhalt-Bernburg, both of which have the title of Duke. Several of its members have greatly distinguished themselves in the European wars.

ANHOLT, an'-holt, a small Danish island in the Cattegat, between Lessoe and Zealand, on which is a lighthouse. Pop. about 300. Lat. 56° 39′ N. Lon. 11° 35′ E.—In 1811, the Danes made an unsuccessful attempt on this island, then in possession of the British.

ANICHINI, Lewis, an'-e-ke'-ne, a native of Ferrara, in Italy, who made for Pope Paul III. a medal, on which was represented the interview between Alexander the Great and the high-priest at Jerusalem, so exquisitely engraved that Michael Angelo, on examining it, exclaimed that the art had arrived at the height of perfection. Lived in the middle of the 16th century.

ANIELLO. (See MASSANIELLO.)

ANIGRUS, ă-ni'-grus, a Thessalian river, in which the Centaurs with whom Hercules had fought, washed their wounds.

ANIUS, ă-ni'-us, the father of three daughters, Œno, Spermo, and Elais, to whom Bacchus gave the power of changing everything they pleased into corn, wine, and oil, and who were themselves subsequently changed by Bacchus into doves.

ANJOU, anzh-oo, the name of an ancient province and government of France, now forming the departments of the Maine and Loire, and parts of the Indre and Loire, the Sarthe, and the Mayenne.

ANJOU, counts and dukes of, one of the earliest noble families of France, some of whose members have greatly distinguished themselves. In the 13th century, Charles, fourth son of Louis VIII., began the second branch of the house of Anjou, and became the head of the Guelphic party in Italy. He endeavoured by crushing the Ghibelins, to found an empire in Italy, but was unsuccessful. Whilst engaged in this work, the celebrated massacre, historically known as the "Sicilian Vespers," took place; in which 4,000 of his French soldiers were butchered by the Sicilians in Palermo, on the Easter Monday of 1282. He had laid siege to Messina, where his fleet was captured by the admiral of Peter of Aragon, who had assumed the title of king of Sicily. This event filled him with fury, and he sent a challenge to Peter to meet him in single combat. In order to gain time, the challenge was accepted, though subsequently declined; shortly after which Charles died, in his 75th year, 1285.—He was by far the most distinguished of his house.

ANJOU, François de France, duke of, youngest son of Henry II. and Catherine de Medici. He was first called duke of Alençon, and was of a treacherous, unstable disposition, although it is said that he was a friend of Admiral Coligny, and expressed his abhorrence of the massacre of St. Bartholomew. In 1575 he was at the head of the Huguenot army, and, peace being soon concluded, the duchies of Anjou, Touraine, and Berri were transferred to him. In 1581, such of the Netherland states as were under the control of William of Orange, elected him sovereign, in the hope of obtaining the assistance of the French against the Spaniards, and he was one of the numerous suitors of Queen Elizabeth. The virgin monarch, however, dismissed him, and, becoming an object of suspicion in the Low Countries, he was finally expelled from the country. B. 1554; D. 1584.

ANKARSTROM, John James, an-kar'-strom, a Swedish regicide, who conspired against Gustavus III., king of Sweden, whom he shot with a pistol at a masked ball. He confessed the crime, for which he stood in the pillory three times, was publicly scourged, had his right hand cut off, and lastly, was beheaded, in 1792.

ANKLAM, ank'-lam, the chief town of the circle of the same name, in Pomerania, 36 miles from Stralsund. Manf. Principally woollens and linens. Pop. 9,000.

ANKOBAR, an-ko'-bar, an Abyssinian town in the state of Shoa, built on a mountain 8,198 feet above the level of the sea. Pop. estimated between 12,000 and 15,000, living in thatched houses shaded with trees.

ANNA, ăn'-a, the wife of Tobit, and his support in his poverty.—The daughter of Phanuel, and a prophetess.—The mother of the Blessed Virgin, and the wife of Joachim.

ANNA, a goddess of nourishment, to whom the Romans instituted festivals.

ANNA COMNENA, ăn'-a kom-ne-na, daughter of the emperor Alexis Comnenus I., a princess of extraordinary talents, who, for conspiring against her brother the emperor, was forced from court into retirement, where she employed herself in writing the history of her father's reign. This work has great merit, and is still extant. B. 1083; D. 1148. (See ALEXIS I.)

ANNA IVANOVNA, e'-van-ov'-na, empress of Russia, was the daughter of the czar Ivan Alexiovitch, who, on the death of her husband, Frederick William, duke of Courland, took into favour Ernest John Biren, a man of low origin, by whom she was ruled in an arbitrary manner during the remainder of her life. In 1730 she ascended the throne of Russia, but Biren managed all the affairs of government, and is said to have banished upwards of 20,000 persons to Siberia. B. 1693; D. 1740.—Anna left the crown to her grandnephew Ivan.

ANNABERG, ST., an-a-berg, a mining town of Saxony, in the circle of the Erzgebirge, in Misnia. Manf. Silk ribbons and fine lace; but its inhabitants are principally occupied in its mines, which produce tin, silver, and cobalt. Pop. 7,000.

ANNAGH, a-na', a small island on the west coast of Ireland, between the isle of Achill and the mainland of the county of Mayo.

ANNAGHDOWN, a-na-down, a parish of Connaught, Ireland, 7 miles from Galway. Area, 23,730 acres. Pop. 4,500.

ANNALIS LEX, ăn-ai-lis lex, settled the age at which a Roman citizen could exercise the offices of the state.

ANNAMBOE, ăn'-am-bo', a seaport-town on the Gold Coast, Western Africa, 10 miles from Cape Coast Castle. Gold is its principal trade. Pop. 3,000.

ANNAN, ăn-ăn, a small river in Scotland, rising in the Hartfell, traversing Dumfriesshire, and falling into the Solway Frith.

ANNAN, a borough, seaport, and parish of Scotland, in the county of Dumfries, situate on the river Annan, about 2 miles from the Solway Frith. Area, 16,000 acres. It has a good harbour, and carries on a considerable coasting trade: foreign timber is also imported. It has also an excellent salmon-fishery at the mouth of the river. Manf. Cotton goods; and has rope-walks, and exports provisions to England. Pop. 6,000.—It is a station on the Carlisle and Glasgow Railway.

ANNANDALE, ăn'-an-dail, a district of Scotland, in Dumfriesshire, on both sides of Annan river. Ext. 30 miles long, and from 15 to 18 broad. It contains many Roman antiquities.

ANNAPOLIS, ă-năp'-o-lis, a city of Maryland, U.S., on the S. bank of the Severn, 30 miles S. of Baltimore. Pop. upwards of 3,000.—There is a town of the same name in Nova Scotia; and although the first European settlement in this part of America, it has never flourished. It was settled in 1604, and has an excellent harbour, though somewhat difficult of entrance.

ANNE of Cleves, ăn, the wife of Henry VIII., king of England, was the daughter of John III., duke of Cleves. She was designated the "Flanders mare" by Henry VIII., and divorced by him. She had philosophy sufficient, however, not to take these circumstances much to heart, although she returned to her native country. D. 1557.

ANNE, queen of Great Britain, was the second daughter of James II., by Lady Anne Hyde, daughter of the great earl of Clarendon. In 1683 she married Prince George of Denmark, by whom she had several children, but all of whom died young. In 1702, on the death of William III., she succeeded to the crown. Her reign was a continual scene of public glory; and the domineering power of the French nation was completely subdued by the vigour of the British troops under the command of the duke of Marlborough. B. 1664; D. 1714.—One of the greatest events of this important reign was the union of Scotland with England. On account of the number of eminent literary characters who flourished in her reign, it has been called the Augustan age of Britain. Queen Anne, though too much the dupe of her ministers and favourites, will ever stand distinguished for the general excellence of her private character.

ANNECY, an'-e-ne, a lake of Savoy, 9 miles long, and between 1 and 2 broad. It is 1,426 feet above the sea-level.

ANNECY, the capital of the Savoy part of the duchy of Genevois, on the lake of the same name, 24 miles from Geneva. Its principal edifices are a bishop's palace and a cathedral. Manf. Printed calicoes, glass, and steel wares. Pop. from 8,000 to 9,000.

ANNEYRON, an'-ai-rong, a town of France, in the department of Drôme. Pop. above 3,000.—Here are the vestiges of a castle, in which Boson was crowned king of Burgundy in 879.

ANNONAY, an'-o-nai, a town and parish of France, in the department Ardèche, at the confluence of the Deaume and the Cance. Manf. Woollen, worsted, cotton, and paper. Pop. 13,500.—It is the birthplace of Boissy d'Anglas and Montgolfier.

ANOOPSHEHR, a-noop-sher, the 'incomparable city,' a town of Hindostan, province of Delhi, on the Ganges. Lat. 28° 21 N. Lon. 78° 13' E. Pop. 8,900.

ANSELM, ăn'-selm, a distinguished archbishop of Canterbury, who took an active part in all that related to the church. B. at Aosta, in Piedmont, 1033; D. at Canterbury, 1109.—He was the first archbishop who restrained the English clergy from marrying, in a synod held at Westminster in 1102.

ANSON, George, General, ăn-son, commander-in-chief of the British forces in India during the earlier period of the Sepoy mutiny of 1857. He was advancing with his troops from Umballa to Delhi, when he was seized with cholera at Kurnaul, where he died, 27th May. It has been said that he was interred without even an ordinary salute.

ANSON, George, Lord, an eminent naval commander, who went to sea at a very early age, and in 1724 was made post-captain. In 1739 he was chosen commander of an expedition against the Spanish settlements in South America, and sailed from Portsmouth with five men-of-war, a sloop, and two victualling-vessels. In 1741 he doubled Cape Horn, after losing two of his ships. In June following he arrived off Juan Fernandez, with only two ships and two tenders; and having been successful in taking several rich prizes, and in causing much damage to the enemy, he returned to England in 1744, when, for his distinguished services against the Spanish, he was made rear-admiral of the blue, and one of the lords of the Admiralty. He was also chosen member of parliament for the borough of Heydon. In 1747 he commanded the Channel fleet, and captured six French men-of-war and four East-Indiamen. For these services he was created Lord Anson, and on the death of Sir John Norris, was named vice-admiral of England. In 1751 he was appointed first lord of the Admiralty, which post he held, with a short interval, till his death. In 1758 he again commanded the Channel fleet, having under him the gallant Sir Edward Hawke. After this he was appointed admiral and commander-in-chief of the British fleet. B. in the parish of Colwich, Staffordshire, 1697; D. at Moor Park, Hertfordshire, 1762.—He is the hero of the well-known book called "Anson's Voyage round the World," which was written by a Mr. Benjamin Robins, from information furnished by Lord Anson.

ANSON, a county of North Carolina, United States, watered by the Rocky River. Area, 760 square miles. Pop. 14,000, of whom about one half are slaves.

ANSON, BAY OF, in the Canton river, China, situate between the headlands Chuenpe and Anunghoy, where the Chinese fleet was destroyed by the British in 1841.

ANSPACH, or ANSBACH, ans-pak, a fortified city and considerable district of Franconia, included in the circles of the Rezat and the Upper Danube. Manf. Silk and cotton stuffs, earthenware, tobacco, cards, white lead, and cutlery. Pop. about 17,000. Lat. 49° 12′ N. Lon. 10° 33′ E.

ANSTER, John, D.C.L., ăn'-ster, an eminent German scholar, and regius professor of civil law in the university of Dublin. His translations from German literature, especially that of Goethe's "Faust," have been received with great favour. Mr. Anster has also been a large contributor to periodical literature in the leading magazines. B. at Charleville, Cork, 1793.

ANSTEY, Christopher, ăn'-ste, a fellow of King's College, Cambridge, and the author of the New Bath Guide, which, according to the statement of Dodsley, its publisher, was the most profitable book he ever sold within a certain period of time, and on this account he afterwards restored the copyright to the author, although he had purchased it—an instance of uncommon generosity. B. 1724; D. at Chippenham, 1805.

ANSTEY, a name common to several English parishes with small populations.

ANSTIS, John, ăn'-stis, an English antiquary, who obtained the appointment of Garter king-at-arms, and the post of genealogist and register of the Bath. B. at St. Neots, Cornwall, 1669; D. 1754.—He wrote several works illustrative of the orders of knighthood.

ANSTRUTHER, EASTER and WESTER, ăn-struth'-er, two small burghs and seaports of Scotland, in Fife, on the north shore of the Frith of Forth, 13 miles from Cupar. Pop. about 1,800.—In Easter Anstruther the late Dr. Chalmers was born.

ANTÆUS, ăn'-tai-ē'-us, the son of Neptune and Terra, a famous giant killed by Hercules.

ANTAKIA, ăn-tā'-ki-a, the modern name of Antioch. (See ANTIOCH.)

ANTARCTIC SEA, ăn-tark'-tik, that portion of the great ocean extending from lat. 60° 30′ S. to the south pole.

ANTENOR, ăn-tē'-nor, a Trojan prince, who urged the Greeks to make the wooden horse, which, through his influence, was taken within the walls of Troy.

ANTEQUERA, an'-tai-kai'-ra, a city of Andalusia, Spain, 28 miles from Malaga. It has a Moorish castle, churches, monasteries, nunneries, and some vestiges of antiquity. Manf. Woollen, silk, cotton, and paper. Pop. 17,000, chiefly employed in agricultural pursuits.

ANTEROS, ăn-ter'-os, one of the names of Cupid.

ANTHON, Charles, LL.D., ăn'-thon, a well-known American Greek scholar, rector of the College Grammar-school, New York. B. at New York, 1797.

ANTHROPOPHAGI, ăn'-thro-pof'-a-ji, a Scythian people, who lived on human flesh.

ANTIAS, ăn'-tē-ăs, the goddess of fortune.

ANTIBES, an'-teeb, a town of France, department of the Var, at the termination of a peninsula running into the Mediterranean. Pop. about 6,000, principally engaged in the sardine-fishery and the manufacture of earthenware. Lat. 43° 35′ N. Lon. 6° 47′ E.—This town is encompassed by orange, olive, and vine plantations, and was founded by a Greek colony, 340 B.C.

ANTICOSTI, ăn'-ti-kos'-te, a large island at the mouth of the St. Lawrence. Ext. 125 miles long, and in its widest part 30 broad. Area, estimated at about 2,500 square miles. Desc. Well wooded, though mountainous. There are no harbours of any note on the northern coast, whilst that of the south is low and dangerous. On its S.W. point there is a lighthouse 100 feet high. Lat. between 49° and 50° N. Lon. between 62° and 65° W.—In 1535 this island was first discovered by Jacques Cartier.

ANTIGONE, ăn-tig'-o-ne, a daughter of Laomedon, who, for preferring her own beauty to that of Juno, was changed into a stork.

ANTIGONUS I., ăn-tig'-o-nus, a Macedonian captain, who, on the death of Alexander the Great, obtained the provinces of Pamphylia, Lydia, and Phrygia Major, after which his ambition led him to enlarge his territories. He finally conquered Asia. He was slain in a battle which he fought with Seleucus and Lysimachus at Ipsus, in the 84th year of his age, 301 B.C.

ANTIGONUS GONATUS, son of Demetrius Poliorcetes, and grandson of the above, was a prince distinguished by his filial piety and his extraordinary humanity. D. 243 B.C.

ANTIGONUS DOSON, king of Macedon, succeeded his brother Demetrius II., defeated Cleomenes, and took the city of Sparta. He also repelled the Illyrians, who had invaded his territories. D. 221 B.C.

ANTIGONUS SOCHÆUS, the founder of the Jewish sect of the Sadducees, about 300 years B.C.

ANTIGUA, ăn-tee'-ga, one of the Leeward West-India islands. Ext. 21 miles long, about the same in breadth, and 50 miles in circumference. Area, 440 square miles. Desc. Richly diversified with hill and dale, whilst its rugged coasts are deeply indented with numerous bays. Pro. Sugar, rice, arrow-root, and tobacco. Large quantities of rum and molasses are made and exported. Climate. Healthy, although remarkably dry. Towns. St. John, Falmouth, and Parham. St. John is the capital, and the residence of the governor of the Leeward islands. Pop. about 37,000. Lat. between 17° and 17° 12′ N. Lon. between 61° 38′ and 61° 53′ W.—In 1493 this island was discovered by Columbus, and in 1632 was first settled by a few English families. In 1834, within the island, slavery was totally abolished by the legislature.

ANTILIBANUS, ăn'-ti-li-bai'-nus, one of the mountain-ranges of Palestine, which partially incloses the valley of Cœlesyria.

ANTILLES, ăn-til'-es, a cluster of islands in the West Indies, distinguished into the Windward and Leeward islands, and into Greater and Less. The Greater comprehend Cuba, Hispaniola, Jamaica, and Porto Rico; and the Less, Antigua, Barbadoes, St. Christophers, Guadaloupe, Martinico, Granada, Trinidad, St. Thomas, Santa Cruz, Dominica, St. Vincent, Tobago, St. Lucie, &c., all of which will receive special notice under their respective headings.

ANTILOCHUS, ăn-til'-o-kus, the son of Nestor by Eurydice, slain by Memnon at the siege of Troy.

ANTINOUS, ăn-tin'-o-us, a Bithynian youth, the favourite of the emperor Adrian, who erected a city to his memory, and named it Antinopolis.

ANTIOCH, ăn'-te-ok', now called Antakia or Antakie, a city of Syria, situate on the south bank of the river Orontes, 57 miles from Aleppo. It is surrounded by walls, inclosing a space of several miles in circumference, a great portion of which is now occupied as gardens. Only a small portion of the original city, of which the extent is ascertained by the line of walls, is contained within their present inclosure. Antioch is restricted to one corner, in its modern state. The streets are narrow, with very elevated footpaths on each side. The houses are built of stone, and have sloping roofs, a circumstance unusual in the East. On the whole, the general appearance of the place is dull and monotonous. Although there are upwards of a dozen mosques, it is said that there is not a single Christian church; yet it was here that the designation of Christians was first applied to the followers of our Saviour. Its baths and bazaars are numerous. Manf. Leather, coarse pottery, cotton stuffs, and silk. This last is the principal branch of industry. A great deal of it is exported to France. Goats' wool, yellow berries, and salted eels are also articles of export. Pop. about 10,000. Lat. 36° 11′ N. Lon. 36° 9′ E.—Antioch was founded by Antigonus, and continued a splendid city during the whole period of Roman greatness. It has at various times been almost completely overthrown by earthquakes. In the contests which took place between the rival empires of Rome and Persia, Antioch was taken and plundered in the year 242 by Sapor, king of Persia. On two subsequent occasions it was attacked and taken by the same monarch, who demolished all its public edifices. In the 6th century it again fell into the hands of the Persians, by whom it was sacked; and in 634 it was captured by the Saracens, from whom it was recovered by the Romans, in whose possession it remained until conquered by the Turks. Towards the close of the 11th century, the crusaders made themselves masters of it. It was the scene of many conflicts; but was finally taken, in 1268, by the sultan of Babylon, on which occasion 15,000 citizens were killed, and 100,000 carried into captivity. Antioch was afterwards incorporated with the Turkish empire, but never regained its pristine celebrity.

ANTIOCH, BAY OF, in the Mediterranean, commanded by mountains 5,000 feet high. Lat. between 35° and 36° N. Lon. 36° E.

ANTIOCHUS III., ăn-tī'-o-kus, the Great, was the son of Seleucus Callinicus; and on the death of his brother Seleucus Ceraunus, 225 B.C., succeeded to the crown. Being defeated by Ptolemy Philopater at Raphia, he was forced to cede to him Palestine and Cœlesyria. He afterwards marched to India, where his success was such as to procure him the title of "great." On the death of Ptolemy Philopater, Antiochus recovered Palestine and Cœlesyria, and reduced a great part of upper Asia. At this the free cities of Greece became alarmed, and applied to the Romans for aid, while Hannibal sought the protection of Antiochus. After several embassies between the king and the republic, hostilities commenced, in which the armies of Greece, under the two Scipios, were victorious, and Antiochus was forced to make an ignoble peace. D. 187 B.C.—There were several other sovereigns of this name, who lived both before and after the above.

ANTIOCO, an-te'-o-ko, a fertile island lying to the S.W. of Sardinia, in the Mediterranean. Ext. 8 miles long and 3 broad. Pop. 2,300.

ANTIOQUIA, SANTA FE' DE, an-te-o-ke'-a, a town of New Grenada, S. America. It is the principal town of a district trading in sugar and maize. Pop. 3,500.

ANTIPAROS, an-tip'-a-ros, an island in the Grecian archipelago, between Paros and Siphanto, 16 miles in circuit. Lat. 37° 2′ N. Lon. 25° 13′ E.

ANTIPATER, an-tip'-a-ter, a native of Macedon, pupil of Aristotle, and the faithful minister of Philip and Alexander. While Alexander was abroad, he left Antipater in the government of Macedon; and by his prudent management he preserved Greece tranquil. On the death of his master, Antipater obtained the European provinces. Not long after, the confederate states of Greece attacked him; but he subdued them, and subverted their democratic forms of government; on which he was called the father of Greece. His last advice to his successor was "never to admit a woman to meddle in state affairs." D. 318 B.C.—There were two other kings of this name.

ANTIPHON, ăn'-ti-fon, the Rhamnusian, an Athenian orator, and the first to lay down rules of oratory. He is said to have assisted in establishing the tyranny of the four hundred, for which he was put to death, 411 B.C.—There are sixteen orations under his name, in the collection of ancient orators.

ANTIPODES, ăn-tip'-o-dēz, a small island, so called from being the land the most nearly opposite to Great Britain, in the S. Pacific Ocean. Lat. 49° 32′ S. Lon. 178° E.

ANTISANA, an-te-sa'-na, a hamlet in the Andes, of the kingdom of Quito, 13,500 feet above the level of the sea. It is the highest inhabited place on the surface of the globe.

ANTISTHENES, ăn-tis'-the-nēz, an Athenian philosopher, and founder of the sect of the Cynics. He procured Melitus to be put to death, and Anytus banished, for their persecution of Socrates. Lived 400 B.C. Of his works only a few apothegms remain.

ANTI-TAURUS, ăn-ti-tor'-us, a series of mountain-chains in Asiatic Turkey.

ANTIUM, ăn'-tē-um, a maritime town of Italy, built upon a promontory, 32 miles from Ostium. It was the capital of the Volsci. Camillus took it, and carried all the beaks of its ships to Rome, and placed them in the Forum on a tribunal, which thence was called Rostrum. The emperor Nero was born here.

ANTOINE, ST, an'-to-een, the name of several small towns and parishes in France.

ANTOINETTE, MARIE, mar'-e ăn'-twoi-net, archduchess of Austria, and queen of France, was one of the most beautiful persons of her time, as she was also one of the most unfortunate. She had a highly-cultivated mind, and in her fifteenth year was married to the son of Louis XV., afterwards Louis XVI. In 1793 she fell a victim to the fury of an infatuated French mob. B. at Vienna, 1755; beheaded at Paris, 1793.

ANTOMMARCHI, Francesco, an-tom-ar'-ke, a distinguished French anatomist, and physician to Napoleon I. at St. Helena. B. at Corsica; D. at San Antonio, Cuba, 1844.

ANTONELLI, Cardinal, an-to-nel'-e, prime minister of Pope Pius IX., in whose councils he has exercised great influence. His views are conservative. B. towards the end of the 18th century.

ANTONIA, ăn-to'-ne-a, the name of some eminent Roman ladies, the most remarkable of whom was the wife of Drusus, the son of Livia, and brother of Tiberius. She became mother of three children—Germanicus, Caligula's father; Claudius the emperor, and the debauched Livia. Lived A.D. 38.

ANTONIN, ST., an-to-nă, a town and parish of France, in the department of the Tarn and Garonne, 20 miles from Montauban. Manf. Woollen stuffs and leather. Pop. 5,500.

ANTONINUS, ăn-to-ni'-nus, surnamed Pius, on account of his great and good qualities, was adopted by the emperor Adrian, whom he succeeded. When told of conquering heroes, he said, with Scipio, "I prefer the life and preservation of one citizen to the death of a hundred enemies." His life was a scene of universal benevolence, and his last moments were easy, though preceded by a lingering illness. D. 161 A.D.—He extended the boundaries of the Roman province in Britain, and built a rampart between the friths of Clyde and Forth; but he waged no wars during his reign, and only repulsed the enemies of the empire who appeared in the field. He was succeeded by his adopted son M. Aurelius Antoninus, surnamed the Philosopher, a prince as virtuous as his father.

ANTONIO, or ANTONELLO, DE MESSINE, an-to'-ne-o, the first Italian who painted in oil, which art he learned of John Van Eyck, in Flanders. In Italy, he imparted the secret to Bellini and Dominico. The latter communicated it to Andrew del Castagno, who, from the desire of gain, basely assassinated him. Thus, by these incidents, oil-painting soon spread over Italy. Antonio flourished about 1450. B. at Messina, about 1413; D. at Venice, 1493.

ANTONIUS, Marcus, ăn-to'-ne-us, a celebrated Roman orator, who was made consul, and was afterwards governor of Cilicia, where he distinguished himself by his military achievements, and obtained the honour of a triumph. After his return he discharged the office of censor with great credit. Cicero says, that in him Rome might boast of a rival in eloquence to Greece itself. He fell in the commotions raised by Marius and Cinna, 67 B.C.

ANTONIUS, Marcus (Mark Antony), the triumvir, was the son of M. Antonius Creticus, by Julia, a noble lady of great merit. On the death of his father, he led a very dissipated life. Afterwards he applied himself to the study of the art of war, and evinced great courage and address in restoring Ptolemy to the throne of Egypt. He next served in Gaul, under Cæsar, who enabled him to go to Rome, where he obtained the quæstorship, in which office he became very active in behalf of his patron. He assisted Cæsar in gaining the empire, for which service he was made governor of Italy, and commander of the legions, by whom he was greatly beloved, on account of his liberality. Cæsar afterwards appointed him master of the horse, for his conduct at the battle of Pharsalia, and chose him as his colleague in the consulship, 44 B.C. After the death of Cæsar and the flight of his assassins, Antony began to exercise his authority in such a manner as to convince all parties that he aimed at assuming the sovereignty. To check his career, the patriots espoused the cause of Octavinnus, the heir of Cæsar, when Antony retired to his government of Cisalpine Gaul, and began a civil war by laying siege to Mertina, now Modena. The consuls Hirtius and Pansa, with Octavianus, were sent against him, and though he was defeated, both consuls were slain, and Octavianus alone left at the head of a victorious army. Antony now crossed the Alps, and joined Lepidus, with whom and Octavianus he contrived to form a second triumvirate, to which Cicero fell a victim, through the personal revenge of Antony. After the defeat of Brutus and Cassius at Philippi, he went into Asia, and distinguished himself, above all other princes, by the splendour of his court. Here Cleopatra, queen of Egypt, captivated him, and he accompanied her to Alexandria, where he gave himself up to pleasure. In the mean time Octavianus, at the instigation of Fulvia, the wife of Antony, commenced hostilities in Italy; but a reconciliation being effected between them, Antony married Octavia, the sister of his colleague. A new division of the empire was the consequence of this alliance; the West being allotted to Octavianus, and the East to Antony, and Africa to Lepidus; but Antony, infatuated with the charms of Cleopatra, renewed his intercourse with her in a manner so shameless and undisguised, that he was deprived of his consular dignity, and war was declared against the Egyptian queen by the senate. Immense preparations were making on both sides, whilst Antony was immersed in dissipation, which destroyed his military spirit. At the battle of Actium he escaped in a small vessel, and finding himself deserted on all sides, stabbed himself. B. at Rome, 86 B.C.; D. 30 B.C.

ANTONY, ST., ăn'-to-ne, the founder of monachism, who, though born to a large estate, renounced the world, and assumed the habit of a recluse. He resided in a cell in the desert nearly twenty years, and the fame of his sanctity drew to him many followers, for whom he erected numerous monasteries. B. at Coma, Upper Egypt, 251; D. 356.—Roman Catholic writers relate many whimsical stories of the assaults which this saint encountered from evil spirits.

ANTONY, of Bourbon, king of Navarre, which title he obtained by his marriage with Jeanne d'Albert, in 1548. He was the son of Charles of Bourbon, duke of Vendôme, and, renouncing the Protestant religion, in which he had been educated, united with the duke of Guise and Montmorency in forming the famous Catholic league. On the breaking out of the civil war, he raised an army, and took Blois, Tours, and Rouen. At the siege of the last-mentioned place he received a wound in the shoulder, of which he died in 1562. He left a son, who was afterwards Henry IV. (See D'ALBERT, JEANNE.)

ANTRIM, ăn'-trim, a maritime county of Ireland, province of Ulster, bounded N. and E. by the sea, S. by Lough Neagh and the county of Down, and W. by the county of Londonderry. Ext. about 54 miles long and 35 broad. Area, 1,164 square miles. Desc. Mountainous near the coast, and the south-west abounds with bogs. A stupendous assemblage of basaltic columns, the Giant's Causeway, is seen on the maritime confines of Antrim; as also Fair Head, and other lofty capes and promontories. Rivers. The principal are the Bann and the Laggan; the former forming the west, and the latter the south boundary. Manf. Linen yarn, white and brown linen, wool, canvas, kelp; and there is an iron-foundry. Considerable fisheries are carried on, and great quantities of butter made and sold for exportation. Towns. The chief are Antrim, Belfast, Carrickfergus, and Lisburn. Pop. Exclusive of Carrickfergus and Belfast, estimated at about 350,000.

ANTRIM, a town and parish of Ireland, in Antrim county, situate at the north end of Lough Neagh, near the point where it receives the Six-mile Water. Area of parish, 8,884 acres. Manf. Linen, hosiery, paper; and some malting and distilling are carried on. Pop. of parish, upwards of 5,000; of town, about 3,000.

ANTWERP, ant'-werp, one of the nine provinces of Belgium; bounded on the N. by Holland, S. by Brabant, E. by Limbourg, and W. by Flanders. Ext. 40 miles from E. to W., and 35 from N. to S. Area, 1,094 square miles. Desc. Flat, but fertile, and highly cultivated. In the northern parts there are some barren heaths, and towards the south the country is well wooded. Pro. All the crops common to England. Rivers. The principal are the Scheldt and its affluents, the Russel, the Dyle, and the Greater and Lesser Nèthe. Manf. Various and extensive; but these will be specified under the several headings of the chief towns in the province. Towns. The principal are Antwerp, Mechlin, Boom, Gheel, Lierre or Lier, and Turnhout. Pop. about 430,000.—This province is the see of the archbishop of Mechlin, and by the marriage of the Archduke Maximilian with Mary of Burgundy, it came into the possession of the house of Austria, with whom it remained till the French revolution. In 1814 it was made a part of the kingdom of the Netherlands, and in 1830 it became a province of Belgium. By means of its rivers, canals, and railroads, it is connected not only with the other provinces of Belgium, but France, Prussia, and the interior of Germany.

ANTWERP, a large and well-built city on the Scheldt, capital of the above province, and the principal seaport of Belgium. It has a deep and capacious harbour, and is defended by a strong citadel, built in 1568, by the notorious duke of Alva. (See ALVA.) Numerous canals permeate the city in all directions, and enable vessels to deposit their cargoes on the quays and wharfs the very centre of the town. Its Cathedral, which is very large, is one of the most magnificent Gothic edifices in the world; and the Stadthouse is also an elegant structure. The Exchange, which was the finest in Europe, was destroyed by fire in 1858; and the depôt called the Warehouse for Baltic or East-country Merchandise, is a building of vast dimensions. There are several large and handsome parish churches, containing many magnificent works of art. In that of St. James's are deposited the remains of the great painter Rubens. Manf. Silk and cotton hosiery, linen cloth, embroidery, lace, thread; and calico-printing, bleaching, and sugar-refining, are carried on to a considerable extent. There are large shipbuilding docks, and the diamond-cutters of Antwerp have a European celebrity. Pop. about 100,000. Lat. 51° 14′ N. Lon. 4° 24′ E.—Formerly, Antwerp was the greatest emporium of trade in Europe; but in 1648, by the treaty of Westphalia, which shut up the navigation of the Scheldt, its commerce was materially injured. When Holland was conquered by the French in 1792, the navigation of the river was opened, and its trade is now on the increase. Antwerp has frequently suffered from the calamities of war. In 1576 it was plundered by the Spaniards, on the occasion historically known as the "Spanish Fury;" it surrendered to Marlborough in 1706; and the French took it in 1746, but restored it at the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle. It was again taken by the French in 1794, and occupied for twenty years. Teniers, Snyders, Vandyck, and Jordaen, the engraver Edelinck, and the geographer Ortelius, were all born here. From London and Hull there is regular steam communication to Antwerp, and from here most parts of the continent can be reached by railway.

ANYTUS, ăn'-i-tus, a rhetorician of Athens, the enemy of Socrates. He prevailed on Aristophanes to ridicule the philosopher in a comedy, and, in conjunction with Melitus, procured his condemnation. After the death of the philosopher, the people discovered their error, when Anytus was banished, and stoned to death at Heraclea. Lived in the 4th century B.C.

ANZIN, an-zăi, a town and parish of France, in the department Nord, 1 mile from Valenciennes. Manf. Glass and iron, being the centre of the greatest coal-works of France. Pop. 6,000.—It is a station on the railway from Douai to Hennes.

AOSTA, a-os'-ta, a town of Piedmont, on the Doria. It is meanly built: the only edifice of note is the episcopal palace. The district in which it stands is noted for its vegetable and mineral products, and the Val d'Aosta is one of the most lovely of the Alpine valleys. Manf. Leather, hemp, and cheese. Wine is produced. Pop. about 8,000.—Here a meteorological observatory is established, in lat. 45° 44′ 10″ N.; lon. 7° 20 12″ E.

APALACHIAN MOUNTAINS. (See ALLEGHANY MOUNTAINS.)

APELLES, ă-pel'-ez, a native of the isle of Cos, called the "Prince of Painters," much admired by Alexander the Great, who would permit no other person to paint his picture. His most famous work was a painting of Venus rising from the sea, which Augustus purchased of the people of Cos, and placed in the temple of Cæsar. He was a man of wit, and much addicted to pleasure. Flourished in the beginning of the 4th century B.C.

APELLICON, ă-pel'-i-con, a Peripatetic philosopher, to whom the world is indebted for the works of Aristotle, which he bought at a vast price about ninety years B.C. They were afterwards seized by Sylla, and carried to Rome.

APENNINES, ăp'-e-nines, a chain of mountains in Italy, which, at about lon. 0° E., begins near Mount Appio, one of the maritime Alps, in the territory of Genoa, and after running a considerable distance to the E., traverses Italy in its whole length from N. to S., dividing it nearly equally. When near their termination, the chain separates into two branches, one of which runs to the south-east as far as Cape di Leuca, in the Terra di Otranto, and the other takes a westward direction to the Strait of Messina, which separates Sicily from Calabria. Ext. The entire length is about 800 miles. Desc. The Apennines are far inferior to the Alps in point of grandeur and elevation, their general height seldom reaching beyond 4,000 feet, whilst their highest point is that of Monte Corno, in the Abruzzo, attaining only 9,521 feet above the level of the sea. In their appearance they are neither peaked like the Alps nor the Pyrenees, but present themselves in smooth undulating forms, their rocks appearing bare only in the loftiest parts. Minerals. Not many. Iron is found in small quantities, and near Cosenza there are some extensive salt deposits. Their principal wealth consists of the marble of Carrara, Serravezza, and Sienna. Vegetation. Up to 3,000 feet the principal chain is covered with a varied vegetation; the olive, the palm, the citron, and the orange, forming the lower belt. Above this, the mountains are generally arid and destitute of vegetation. There are no extensive forests in the Apennines. Volcanoes. Vesuvius, the only active one on the continent of Europe. Lat. between 39° 10′ and 41° 10′ N. Lon. between 7° 40′ and 18° 20′ E.

APHION, or APIUM-KARA-HISSAR. (See APIUM KARA HISSAR.)

APICIUS, ă-pish'-e-us, the name of three celebrated Roman gluttons. The first lived under Sylla, the second under Augustus and Tiberius, and the third under Trajan. The second expended immense sums in gluttony, and was the inventor of several sorts of cakes. Finding his wealth reduced to a sum of £12,000, he, thinking he must starve, poisoned himself.

APOLDA, a-pol'-da, a town of Saxony, 4 miles from Jena. Manf. Chiefly hosiery. Pop. 4,500.—It has thermal springs, and is a station on the railway from Berlin to Weimar.

APOLLO, ă-pol'-o, the son of Jupiter and Latona, called also Phœbus, is often confounded with the sun. According to Cicero, there were four persons of this name. To the son of Jupiter and Latona, however, all the actions of the others seem to have been attributed. As soon as he was born, Apollo destroyed with arrows the serpent Python, which Juno had sent to persecute Latona. Hence he was called Pythius. Apollo was the god of the fine arts, of medicine, music, poetry, and eloquence: of all these he was deemed the inventor. He had received from Jupiter the power of knowing futurity, and he was the only one of the gods whose oracles were in general repute over the world. He is generally represented with long hair, tall, beardless, with a handsome shape, holding in his hand a bow, and sometimes a lyre: his head is generally surrounded with beams of light. He had temples and statues in every country, particularly in Egypt, Greece, and Italy. The cock, the grasshopper, the wolf, the crow, the swan, the hawk, the olive, the laurel, the palm-tree, &c., were sacred to him; and in his sacrifices, wolves and hawks were offered, as they were the natural enemies of the flocks over which he presided. Bullocks and lambs were also immolated to him. As he presided over poetry, he was often seen on Mount Parnassus with the nine Muses. His most famous oracles were at Delphi, Delos, Claros, Tenedos, Cyrrha, and Patara. His most splendid temple was at Delphi, to which every nation and individual brought considerable presents when they consulted the oracle. He had a famous Colossus in Rhodes, which was one of the seven wonders of the world.

APOLLODORUS, ă-pol'-o-dor'-us, an eminent architect, who was employed by the emperor Trajan to build the great bridge over the Danube, and other structures. D. at Damascus. Lived in the second century.

APOLLODORUS, a famous painter at Athens, who flourished B.C. 408. He was outshone by Zeuxis, which he greatly lamented in a poem.

APOLLONIA, ă'-pol-o'-ne-a, the name of several ruined cities of antiquity.

APOLLYON, ă-pol'-yon, 'a destroyer,' a wicked, persecuting power.

APOSTLE, ă-pos'-el, a 'messenger or missionary;' the title given by Christ to each of his select disciples.

APPALACHICOLA, ăp-a-lăk'-a-ko'-la, a river of the United States, which, after a course of 70 miles, falls into St. George's Sound, in the Gulf of Mexico.

APPENWEIER, ap-en-vai'-er, a town 8 miles from Kehl, on the Baden Railway, Germany, where is the junction of the railways running into Germany, France, and Switzerland. Pop. 1,500.

APPENZELL, ap-enl'-sel, a canton of Switzerland, which is wholly encompassed by that of St. Gall. Area, 152 square miles. Desc. Mountainous, particularly in the S., where Mont Scntis rises to 8,232 feet. It is divided into what are called the outer and inner Rhodes, the latter of which is an agricultural district, and the former manufacturing. Manf. Linen and cotton goods, dyeing, embroidery, and various other branches of industry. Rivers. The Sittern is the principal. Towns. Appenzell and Trogau, Gais and Herisau. Pop. about 60,000.—This canton holds the thirteenth place in the Swiss confederacy.

APPENZELL, the capital of Inner Rhodes, in the above canton, 6 miles from St. Gall. Pop. 3,300.

APPIN, ăp-in, an extensive district of Argyleshire, Scotland, and formerly the country of the Stuarts.

APPLEBY, ăp'-el-be, a borough and market-town of England, and the chief town of Westmoreland, on the Eden. Pop. 2,500.—Its castle was that which was held out, under the heroic Lady Pembroke, against the Parliamentary forces in the time of Charles I., and is now in the possession of her descendant, the earl of Thanet.

APPLEDORE, ăp'-el-dor, a seaport-town of England, in the county of Devon, on Barnstaple Bay.

APPLETON, ăp'-el-ton, the name of several small parishes in England.

APPOMATOX, ăp-o-măt'-ox, a county in the centre of Virginia, United States. Area, 320 square miles. Pop. 9,500, of which nearly the half are slaves.

APSHERON, ăp-she'-ron, an Asiatic peninsula, running 40 miles into the Caspian Sea, and terminating in Cape Apsheron, which forms the E. point of the Caucasian chain. This is the place of the sacred flame, whence the fire-worshipers of Asia drew their superstition. Sulphur and inflammable gas are so plentifully mixed with its soil, that immense quantities of white and black naphtha are annually taken from it. Saffron, salt, and madder are also obtained on this peninsula. Lat. of Cape Apsheron, 40° 12′ N. Lon. 50° 20′ E.

APT, apt, a town and parish of France, 29 miles from Avignon. Manf. Woollens, cottons, confectionery, and earthenware. Pop. 6,000.—It is the Julia of antiquity, and was greatly embellished by Cæsar.

APULIA, or PUGLIA, ă-pu'-le-a, the common name for the country comprised in the three Neapolitan provinces of Bari, Otranto, and Basilicata, which extend along the western shore of the Adriatic.

APURE, a'-poor, a river of South America, which rises in New Grenada, and after running in an easterly direction for 500 miles, and receiving numerous tributaries, falls by several mouths into the Orinoco.

AQUAMBOE, a-kam'-bo, a kingdom in the interior of the Gold Coast of Africa, extending 20 miles along the river Volta, and 100 miles inland. It has a town of the same name.

AQUILA, a-ke'-la, a fortified town of Naples, situate on a hill, on the river Aterno, about 60 miles from Rome. It contains, exclusive of a cathedral, a number of parish churches, and a great many cloisters. Manf. Chiefly linen goods; but in general articles of commerce it does a considerable trade. Pop. 10,000.—It stands on the site of the ancient Amiternum, the birthplace of Sallust. In 1688, 1703, and 1706, it was seriously injured by earthquakes.

AQUINAS, St. Thomas, ă-qui'-năs, called the "Angelical Doctor," was born of a noble Italian family, and entered into the society of Preaching Friars at Naples, against the inclination of his parents. After teaching divinity in various universities, he settled at Naples, and obtained a pension from the king. He refused the archbishopric of Naples, which was offered him by Pope Clement IV. B. in the castle of Aquino, Italy, 1221; D. at the monastery of Fossanova, near Terracina, 1274.—The authority of Aquinas has always been very high in the Roman church, and he was canonized in 1323. His works make 17 vols. folio, and have been printed several times at several places.

ARABAT, ă-ra-băt', a fortress on the Sea of Azov, 70 miles from Simpheropol, in the Crimea.

ARABIA, ă-rai'-be-a, an extensive country of Asia, the general outline of which forms an irregular quadrangle, bounded S. by the Indian Ocean and the Gulf of Oman, W. by the Red Sea, E. by the Gulf of Persia, and N. by Turkey in Asia. Ext. 1,500 miles long, with an average breadth of 800. Area, 1,200,000 square miles. Divisions. Arabia is commonly divided into three parts: Arabia Felix, or Happy Arabia, bordering on the Persian Gulf, the Indian Ocean, and the southern part of the Red Sea; Arabia Petræa, or Stony Arabia, lying on the Red Sea north of Arabia Felix; and Arabia Deserta, or the Desert, including all the interior and northern parts of the country. Among the Arabians these names are not known. The division which we call Arabia Deserta, they call Nedsjed; Arabia Petræa is denominated Hedjaz; and Arabia Felix is divided into the kingdoms of Yemen, Hadramaut, Ommon, and Lachsa. Desc. The general aspect of Arabia is a vast and arid desert, intersected about the centre by a range of mountains, supposed to stretch from the shores of the Red Sea by Mecca, to those of the Persian Gulf at the Bahrein Islands, with, here and there, some spots of fertile ground. The edges of the country on the seacoast contain some flourishing provinces and settlements; but in all parts they suffer for want of water. Mountains. These extend along the W. coast from the Straits of Bab-el-mandeb to the Gulf of Akaba, rising in peaked tops in some parts from 5,000 to 8,000 feet. Their length is about 1,000 miles, and their distance from the coast from 12 to 60. The Mount Sinai group lies between the Gulf of Akaba on the east, and that of Suez on the west, and nearly fills the peninsula, which there projects into the Red Sea. Rivers. None navigable. There are a few streams, but they are mostly dry in the hot season, and in some parts no rain falls sometimes for a year together. Lakes. Properly speaking, none. Forests. None worth naming. Zoology. The panther, jackal, wolf, and hyæna roam the deserts, and follow the Bedouins, or track the path of the caravans. Amongst the mountains, the rock-goat, the fox, and the musk-deer are found, whilst in the more fertile parts the antelope and gazelle may be witnessed browsing in the quiet solitudes far away from the haunts of men. The hilly regions are inhabited by a wild ass; monkeys are plentiful in the woods of Aden and Yemen; and the Arabian cows and oxen have a hunch over their shoulders. The most valuable animals of the country, however, are the camel and the horse. The horses have been celebrated in all ages, and the purity of their breed is preserved with the greatest care. The chief dependence of the Arabians, however, is on the camel, an animal peculiarly adapted for the inhabitants of a sandy country, being capable of undergoing great fatigue and supporting itself without water, or even food, for several days together. Of birds, the eagle, the vulture, and several species of hawk are common. The ostrich inhabits the desert, and the pelican the coast of the Red Sea. Pheasants and game, fowls, and various kinds of pigeons, are common in Yemen. Locusts abound in Arabia, and are eaten by the inhabitants. Fish is plentiful along the coasts, especially the east, where not only is the soil manured by them, but domestic animals are fed upon them. Climate. The driest in the world. In the mountainous region it is temperate, but in unsheltered situations intolerable heat prevails, aggravated by the pestiferous wind called the simoom or samiel, which frequently surprises the traveller in the desert, and almost suffocates him, while he is overwhelmed by moving clouds of sand. Pro. Dates and dourra, a kind of millet, wheat, barley, tobacco, indigo, the finest of coffee, sugar, tamarinds, spices, acacia, balm, various gums, raisins, drugs, and fruits. In the agricultural arts the inhabitants are extremely backward. Minerals. Silver, iron, basalt, blue alabaster, emerald, and the onyx. The country, however, has not been sufficiently examined to justify a decided opinion as to its poverty or wealth in mineral resources. INHABITANTS.—Manners and Customs. The natives are a Circassian race, of middle stature, thin, with slender extremities, black eyes, hair, and beard, and of swarthy complexion. The women are fairer, and, when young, many of them may be considered handsome; but when old, their features assume quite a different character, and are rather repulsive than otherwise. They all lead a frugal and abstemious life: many depend for subsistence entirely on their flocks. The flesh of the camel is sometimes, but rarely, eaten, except as a delicacy on great occasions. Porcupines, weasels, rats, lizards, and locusts form a portion of the food of the Arabians. Their common diet is not bread properly so called, but soft thin cakes half baked, and prepared of a species of millet. Wine is prohibited by the law of Mahomet, but different kinds of spirituous liquors are made from honey, sugar, or raisins, and other fruits. The dress of the Arabs varies. The men in general wear wide drawers and a shirt; they have a cape or handkerchief tied round their heads, and in the hottest parts go almost naked. The dress of the women consists of a cloak, a very wide shift, and pantaloons in proportion. They are frequently veiled. The majority of the people dwell in tents made of camel's hair, wandering about with their whole property from place to place; and many inhabit villages, towns, and cities. Gov. Patriarchal; the chief power being vested in a shiekh, that is, an old man or elder, whose authority is like that of the head of a family, being, in general, regulated more by the sentiments and habits of the community than by an organized system of policy. Towns. Mecca, Medina, Aden, Sana, and Daraieh. Mecca is celebrated as the birthplace of Mahomet, and Medina for his tomb. Aden belongs to the British, and Sana is the capital of Yemen. Daraieh was once the capital of the Wahabees, but in 1819 it was destroyed by Ibrahim Pacha. Manf. On the west coast, coarse woollens and linen fabrics are wove; matchlocks, lance-heads, and other arms, with tin and copper vessels, are made. Silk and cotton turbans, with silks, canvas, earthen jars, arms, and gunpowder, are made in Oman; but most of the better kinds of manufactured goods are procured from other countries in exchange for Arabian produce. COMMERCE. Considerable—Arabia being well situated for carrying on a general intercourse with nations. The communication of the interior is mostly conducted by means of the camel, which transports across the deserts immense quantities of merchandise, by the robbery of which many of the Bedouins support themselves.

BEDOUIN ARABS.

Exp. Coffee, gums, drugs, and pearls. Mocha and Loheia are the centres of the coffee trade, and Muscat has recently become the entrepôt for the trade with India and the Persian Gulf. Rel. Mahometanism, which originated in Arabia. (See ALCORAN.) Pop. variously estimated from 8,000,000 to 12,000,000. Lat. between 12° and 34° N. Lon. between 32° 30′ and 60° E. —Until the time of Mahomet, our knowledge of the interior of Arabia is very imperfect; before his time, however, the Arabs, like those of the present day, partly dwelt in cities, and partly wandered over the desert, pitching their tents where either inclination induced, or necessity compelled them. In the beginning of the 7th century Mahomet united them, and, under the influence of the faith of Islam, inspired them with such courage and fervour, that within a century, their dominion, language, and faith extended from the Indus to the Atlantic, skirting the deserts of Africa, penetrating Spain and the south of France, embracing the whole of Asia Minor, and the countries surrounding the Caspian Sea. Mahomet died at Medina, in 632, in the 63rd year of his age; and for a century afterwards, during the reign of his successors, we read of nothing in connection with the Arabs but a series of conquests. In 749 the family of Abbas ascended the throne of the caliphs, and held it, although with gradually diminishing influence, until the taking of Bagdad in 1258, by Hulaku, when the dominion of the Abassides ended. From that time, with the exception of the wars of petty chiefs, struggling to maintain their authority, or to deprive others of theirs, and the annual pilgrimages to Mecca, there is nothing of general interest to record. In 891 the sect of Karmatians arose and obtained possession of Arabia, but about 990 their power fell. (See MECCA, MEDINA, MAHOMET, and other articles connected with Arabia.)

ARABIAN GULF. (See RED SEA.)

ARACAN, ar'-a-kan, formerly an independent kingdom of further India, but now a British province. It is situate to the S.E. of Bengal, extending from the river Naaf to Cape Negrais. Ext. 500 miles in length, but various in breadth; and the coast is studded with a number of formerly fertile islands. Area, 16,500 square miles. Desc. On the east it is divided from Pegu and Ava by a range of mountains, through which there are very few passes, and the country is, in some parts, covered with extensive forests. COMMERCE. Considerable, carried on with Bengal. Exp. Chiefly honey, wax, ivory, drugs, sapphires, rubies, and gold. Imp. Tissues, silks, muslins, European commodities of all kinds, pearls, and diamonds. Pop. 300,000. Lat. between 16° and 22° N. Lon. between 92° and 94° E. —In 1824 the province was taken from the Burmese by the British.

ARACAN, a city and capital of the above province, situate on a branch of the Kuladyne river, and encompassed by a series of low hills. It is fortified, and has a great number of pagodas. Pop. including the district in which it is situate, 140,000.

ARACHNE, ă-răk'-ne, a virgin of Lydia, who was turned into a spider for contending with Minerva at spinning.

ARAD, OLD, a'-rad, an Hungarian city, 60 miles from Szegedin. It is the see of a bishop, has a citadel, and does a large trade in corn. Pop. including Jews, 20,000.

ARAD, NEW, a fortified town of Hungary, opposite the above. Pop. 15,000.

ARAGO, François Jean Dominique, a-ra'-go, a distinguished French mathematician, astronomer, and man of science, who, in the "History of his Youth," has given a detailed narrative of his adventures up to his 22nd year. From 1812 to 1845 he lectured in Paris, on astronomy and kindred subjects, and was pronounced by the French emperor, Louis Napoleon, to be not only "the grand high-priest of science, but able to initiate the vulgar into its mysteries." In conjunction with Gay-Lussac, he established the "Annales de Chimie et de Physique," a valuable serial still continued; and throughout his days, prosecuted scientific discovery with unwearied effort. Amongst his other discoveries may be here recorded that of a neutral point in the polarization of the atmosphere, and the suggestion of a positive proof of the theory of undulations, which has since been proved by Foucault. B. near Perpignan, 1786; D. at Paris, 1853.—Arago was a determined republican, and refused to take the oath of allegiance, after the coup d'état of 1852, and gave his reasons in a spirited letter to the government. Louis Napoleon was then the prince-president, and he, to his honour, caused his minister to write, that "a special exception would be made in favour of a philosopher whose labours had rendered France illustrious, and whose existence the government would be loath to sadden." How happy would it be for intellectual progress, if princes, under every change of circumstance and condition, would still continue to express a regard for the opinions of men of literature and science, similar to that embodied in the above sentence!

ARAGON, or ARRAGONIA, ăr'-a-gon, a province of Spain, bounded by the Pyrenees on the N., Navarro and Castile on the W., Valencia on the S., and Catalonia on the E. Ext. 240 miles, with an average breadth of about 90. Area, 22,000 square miles. Desc. The country is surrounded by mountains, whilst its interior is traversed by numerous offsets, with their slopes covered with forests of the beech, oak, and pine. The province is divided by the Ebro nearly into two equal parts, watered by the Guadalaviar, the Tagus, the Xucar, and the Aragon. Climate. Variable but healthy. Pro. Fruit, grain, saffron, hemp, and flax. Silkworms are reared in immense numbers, and the quantity of silk made and exported is considerable. Rearing sheep is an important feature in the province. Minerals. Iron, lead, quicksilver, copper, coal, jasper, marble, cobalt, and alum. Immense tracts of the country are covered with stones, and other parts are left in a neglected state, although worthy of cultivation. Manf. Imperfect; consisting principally of woollen cloths, drapery, leather, cordage, wine, spirits, oil, and soda; most of which form articles of exportation. Pop. about 850,000. Lat. between 40° and 42° 54′ N. Lon. between 2° 10′ W. and 1° 45′ E.—The kingdom of Aragon was founded in 1034, and became united to the crown of Castile, by the marriage of Ferdinand the Catholic with Isabella, in 1474. The imperial canal of Aragon extends for 80 miles through the country, and crosses the Jalon river, by an aqueduct 4,800 feet in length.

ARAL, air′-al, a lake or inland sea of Asia, in Independent Tartary, the largest, with the exception of the Caspian Sea, in Asia. Ext. 265 miles long, by 125 broad. On the E. it receives the rivers Sir, or Jaxartes, and the Amu-daria. Near its south end are two islands, at one of which the Russians have a small fleet. Lat. between 43° 42′ and 46° 14′ N. Lon. between 58° 18′ and 61° 46′ E.

ARAM, Eugene, air′-am, a self-educated Yorkshireman, who, by persevering industry, obtained a knowledge of the mathematics, and an extensive acquaintance with the Latin and Greek languages, together with the Hebrew and Chaldee. In 1744 he taught Latin and writing at a school in London; and after passing many years in apparent innocence, in 1753 he was apprehended at Lynn, for the murder of Daniel Clarke, a shoemaker of Knaresborough, perpetrated thirteen years before. He was brought to his trial in 1759, and made an admirable defence, but was found guilty; and the next morning confessed his crime, alleging that he was prompted to it through a suspicion of Clarke's having a criminal intercourse with his wife. Executed at York, 1759.—The history of this person has suggested one of the most interesting of Sir Bulwer Lytton's novels

ARAUCANIA, ä-rän-kwi′-ne-a, an independent territory of S. America, bounded N.W. by Chili, E. by the Andes, and W. by the Pacific Ocean. Area, 28,000 square miles. Desc. Mountainous, affording excellent pastures for the flocks, which constitute the chief wealth of the natives. Lat. between 37° and 39° S. Lon. between 70° and 75° W.

ARANDA, Don Pedro Pablo Abarco de Boles, count of, a-ran′-da, a distinguished Spanish statesman of the 18th century. He abolished the order of the Jesuits, and greatly diminished the power of the Inquisition. In 1773, to avoid ruin, he got himself appointed ambassador to Paris, where he remained till 1787. In 1792 he became the prime minister of Charles IV., but, through the intrigues of a rival, was soon afterwards dismissed. B. in Aragon, 1718; D. 1799.

ARANJO D'AZEVEDO, Antonio, a-ransh′-o, a Portuguese statesman, who devoted more time to literature and science than to politics, and thereby incapacitated himself for conducting with success the affairs of his country. In 1806, when Napoleon I. declared that the house of Braganza had ceased to reign, he made his escape to Brazil, whither he took his mineralogical collection, and a printing apparatus which he had imported from London. This was the first printing-press that had been seen in Rio Janeiro, where he began to busy himself with scientific pursuits. Whilst thus engaged, however, he felt severely the disgrace under which he lay, on account of his political errors. Accordingly, he wrote to the prince regent, defending his conduct against some assertions of his calumniators. He received a gracious reply, and in 1815 was created Count da Barca. He finally became sole minister in Brazil. B. at Ponte de Lima, 1754; D. at Rio Janeiro, 1817.

ARANJUEZ, a-ransh-oo′-eth, a beautiful palace of the Spanish royal family, situate on the Tagus, in the province of Toledo, 28 miles from Madrid. The town of Aranjuez was an inconsiderable village, and is indebted for its enlargement to Ferdinand VI. Pop. about 4,000. It is connected with Madrid by railway.

ARAPILES, a-ra′-pe-lais, a Spanish village, 4 miles from Salamanca. Pop. 400. This place is memorable from its being the scene of the battle of Salamanca, in which the French, under Marmont, were defeated by the British, under Wellington, July, 1812.

ARARAT, ăr-a-răt, a celebrated mountain of Armenia, held in great veneration, from a belief that Noah's ark rested on it. It has two principal summits, named respectively Agri-dagh and Allah-dagh, the former of which has an elevation of upwards of 17,000 feet above the level of the sea. It is the culminating point of Western Asia, where the Russian, Persian, and Turkish empires meet (see ARMENIA), and it is in the neighbourhood of its mountains,

"So varied, and so terrible in beauty," that the scene of Lord Byron's mystery, "Heaven and Earth," is laid.

ARAS, the ancient ARAXES, a′-ras, a river of Asia, which rises in Armenia, 20 miles S. of Erzeroum, and joins the Kur, in about lat. 40° 5′ N.; lon. 48° 30′ E. It has a rapid course of about 500 miles.

ARATUS, a-rai′-tus, a Greek poet, whose poem entitled "Phenomena," still extant, shows him to have been also an astronomer. B. in Cilicia, about 300 B.C.

ARATUS of Sicyon, son of Clinas, who, by his activity, established the Achæan league, and recovered Corinth from Antigonus of Macedon. B. 273; D. 216 B.C. He wrote commentaries on his own transactions.

ARBE, arb, an island in the Adriatic, off the coast of Croatia. Pop. 4,000. It has a town of the same name, which has 1,100 inhabitants. This island is the most northerly of the Dalmatians.

ARBIL, ar′-bil, the ancient Arbela, a town of Asiatic Turkey, 40 miles from Mosul. Pop. 6,000. Here Darius was signally defeated by Alexander the Great, 331 B.C.

ARBLAY, Madame d'. (See BURNEY.)

ARBOGAST, Louis François Antoine, ar′-bo-gast, a French mathematician, who, in 1800, published his great work called the "Calcul des Dérivations," a production which has been the means of throwing much light on the connection of various parts of analysis.

ARBOIS, ar′-bwaw, a town and parish of France, in the department of the Jura, 6 miles from Poligny. It stands at an elevation of 940 feet. Manf. Paper and earthenware. Pop. nearly 7,000.

ARBORIO, Mercurino, ar-bor′-e-o, a faithful adviser and chancellor of Charles V. of Spain. Although a Catholic in his sentiments, he was the advocate of mild measures, and never lost the confidence of his great master. He became a cardinal, and throughout his career exercised a considerable influence upon the affairs of Germany. B. at Vercelli, Piedmont, 1465; D. at Innsbruck, 1530.

ARBROATH. (See ABERBROTHICK.)

ARBUTHNOT, John, ar-buth′-not, a celebrated writer and physician, educated at Aberdeen, and, coming to London, supported himself by teaching the mathematics. Accidentally administering relief to Prince George of Denmark at Epsom, he became physician to his royal highness, and in 1709 was appointed physician in ordinary to Queen Anne. He engaged with Pope and Swift in a scheme to write a satire on the abuse of human learning, under the title of "Memoirs of Martinus Scriblerus," but the death of the queen put an end to the project, and deprived the world of some ingenious performances. B. at Arbuthnot, near Montrose, Scotland, 1675; D. in London, 1735.—Arbuthnot was the author of several other performances, more in connection with his profession of a medical practitioner. It is said that he was one of the greatest wits of his time, that his humour was generally without any mixture of ill-nature, being a most humane and amiable man.

ARC. (See JOAN OF ARC.)

ARCADIA, ar-kai′-de-a, the ancient name of a mountainous and finely-wooded province in the Morea, Greece, much sung by the poets. Lat. 37° 14′ N. Lon. 21° 42 E.

ARCANO, Mauro d', ar-ka'-no, a celebrated Italian burlesque poet. Flourished in the 16th century.

ARCET, Jean d', dar'-sai, a French natural philosopher, who was the first to prove, by experiment, the perfect combustibility of the diamond. He was also the inventor of a metallic alloy, of which stereotypes are sometimes made, and to which his name is frequently given. He gave great attention to the study of minerals, and succeeded in producing a porcelain equal to the best of China and Japan. B. at Douazit, 1725; D. at Paris, 1801. He became inspector of the tapestry manufacture of Gobelins, and also of the public mint; and in the manufacture of the former, as well as in that of porcelain, suggested several improvements.

ARCHANGEL, or ARCHANGELSKOE, ark-ain'-jel, a government of Russia, bounded on the N. by the Arctic Ocean and the White Sea, on the W. by the Ural Mountains, on the S. by the governments of Vologda and Olonetz, and the islands of Wargatz, Dolgo, and Nova Zembla; on the E. by Finland. Area, estimated at 325,400 square miles. General Desc. Lying under an inclement sky, where the summer is short, and the winter of uncommon severity, the principal wealth of the country consists in its fisheries, which extend along the whole coast. In the south there are a number of large forests, many wild animals, valuable for their fur, and good breeds of domestic cattle. Its surface is mountainous, and nearly surrounds the White Sea, whilst it is watered by the rivers Dwina, Petchora, Mezen, Onega, Pinega, and Outcha. From October to May the rivers are frozen over in the north, but in the south there is excellent pasturage, although it abounds with marshes. Little corn is grown, but flax, hemp, and timber are plentiful. These, with pitch, turpentine, tallow, leather, and potash, constitute its principal exports. Towns. The principal are Archangel, Chenkoursk, Mezen, Onega, Kola, Pinega, and Kholmogory. Pop. 255,000, originally Finns, but now mostly Russians. Lat. between 61° and 71° N. Lon. between 29° and 68° E.

ARCHANGEL, or ST. MICHAEL, the capital of the above government, stands at the mouth of the Dwina, a few miles from the White Sea. It derives its name from a monastery, founded here in 1584, and dedicated to the archangel Michael. It became the chief town of the government in 1710, and is nearly entirely built of wood. As a place of commerce it is much frequented, especially by the English, the Dutch, and merchants of Bremen and Hamburg. Its trade was greatly injured by the erection of St. Petersburg into a commercial city, but it still is the chief deposit of foreign articles destined for Siberia. In summer is held the great market, in which train oil, tallow, tar, linseed, furs, wax, iron, and coarse linen, are exposed to sale, chiefly for the accommodation of foreigners. The harbour is open only from July to September, on account of the severity of the climate. Pop. about 25,000. Lat. 64° 32' N. Lon. 40° 33' E.

ARCHIDAMUS, ar'-ki-doi'-mus, the name of five kings of Sparta, of whom there is little or nothing to record.

ARCHILOCHUS, ar-kil'-o-kus, a Greek satirist, whose poems the Lacedæmonians prohibited. He was the inventor of iambic verses. B. in the isle of Paros, about 660 B.C.—Most of his writings are lost.

ARCHIMEDES, ar'-ki-me'-des, the greatest of the Greek mathematicians, said to have been related to Hiero, king of Syracuse. He boasted, that if he had a place to fix his machines, he would move the earth, which will not be deemed extravagant by those who can calculate the power of levers, &c. The story of the manner in which he discovered the fraud of the jeweller who made the crown of Hiero is too well known to require repetition here. He is said, amongst other ingenious mechanical contrivances, to have made a glass machine, which represented the motions of the heavenly bodies. He is also said to have made burning-glasses, which destroyed ships at a great distance. When Marcellus besieged Syracuse, 212 B.C., Archimedes contrived a variety of machines for annoying the enemy; and when the place was taken, the Roman commander gave strict orders that the house and person of the philosopher should be respected. He was, however, slain by a soldier, while he was deeply engaged in solving a geometrical problem, and inattentive to the noise occasioned by the taking of the city. B. at Syracuse: slain 212 B.C.—Several of his works are extant, but some of the most valuable are lost. When Cicero was quæstor in Sicily, he discovered Archimedes' tomb, with an inscription upon it.

ARCHIPELAGO, ar'-ke-pel'-a-go, a term applied to any portion of the sea abounding in small islands, but more especially to the Ægean Sea, or that part of the Mediterranean between the coasts of Asia Minor and Greece.

ARCHONTES, ar-kon'-tes, the name of the chief magistrates of Athens. They were nine in number, and none were chosen after the death of King Codrus, but such as were descended from ancestors who had been free citizens of the republic for three generations.

ARCIS-SUR-AUBE, ar'-se-soor-obe', a town of France, in the department of Aube, 16 miles from Troyes. Manf. Yarn and cotton stockings. Pop. about 3,000. —Near this place, in 1814, Napoleon I. defeated a division of the allied army.

ARCOLE, ar-ko-lai (Eng. ARCOLA, ar-ko'-la), a village of Italy, about 15 miles from Verona. Pop. 1,000.—The village and its bridge are famous for the defeat of the Austrians by Napoleon I., in a series of sanguinary actions, in 1796.

ARCON, Jean Claude d', ar'-kong, a French military engineer, who planned the floating batteries with which Gibraltar was attacked, when commanded by General Elliot, on the 12th September, 1782. He afterwards served in the French army at the time of the Revolution, and took a part in the conquest of Holland. B. in Franche Comté, 1733; D. near Auteuil, 1799.

ARCOS DE LA FRONTERA, ar'-kos dai la fron-tair'-a, a town of Spain, in Andalusia, built on a rock, 30 miles from Cadiz. Manf. Thread, ropes, and tanned leather, which latter was here first established in Andalusia. Pop. 11,000.—Both in Spain and Portugal there are several places of the name of Arcos.

ARCOT (NORTH and SOUTH), ar-kot', two maritime districts in the presidency of Madras, British India. Area of both, 13,500 square miles. Desc. Full of jungles, and hilly in the interior, but low along the coast. Rivers. The Palaur and the Coleroon. Pro. Chiefly rice, and the usual cerealia. Manf. Comparatively none, these being almost entirely superseded by European goods. Towns. Arcot, Vellore, and Cuddalore. Pop. upwards of 1,500,000. Lat. between 11° and 14° N. Lon. between 78° and 80° E.—In 1801 the whole of this district was by a formal treaty ceded to the East-India Company by Azim-ul-Omrah, the nabob of the Carnatic.

ARCOT, the Mahometan capital and chief town of the above province, stands on the Palaur, 73 miles from Madras. It is a place of great antiquity, and contains the palace of the former nabobs of the Carnatic, with some fine mosques and tombs. Pop. of town and its district, about 52,000. Lat. 12° 54' N. Lon. 79° 22' E.

ARCTIC OCEAN, or NORTHERN ICY SEA, ark'-tik, that portion of the ocean extending from lat. 66° 30' N. to the north pole, having communication with the Pacific Ocean through Behring's Straits on the N.E. of Asia, and with the Atlantic on the N.W. of Europe.

ARCTIC HIGHLANDS, hi'-lands, a region of N. America, lying between the mouth of the Mackenzie river and Hudson Sea.

ARDAGH, ar'-da, a village and parish of Ireland, 6 miles from Longford. Area, 11,417 acres. Pop. 4,524.—There are other smaller parishes of the same name.

ARDCHATTAN, ard-chät'-an, a parish in Argyleshire, Scotland, 8 miles from Oban, on Loch Etive.—In it is the mountain Bencruachan and the fabled city of Beregonium.

ARDECHE, ar-daish', a department in the S.E. of France, bounded E. by the department of the Drôme, from which it is separated by the Rhone; S. by the department of the Gard; W. by the departments of the Lozère and Upper Loire, from which it is separated by the Cevennes; N.W. by the department of the Loire; and N.E. by that of the Isère. Area, 2,133 square miles. Desc. Mountainous, with many mulberry plantations, and with a soil somewhat sandy, but rich in the production of minerals. Rivers. The Rhone, Loire, Cance, Doux Erieux, and Ardèche, from which the department takes its name. Pro. Wine in abundance, chestnuts, and olives. Silkworms are a source of considerable wealth, and cattle are reared in large numbers. Minerals. Lead, iron, copper, manganese, coal, antimony, alum, marble of different colours, gypsum, and porcelain clay; granite, quartz, and pumice-stone abound. Towns. The principal are Privas, L'Argentière, and Tournon, which are the capitals of their several arrondissements. Manf. Paper, leather, woollens, silks, and cottons. Pop. about 390,000. Lat. extending between 44° 16 and 45° 21′ N. Lon. between 3° 50′ and 4° 50′ E.

ARDECHE, or ARDECE, a river of France, which rises in the Cevennes, and, after a course of about 45 miles, falls into the Rhone above Pont St. Esprit.

ARDELAN, ar'-de-lan, a province of Persia, forming the eastern division of Kurdistan, and inhabited by various tribes, who are represented as brave and hospitable, but addicted to war and rapine, and scarcely considering murder as a crime. The capital town is Senna.

ARDENNES, FOREST OF, ar-den', a very extensive forest in the department of Ardennes, which, in the time of Cæsar, extended far into Germany, but which is now embraced between the Moselle river on the E. and the sources of the Sambre, Scheldt, Oise, and the Somme, on the W.—It is rather a series of heights and woods, than an entire connected forest. Some of the scenes of Shakspeare's play of "As You like It" are laid here.

ARDENNES, a department in the N.E. of France, having on the N. the grand duchy of Luxembourg, and on the W. the departments of Aisne, on the S. Marne, and on the E. Meuse. Ext. 63 miles, running N. and S., with a breadth of 60, E. to W. Area, 2,021 square miles. Desc. In the north it is full of mountains and woods, in the south-east the soil is chalky, in the south-west it consists of a rich loam, and in the east it is stony. Rivers. The Meuse, and its affluents the Vence, the Bar, and the Sermone; the Aisne, and its affluents the Vaux, the Aire, and the Retourne. Pro. Corn in abundance. Cider and beer are made, little wine, and a great number of cattle, horses, and sheep are raised. Minerals. Iron, slate, marble, and potter's clay. Towns. The principal are Mézières, Rethel, Rocroy, Sedan, and Vouziers, which are the capitals of their several arrondissements. Manf. Ironmongery, cloth, and cashmere shawls, and other woollen stuffs, hosiery, shoe and white leather, hats; and there are iron-furnaces, glass-works, and limekilns. Pop. 332,000. Lat. between 49° 13′ and 50° 10′ N. Lon. between 4° 5′ and 5° 21′ E.

ARENDAL, a'-ren-dal, a seaport-town of Norway, 35 miles from Christiansand. Pop. 2,300.—This place is intersected by canals, greatly facilitating its trade, which is considerable in spirits and tobacco.

AREOPAGITE, ăr'-e-op-a-jit'-te, the judges of the Areopagus, a seat of justice on a hill of that name, near Athens, whose name is derived from areios pagos, 'the hill of Mars,' because Mars was the first who was tried there, for the murder of Hallirhotius.

AREQUIPA, a'-re-ke'-pa, a province in Peru, extending along the Pacific, and producing large quantities of wine and brandy, besides silver, sugar, and alpaca wool. Lat. between 15° and 21° S. Lon. between 69° and 75° W.—In this province is the volcano of Arequipa, 20,320 feet above the level of the sea.

AREQUIPA, the capital of the above province, in Peru, was founded by order of Pizarro, in 1536, in the valley of Quilca, at 60 miles' distance from the Pacific Ocean. It is one of the largest towns in Peru, and the houses are well built of stone, and vaulted. It is watered by the river Chili, which is let off by sluices, to irrigate the environs and enrich the fields. It has been frequently nearly destroyed by earthquakes from the 16th to the 18th centuries. Lat. 16° 10′ S. Lon. 71° 58′ W.

ARETHUSA, ă-re-thu'-sa, a celebrated fountain in the island of Ortygia, one of the five divisions of ancient, and the site of modern Syracuse. This fountain is the fabled nymph Arethusa. (See ALPHEUS.)

ARETINO, Pietro, a'-rai-te'-no, an Italian man of letters, called by his literary admirers the "Divine," and by his political, the "Scourge of Princes." His fame rests upon nothing either great or worthy, although he was patronized by Francis I., of France, by some of the Medici family, and corresponded with Titian, Tasso, and Michael Angelo. B. at Arezzo, 1492; D. at Venice, 1557.

ARETINO, Spinello, a celebrated Italian painter, who executed several works in fresco and distemper for the monasteries of San Mureato and Monte Oliveto, near Florence, and San Bernardo, at Arezzo. B. at Arezzo, 1316; D. about 1400.—He has been esteemed equal to Giotto in design, and his superior in painting.

AREZZO, a-ret'-so, a town in the grand duchy of Tuscany, at the influx of the Chiano into the Arno, 39 miles from Florence. It is the see of a bishop, has two collegiate churches, several parish churches, religious houses, and hospitals, besides a town-hall, custom-house, museum, and library. Manf. Anciently this place was celebrated for its terra-cotta vases; now its chief manufacture consists of furs and woollen stuffs. Pop. about 11,000.—There is a prefecture of Arezzo, which has an area of 1,776 square miles, and a population of upwards of 220,000.—In the immediate neighbourhood Michael Angelo was born, in 1474; and the town is the birthplace of Redi the physiologist, Guido the inventor of musical notation, Petrarch the poet, Vasari the painter, and Mecœnas the friend and minister of Augustus.

ARFE, ar'-fai, the name of two celebrated silversmiths of Spain, who designed and executed some of the most splendid tabernacles of the Spanish cathedrals. Lived in the 16th century.

ARGAEUS, MOUNT, ar'-gans, the highest mountain of Asia Minor, in the pashalic of Karamania. Height, 13,000 feet.

ARGO, the name of the ship which carried Jason and his companions, the Argonauts, to Colchis, when they resolved to recover the golden fleece. (See JASON.)

ARGOS, ar'-gos, the name of a small but famous kingdom of the Peloponnesus. Argos, the chief town, stands on the river Nacho, the ancient Inachus. It is considered the most ancient city of Greece. Pop. 9,000. Lat. 37° 40′ N. Lon. 22° 47′ E.

ARGOSTOLI, ar-gos'-to-le, the chief town of the island of Cephalonia, with a good harbour, 8 miles from Cephalonia. The houses are small and meanly built. Pop. 5,000. Lat. 38° 10′ N. Lon. 19° 59′ E.

ARGUS, ar'-gus, the son of Arestor, and said to have had a hundred eyes; but being killed by Mercury, when appointed by Juno to guard Io, his eyes were transferred to the tail of a peacock.

ARGYLL, or ARGYLL, ar-gile', a maritime county on the west coast of Scotland, consisting partly of the mainland, partly of islands, and having on its N. Inverness-shire, E. Perth and Dumbarton shires, S. the Irish Sea and the river Clyde, and W the Atlantic Ocean. Area, with islands, upwards of 3,000 square miles. Desc. Its shores consist of several long promontories and deep bays and inlets, in which the herring-fishery is prosecuted with success. A large portion of the shire consists of heath, rocks, and mountains, of which Ben Cruachan attains an elevation of 3,390 feet above the level of the sea, and throws its deep shadow upon Loch Awe, one of the most solemn lakes of Scotland, with a fresh-water area estimated at 52,000 acres. Pro. Mostly cattle, which are exported in great numbers to the markets in the south. The great bulk of the inhabitants are occupied in the fisheries, and in agricultural and pastoral pursuits. Manf. Unimportant. Towns. The principal are Oban, Inverary, and Campbeltown. Pop. about 90,000.

ARGYLL, CAMPBELLS, lords of. This family traces its descent from an individual of their name, who, in the 12th century, intermarried with the daughter of a Highland chief, and had for her dowry the lordship of Loch Awe, in Argyleshire. From that time the family has, more or less, taken a distinguished part in public affairs, and several of their members have risen to historical celebrity. The most remarkable of these are the following:—

ARGYLL, Campbell Archibald, marquis of, who was amongst the most zealous and the bravest of the partisans of the cause of the Covenanters. He took arms against King Charles I., and in 1644 commanded the army sent against Montrose, whom he proclaimed a traitor, and for whose head he offered a reward of £20,000. He subsequently took the leading part in the Scottish installation of Charles II., on whose head, on 1st January, 1651, he placed the crown at Scone, previous to the battle of Worcester. He afterwards submitted to Cromwell, and sat in the parliament of his son Richard as member for Aberdeenshire. For these acts he was, at the Restoration, indicted for high treason, convicted, and beheaded in Edinburgh, 1661. B. 1598.

ARGYLL, Archibald, earl of, son of the above, was a resolute and brave adherent to the royal cause, and so well known for the stanchness of his loyalty, that he was excepted by Cromwell from the general pardon which he granted in 1654. In 1682 he was indicted for treason, and condemned to suffer death, on account of his opposition to the measures of the duke of York; but he made his escape from prison in the train of his step-daughter, Lady Sophia Lindsay, as whose page he was disguised, and fled to Holland. Returning, however, in the April of 1685, he made a descent into Argyleshire at the head of a considerable force, but was made prisoner. On the 30th of June of the same year, on a single day's notice, he was executed at Edinburgh on his former sentence.

ARGYLL, John, second duke of, was the grandson of the above, whose father was created a duke by William III. The subject of our notice distinguished himself equally as a statesman and a soldier. In 1705 he was created an English peer by the titles of Baron Chatham and Earl of Greenwich, for his efforts in furthering the union of Scotland and England. As a brigadier-general he fought at the famous battle of Ramilies, and greatly distinguished himself at Oudenarde and Malplaquet, as well as at the sieges of Ostend, Meenen, Lisle, Ghent, and Tournay. On the accession of the Hanoverian family to the throne, he was appointed commander-in-chief of all the king's forces in Scotland, and in 1715 displayed great energy and decision in suppressing the rebellion in Scotland, popularly known in the north as "Mar's rising." He held several offices, of which he was deprived by Sir Robert Walpole, but to which he was again restored on the fall of that minister. B. 1678; D., without issue, 1743. With his death his English titles became extinct.

ARGYLL, George John Douglas Campbell, eighth duke of, early in life took an active part in the controversies raging between religious parties in Scotland, and in a pamphlet recommended the abolition of lay patronage in the church. Although going a great way with the views of Dr. Chalmers in reference to "the spiritual independence of the church," he could not go so far as to leave the establishment and become an absolute adherent to the free church movement. At this period he held the title of marquis of Lorn, but in 1847 he succeeded to the dukedom, on the demise of his father. In 1852 he held the office of Lord Privy Seal under the government of the earl of Aberdeen, and under the premiership of Lord Palmerston he continued to hold it till November, 1855, when he exchanged it for the office of Postmaster-general; but, however ardently he pursues certain political questions, he never forgets to bestow much of his time upon literary and scientific pursuits. On the fall of the government of Lord Palmerston, he resigned his office. B. 1823.

ARIADNE, ă'-ri-ăd'-ne, daughter of Minos, who, out of love to Theseus, gave him a clue of thread which guided him out of the Cretan labyrinth, and he married her; but he afterwards deserted her, when she became a priestess of Bacchus.

ARIANO, ar-e-a'-no, a town of Naples, 17 miles from Benevento. It is situate on a steep hill in the Principato Ultra, is the see of a bishop, and does an export trade in wine and butter. Pop. 14,000.—There is another small town of the same name in the States of the Church, 20 miles from Ferrara.

ARICA, a-re'-ka, the chief seaport-town of Southern Peru, on the coast of the Pacific, with a convenient port, but with a most unhealthy climate, and subject to frequent earthquakes. Lat. 18° 28′ S. Lon. 70° 18′ W.

ARIEGE, a'-re-zish', a river of France, rising in the Pyrenees and falling into the Garonne.

ARIEGE, a department of S. France. Ext. 66 miles, running east and west, with an average breadth of 48 miles, from north to south. Area, 1,900 square miles. General Desc. Wooded and mountainous, with a mild climate generally, and with iron-mines, marble-quarries, and mineral waters. Its chief commerce is in grain, cheese, iron, and wood. Its manufactures consist of woollen, cotton, paper, and steel wares. Towns. Foix, Pamiers, and St. Girons. Pop. 270,000. Lat. between 42° 33′ and 43° 19′ N. Lon. between 0° 50′ and 2° 8′ E.

ARION, a-ri'-on, an ancient musician, who invented the dithyrambic measure, and became rich by his professional skill. Flourished in the 7th century B.C.

ARION, a lyric poet of Methymna, who, on his passage to Italy, saved his life from the cruelty of the sailors by means of dolphins, which the sweetness of his music brought together.

ARIOSTI, a'-re-os'-te, an Italian dramatic composer, who wrote several operas, the most popular of which was "Coriolo," which is supposed to have been parodied by Gay in the "Beggar's Opera." He was one of the three composers whose services were engaged for the establishment of the Royal Academy of Music in London. The others were Bononcini and Handel; but the reputation of Ariosti seems to have been based upon a slight foundation, as in a few years he fell into neglect. B. at Bologna.—We can find no record as to what became of this composer, who gave lessons to Handel, and by whom, in conjunction with Bononcini and his pupil, the well-known opera of "Muzio Scevola" was composed.

ARIOSTO, Ludovico, or Lewis, a-re-os'-to, an Italian poet, patronized by the cardinal d'Este, by whose interest he obtained several employments. He entered into the service of Alfonso, duke of Ferrara, who appointed him governor of Graffingnana. His most famous piece is entitled "Orlando Furioso." He also wrote some comedies, which were performed in the hall of Ferrara, before the duke and his court. B. at Reggio, in Lombardy, 1474; D. at Ferrara, 1533.—Ariosto is considered among the best of Italian satirists, and he was one of the first writers of regular comedy in Italy. His "Orlando Furioso" has been translated into most continental languages, and the best in English is that by Mr. S. Rose.

ARISH, or EL ARISH, el air'-ish, a small town in Syria, where, in 1799, Sir Sydney Smith concluded a convention with the French, by which he permitted them to return to France with their arms and baggage, and which was afterwards disapproved by the British government. Lat. 31° 5′ N. Lon. 33° 48′ E.

ARISPE, a-ris'-pe, a mining town of Mexico, in the intendancy of Sonora, near the source of the river Yaqui. Pop. differently estimated from 3,500 to 7,000.

ARISTÆUS, ă-ris-tæ'-us, Apollo's son, who taught mankind to extract oil from the olive, to make butter, honey, &c.

ARISTARCHUS, ă-ris-tar'-kus, a Grecian philosopher, reputed to have been the first who asserted the rotation of the earth upon its axis, and its motion round the sun. He is also said to have invented sun-dials. B. at Samos. Lived 280 B.C.—Another, celebrated for his critical powers. He criticised Homer with such severity, that all severe critics since his time have been denominated "Aristarchi." He also criticised Pindar and other poets.

ARISTEAS, ă-ris'-te-as, an officer under Ptolemy Philadelphus, who is said to have been a Jew by birth, and to have had a principal share in getting the Hebrew scriptures translated into Greek, which version is called the Septuagint.

ARISTIDES, ăr-is-ti'-dez, a celebrated Athenian, who rose to the first offices in the state, and discharged them with such integrity as to obtain the surname of the Just. At Marathon he distinguished himself by his bravery, and though he had charge of the spoils, took nothing for himself. The party of Themistocles at length prevailed against him, and he was banished by the ostracism. D., in poverty, about 467 B.C.—The Athenians bestowed a magnificent funeral on him, and gave his son Lysimachus an estate and pension, besides giving his daughters portions from the state.

ARISTIPPUS, ăr-is-tip'-us, of Cyrene, the disciple of Socrates, and founder of the Cyrenaic sect. His maxim was, that pleasure is the chief good of man; and thus differed widely from the doctrines of his master. He flourished about 400 B.C.—His daughter Arete was famous for her wisdom and beauty.

ARISTOBULUS I. and II., ăr-is-to-bu'-lus, kings of the Jews, who reigned in the 1st century B.C.

ARISTOGITON and HARMODIUS, ă-ris-to-gi'-ton, har-mo'-de-us, two celebrated friends, of Athens, who, by their joint efforts, delivered their country from the tyranny of the Pisistratidæ, 510 B.C.

ARISTOMENES, ăr-is-tom'-e-nes, a celebrated Greek, the son of Nicomedes, and descended from the kings of Messene. He defeated the Spartans in a great battle, for which his countrymen would have made him king, but he was content with the title of general. Lived in the 7th century B.C. D. at Rhodes, where he was buried with great pomp.

ARISTOPHANES, ăr-is-tof'-a-nes, a celebrated Greek play-writer, the son of Philip of Rhodes. He wrote fifty-four comedies, of which only eleven have come down to us. He lived in the time of Socrates, Demosthenes, and Euripides, and lashed the vices of his age with a masterly hand. The wit and excellence of his comedies are well known, but his attack upon Socrates is justly censured. Aristophanes has been called the prince of the ancient comedy, as Menander is of the new. The play called "Nubes" is that in which Socrates is ridiculed. B. in the island of Ægina. Flourished 434 B.C.

ARISTOTLE, ăr'-is-tot'-el, the head of the Peripatetic sect, was the son of Nicomachus, physician to Amyntas, grandfather of Alexander the Great. Losing his parents when young, it is said he led such a dissipated life as to squander away his estate, although others assert that he became a pupil of Plato at the age of seventeen. On the death of that philosopher, under whom he studied with great diligence, but to whom some assert he was ungrateful, he went to the court of Hermias, at Atarna, in Mysia, and married that prince's sister. He was afterwards sent for by Philip of Macedon to instruct Alexander, and gave such satisfaction to the king, that the latter erected statues to him, and rebuilt Stagira, his birthplace. On the accession of Alexander to the throne, Aristotle refused to accompany him in his expeditions, but recommended to him his kinsman Calisthenes, and he himself settled at Athens, where, in the Lyceum, he taught his philosophy to a great number of disciples. Here he composed his principal works. Being accused of impiety, he wrote an apology for himself, and addressed it to the magistrates. He soon, however, quitted this city, and spent the remainder of his days at Chalcis, a city in Eubœa. Some say that he poisoned himself; others, that he cast himself into the river Euripus; and some assert that he died a natural death, 323 B.C. B. at Stagira, 384 B.C.—The works of Aristotle may be classed under the heads of rhetoric, poetry, politics, ethics, physics, mathematics, logic, and metaphysics; and they display an immense amount of genius.

ARIUS, air'-i-us, founder of the sect of the Arians, whose opinions in reference to the divinity of Jesus Christ occasioned such disputes, that Constantine, in 325, called a council at Nice to put an end to them. In this council the heresy of Arius was condemned, and the celebrated confession of faith known by the name of the Nicene Creed, drawn up. Arius was now banished by the emperor; but two years after he was recalled to Constantinople, and made a confession of his faith, which was received as orthodox. He next went to Alexandria, where Athanasius refused to receive him. When that prelate was banished, Arius returned to that city, but the people obliged him to withdraw. He retired into Egypt, where he raised new disturbances by his opinions; on which the emperor sent for him to Constantinople, and demanded of him whether he adhered to the Nicene faith. Arius answered on oath that he did, and at the same time delivered his own confession, which, appearing sound, Constantine ordered that he should be readmitted into the church. He was then conducted in triumph by his followers to the great church, but died on the way, in 336. B. in Libya.—His doctrines did not expire with him, but occasioned fierce contentions in Christendom for ages.

ARKANSAS RIVER, ar-kăn'-săs, or ar-kăn-saw', with the exception of the Missouri, the largest affluent of the Mississippi, which it joins at lat. 33° 56′ N.; lon. 91° 10′ W.—The course of this river is about 2,200 miles, and it is estimated to drain 178,000 square miles of country.—ARKANSAS COUNTY lies on both sides of this river. Pop. 4,000.

ARKANSAS, one of the United States, lying between the state of Missouri on the N., Louisiana on the S., the Texas on the W., and the Mississippi river on the E. Ext. 240 miles long, with an average width of 230.

Area, 52,000 square miles. Desc. The centre of this vast state is generally of a rich soil, and in the scenery which it presents, beautifully undulating and wooded; but towards the east it becomes soft and marshy, though still thickly clothed with forest-trees, whilst the W. rises into mountains. Rivers. Arkansas, Washita, and the Red and White. Pro. Maize, wheat, rice, sugar, potatoes, cotton, and tobacco. Extensive herds browse upon the prairies. Minerals. Iron, coal, and salt are the principal. Towns. Arkansas, Little Rock, Batesville, Columbia, and Fulton. Little Rock is the seat of government. Manf. Chiefly articles of necessary use. There are some tanneries, cotton-factories, distilleries, brick-fields, and numerous flour-mills. Pop. about 220,000, including 50,000 slaves. Lat. between 33° and 36° 30′ N. Lon. between 89° 40′ and 94° 40′ W.—Arkansas takes its name from a tribe of Indians, now extinct, and in 1685 was first explored and settled by the French. It formerly formed a portion of Louisiana, which in 1803 was purchased by the United States from France for 15,000,000 dollars.

ARKENGARTH-DALE, ar-ken-garth, a parish in the North Riding, Yorkshire, 11 miles from Richmond. Area, 14,180 acres. Pop. 1,300, chiefly employed in lead-mines, which, from a remote period, have been wrought, and are still very productive.

ARKLOW, ark'-lo, a seaport-town of Ireland, in county Wicklow, on the Avoca or Ovoca, near the Irish Sea, 12 miles from Wicklow. It stands in a barony of the same name. Pop. of barony, 26,000; of town, 3,500. The inhabitants are mostly employed in the herring and oyster fisheries. In the neighbourhood of the town a sanguinary engagement took place between the insurgent United Irishmen and the king's troops, in June, 1798.

ARKWRIGHT, ark'-rite, Sir Richard, an English manufacturer, who, from being originally a barber at Wirksworth, in Derbyshire, commenced travelling through the country buying hair, and at Warrington became acquainted with one Kay, a clockmaker, with whom he projected a machine for spinning cotton, in the perfecting of which they were assisted by Mr. Atherton, of Liverpool. Arkwright afterwards went into partnership with Mr. Smalley, of Preston, but not succeeding there, they went to Nottingham, and erected a cotton-mill, which was worked by horse-power. By this time Arkwright had taken out a patent for his machine, which, however, was, in 1785, set aside in the court of King's Bench. He afterwards erected works at Crumford, in Derbyshire, and acquired a large fortune. He was knighted in 1786. D. 1792.

ARLAUD, ar'-lo, James Antony, an eminent Swiss painter, who went, at the age of 20, to Paris. Here he was patronized by the royal family, painted his Leda, a copy of which he sold in London for £600, but would never part with the original; and it is said that, in a fit of enthusiasm, he destroyed this exquisite production by cutting it to pieces. B. at Geneva, 1668; D. 1743.

ARLES, ARELAS, or ARELATE, arl, a well-built town of France, in the department of the Mouths of the Rhone, 54 miles by railway from Marseilles. Besides the cathedral church, which is large, there are several parish churches and other religious houses, an hospital, and a royal academy of sciences, founded in 1689. Here have been held, at different periods, no less than 13 ecclesiastical councils. It carries on a trade in corn, wine, oil, fruit, sheep, and sausages, and has a few manufactures of serge, gold and silver articles, and saltpetre. Pop. 21,000. Lat. 43° 40 N. Lon. 5° 43′ E. —Constantine, the Roman emperor, took great delight in this place, and made it the seat of his empire in Gaul; and here are some remains of antiquities, of which a Roman amphitheatre, capable of holding 24,000 spectators, and an obelisk, are the most remarkable.

ARLES, CANAL OF, commences at the Rhone, at Arles, and ends at Port du Bouc, on the Mediterranean, being a distance of 25 miles. Its construction was suggested by the dangerous passage of the delta of the Rhone.

ARLOTTA, ar-lot'-a, mother of William the Conqueror. She was a tanner's daughter, at Falaise, where she attracted the notice of Robert, duke of Normandy. On his decease, she married a Norman gentleman, by whom she had three children, who were all provided for by William I.

ARMAGH, ar-ma, a county in Ireland, bounded N. by Lough Neagh, W. by Tyrone and Monaghan counties, S. by Louth, and E. by county Down. Ext. 31 miles long and 20 broad. Area, 512 square miles. Desc. It is traversed by a chain of mountains called the Fewes, and, with the exception of these, the soil is rich and well cultivated, besides being plentifully watered by numerous streams, and abounding in picturesque lakes. Rivers. Bann, Blackwater, Callan, and Newry-water. Pro. The usual cerealia of Britain, potatoes, flax, &c. Towns. The principal are Armagh, Lurgan, Portadown, and a portion of Newry. Manf. Linen fabrics chiefly. Pop. perhaps 200,000.

ARMAGH, 'the lofty field,' anciently the metropolis of Ireland, and now the capital of the above county, is situate on a hill, near the river Callan, 33 miles from Belfast, and 62 N. of Dublin. It is the seat of the consistorial court of the archbishop of Armagh, the primate and metropolitan of all Ireland. In the middle ages it was a populous city, but had greatly declined when its primate, Dr. Robinson, afterwards Baron Rokeby, repaired the cathedral, and had the town altogether renovated. He built and endowed an observatory, a library, and a palace, with a chapel on the glebe adjacent to the city; also a parish church, and a school, where children were to be educated gratuitously, according to the modern system. With these improvements a general revival took place among the population, who formed a public promenade, and called it the Mall. Armagh has a very large market every Tuesday; the principal commodity sold being linen cloth in the brown state. It has also a large inland trade in linen, corn, and yarn. Pop. about 11,000.—A station on the Belfast and Armagh Railway.

ARMAGNAC, ar'-man-yak', a small territory in the old French territory of Gascogne, from which the counts of Armagnac took their title.

ARMAGNAC, counts of, a family descended from the ancient dukes of Aquitaine and Gascogne, and many of whose members were mixed up with the public affairs which agitated Europe between the beginning of the 14th and the end of the 15th centuries.

ARMENIA, ar-me'-ne-a, the Minni of the Scriptures, a country of western Asia, bounded N. by Georgia and Mingrelia, S. and E. by the territories of Julamerick and the province of Azerbijan, and W. by the river Euphrates. Area, from 80,000 to 90,000 square miles. Desc. Mountainous in general, and, owing to its height above the level of the sea, of a colder temperature than might have been expected from its geographical position. Here the celebrated Mount Ararat forms an angle of an immense range of mountains, and rears its lofty peak amid everlasting snows. Rivers. The Tigris, the heads of the Euphrates, the Aras, the Kur, and the Joruk. Lakes. Van, Urumiyah, and Sevan. Pro. Wheat and barley are extensively cultivated; cotton, hemp, tobacco, and raw silk are also plentiful. Manna is produced in sufficient quantities to be exported; and honey and wax are obtained in the hilly districts. Minerals. Gold, silver, copper, lead, and iron; saltpetre, sulphur, and bitumen. There are productive quarries of jasper and marble. Towns. These are principally of the same names as the pashalics into which the country is divided; these being, Erzeroum, Kars, and Van. Manf. Unimportant, and mostly consisting of copper and iron, silk and cotton, wine, tobacco, and manna. Pop. It is impossible to say, but not much less, perhaps, than 2,000,000, of whom a seventh may be natives, and the rest divided into Persians, Turks, and Kurds. Lat. between 37° and 42° N. Lon. between 39° and 50° E —Armenia (Major and Minor) formed a part of the empire of the Medes, and passed through the same changes as that empire till 224 B.C., when Zadriades and Artaxeas revolted from Antiochus the Great, the former taking possession of Armenia Minor, and the latter of Armenia Major. Tigranes, who reigned here in 95 B.C., reduced Armenia Minor and other provinces. He became tributary to Rome in 66 B.C., and Trajan made this country a Roman province in 106. In 370 it was conquered by Sapor, king of Parthia, but the Romans soon recovered it. Afterwards it was governed by its own princes, till the Saracens obtained it, about 651. It was conquered by the Seljukian Turks about 1046, after which it suffered many changes till it was reduced by the prince of Kharasm in 1200, who was driven out of it by Genghis Khan in 1218. In 1335 the Ilkanian dynasty began here, and continued till 1385, when it was conquered by Timur, from whom it was soon after recovered by the Ilkanian princes. On the death of Ahmed Jalayr, the last of that line, in 1405, Kara Yusef, the chief of the Turcomans, got possession of it. This dynasty had the name of the Black Sheep, and in 1488 it fell by conquest to the family of the White Sheep. In 1500 it was conquered by Ismael Sosi, and reduced by Selim II. in 1552; since which the Turks have held possession of all, except that part in the east which belongs to the Persians, and the Russian government of Transcaucasia. In the Russian war of 1854, Armenia was one of the theatres of the conflict. (See KARS, ERZEROUM, &c.)

ARMENTIERES, ar-man'-ti-air, a town of France, on the Lys, 9 miles from Lille, department of the North. Manf. Linen and other stuffs. Pop. 7,600.

ARMFELT, Gustavus Maurice, arm'-felt, a Finnish nobleman, who distinguished himself as a statesman in the service of Sweden. His life, however, was one of continual difficulty, danger, and vicissitude. He finally entered the Russian service, in which he was treated with the most distinguished honour. B. at Abo, 1757; D. at Tzarskoe-Selo, 1814.

ARMINIUS, James, ar-min'-i-us, a Dutch divine, and the founder of Arminianism, was in 1588 ordained, and became a popular preacher. About this time, Lydius, theological professor at Franeker, desired him to refute a piece on predestination, which had been written against Beza by some divines at Delft. In studying this point, Arminius became a convert to the opinion which he was employed to confute. In 1603 he was appointed professor of divinity at Leyden, where his lectures were much admired. His great adversary was Gomarus, with whom he held several conferences. B. at Oudewater, 1560; D. 1609.—Arminius was a very learned, pious, and eloquent man, and remarkable for the evenness of his temper. His motto was, "A good conscience is a paradise."

ARMITAGE, ar'-mi-tuj, a parish of Staffordshire, near Rugeley, through which the tunnel of the Grand Trunk Canal, which joins the Trent, is cut. Pop. 1,100.—It is a station on the London and North-western Railway.

ARMLEY, arm'-le, a township of the West Riding of Yorkshire, 2 miles from Leeds, on the Bradford Railway. Manf. Chiefly woollen. Pop. from 6,000 to 7,000. The Great Northern, Midland, and Lancashire and Yorkshire Railways have each a station here.

ARMSDALE HEAD, arms'-dail hed, a cape on the N. coast of Scotland. Lat. 58° 36′ N. Lon. 3° 56′ W.

ARMSTRONG, arm'-strong, an agricultural county of the United States, in Pennsylvania. Area, 575 square miles. Pop. 29,500.

ARMSTRONG, John, a Scotch poet and physician, who, in 1732, took his degree of M.D. at Edinburgh. In 1744 he published the "Art of Preserving Health," one of the best didactic poems in our language, and shortly afterwards received the appointment of physician to the military hospital. In 1760 he was appointed physician to the army in Germany, and the next year wrote a poem called "Day, an Epistle to John Wilkes, of Aylesbury, Esq." In this letter he threw out a reflection upon Churchill, which drew on him the resentment of that satirist. He published several other works of a miscellaneous character. B. at Castleton, Roxburghshire; D. at London, 1779.

ARNAUD, Henri, ar'-no, first the pastor of the Vaudois, and then their military leader in endeavouring to recover the possession of their valleys in Piedmont, from which they had been driven by the tyranny of a count of Savoy. He himself subsequently became the historian of this expedition, and says that in eighteen battles fought against his enemies he lost only thirty of his followers, whilst no fewer than 10,000 of his foes were slain. B. in La Tour, Piedmont, 1641; D. pastor of Schomberg, 1721.

ARNAULD, Antony, ar'-nawld, a French polemical writer of considerable reputation in his time. B. at Paris, 1612; D. 1694, when his heart, at his own request, was sent to be deposited in the Port Royal. His works are exceedingly numerous.

ARNAUTS, ar'-nawts, the name given by the Turks to the inhabitants of Albania. (See ALBANIA.)

ARNDT, Ernst Moritz, arnt, a German political writer of ability, who, on completing his collegiate studies at the university of Jena, assumed the profession of the church, and travelled through Italy, France, Hungary, Austria, and Sweden. The observations made in these travels were reduced to writing, and Arndt now became professor extraordinary at Griefswald. Here he denounced, in a work, the serfdom which then existed in Pomerania, and subsequently, in a still more spirited production, fervently appealed to the patriotism of his countrymen to check the bondage to which they were being reduced under the policy then pursued by Napoleon I. The boldness with which he spoke of the emperor, in subsequently expanding this work, forced him to flee his country, and he sought refuge in Stockholm. Returning to his country under an assumed name, he resumed his pen, and wrote a great many effusions both in poetry and prose, which had for their object the rousing of the whole spirit of Germany against the foreign yoke under which it groaned. These produced a great effect at the time, and after the peace (1815-16) he became the editor of a journal called "The Watchman," at Cologne. In 1818 he was presented by the king of Prussia with the professorial chair of modern history in the university of Bonn. His liberal tendencies, however, soon caused his suspension from his duties, although he was still allowed to retain his salary. For twenty years he lived in retirement, when, in 1848, the Revolution drew him once more into public life. He became a member of the National Assembly at Frankfort; from this, however, he soon withdrew, and has lived mostly in seclusion since. B. at Schoritz, isle of Rugen, 1769.

ARNE, Thomas Augustine, an English musician, articled to an attorney; but he soon abandoned the desk for the violin, on which he played so well that he was engaged as leader of the orchestra at Drury-lane. In 1733 he composed the music for Addison's opera of "Rosamond," which was received with universal applause. In 1738 he acquired great credit by setting Milton's "Comus," and in 1740 set Mallet's masque of "Alfred," in which first appeared the song of "Rule Britannia." In 1759 Oxford conferred on him the degree of doctor of music. B. 1710; D. 1778.

ARNHEIM, arn'-hime, the capital of Guelderland, Holland, standing at a distance of about 50 miles from Amsterdam, on the right bank of the Rhine, where it is crossed by a bridge of boats. It is neatly built, and its fortifications, in 1702, were greatly enlarged by the famous Cohorn. Manf. Cotton, woollen, paper, and tobacco. It has likewise an active trade in other articles. Pop. 17,000. Lat. 52° N. Lon. 5° 37′ E.—Arnheim was taken from the Spaniards in 1585, and in 1813 the Prussians took it from the French. It is connected by railway with Utrecht, Amsterdam, Hague, Rotterdam, and will soon be, if not already, with Emmerich, in Rhenish Prussia.

ARNHEIM BAY, a spacious bay at the north-west extremity of the Gulf of Carpentaria. It is bordered by Arnheim Land, which was discovered by the crews of the Arnheim and Pera, in 1618. Kangaroos are abundant, and parrots are seen in the woods. Lat. of the entrance, 12° 11′ S. Lon. 136° 3′ E.

ARNO, ar'-no, the principal river of Tuscany, which has its source in Monte Falterona, of the Apennines, and after traversing the grand duchy from E. to W., enters, by an artificial mouth, the Mediterranean Sea, 8 miles below Pisa. Its valley is one of the most beautiful and most fertile in Italy.

ARNOLD, ar'-nold, a town and parish of England, 4 miles from Nottingham. Manf. Chiefly hosiery. Area, 4,670 acres. Pop. 5,000.

ARNOLD, Samuel, an English musician, who, about 1760, became composer to Covent-garden Theatre, where he distinguished himself by several fine productions. His "Cure of Saul" attracted crowded houses, and this was succeeded by the "Prodigal Son," an oratorio, for which, in 1773, he obtained his doctor's degree at Oxford. At this time he was proprietor of the Marylebone Gardens, then a favourite place of public amusement. On the death of Dr. Nares, in 1783, he was appointed organist and composer to the Chapel Royal. In 1786 he commenced a splendid edition of Handel's works. B. 1740; D. 1802; and was buried in chanical genius led him to effect great improvements in the marine chronometer. B. at Bodmin, 1744; D. 1799.

ARNOLD, Thomas, D.D. The father of Dr. Thomas Arnold was a collector of customs at Cowes, Isle of poetry and history, and where he received the cognomen of "Poet Arnold," because he had composed an effusion after the manner of Sir W. Scott. Being thus early impressed with the chivalrous song of the "Minstrel of the North" might be deemed predictive of the manly tone which his own future character was to assume in all that appertained to the moral and intellectual stature of man's nature. In his sixteenth year (1811) he was removed to Oxford, having in Corpus Christi College obtained a scholarship. Here his character took a new direction. He merged the ideal in the real, already giving an omen of that "intense earnestness" with which his future existence was to be governed and guided. In defining his convictions at this period, we should say that he considered, in relation to duty and conduct, all mere professions to be the idealities of mankind, and only performances to be their realities. In 1814 he took a first-class degree, and became a fellow of Oriel College. In 1818 he became a deacon. In 1820 he got married, and settled at Laleham, near Staines, where another change seems to have passed over his character. He was now twenty-five, and he had taken several young men under his tuition to prepare them for the universities. He was at the same time employing his leisure, if he allowed himself any, in collecting materials for his edition of Thucydides, whilst contributing articles on Roman history to the "Encyclopædia Metropolitana." His industry, at this time, appears before us as a picture of the moral and intellectual development of a physical Hercules. Hitherto his character had been more or less marked by indolence, succeeded by that kind of restless energy which, so far as we have seen, we take to indicate generally some undefined longing of a strong and unsatisfied mind. It springs from an intense desire for the attainment of something which only appears in shadow to itself, and to which time and circumstance alone will give light, form, and embodiment. At Laleham the mind of Arnold attained its desire. It was there that the indolence and restlessness were exchanged for the industry and the active purpose, or, in his own language, the "intense earnestness" by which he was henceforth actuated in following out his mission of life. In 1828 he was elected head master of Rugby school, and he entered upon his duties as a benevolent, ardent, and enlightened instructor. His pupils were not half his years; they were therefore to be treated with kindness. They were to be educated in the polite arts; therefore they were to be held in control by a respectful authority. They were to enter the world, and to be presumed to pursue their destinies in it as gentlemen; therefore were they to be treated with courtesy. These few simple rules seem to us to have greatly guided Arnold in his conduct at Rugby, and to have been great aids to his gaining the universal respect and deep affection of all intrusted to his care. In 1835 he accepted the office of a fellowship in the new London University; but in 1838 retired, on account of some difference between the members upon the principle of voluntary examinations. In 1841 Lord Melbourne appointed him regius professor of modern history at Oxford, but he lived only to deliver his introductory course of lectures. B. at Cowes, 1795; D. 1842.—Dr. Arnold was buried in the chapel at Rugby, and after his death several scholarships were founded by subscription in honour of his name. His writings consist of a Roman history, an edition of Thucydides, a volume of lectures on modern history, several volumes of sermons, and other contributions of a miscellaneous kind to reviews and other periodicals.

ARNOLD, Benedict, an American general, who, although bred a surgeon, was for many years master of a trading vessel; but on the breaking out of hostilities between Great Britain and the colonies, he entered into the service of the latter, and was chosen captain of a company of volunteers at Newhaven. He soon rose to the rank of colonel, and commanded an expedition to Canada, where he was joined by General Montgomery, and in an attempt on Quebec, received a wound in the leg. He next commanded a flotilla on Lake Champlain, where he distinguished himself by his bravery. He continued in the American service till 1780, when he opened a correspondence with Sir Henry Clinton for betraying West Point to the British, in which negotiation Major André became a victim. (See ANDRÉ.) Arnold had a narrow escape, and got on board an English ship of war. He now served with equal ardour on the other side, and, at the peace, retired to England, where he had a pension. He afterwards went to Nova Scotia, whence he sailed to the West Indies, and on his passage was taken by the French, from whom he effected an escape. B. in New England; D. in London, 1801.

ARNON, ar'-non, 'tumbling,' a river of Gilead, flowing into the Jordan.

ARNOTT, Neil, Dr., ar'-not, a Scotch medical practitioner, greatly distinguished for his benevolence, and his labours in the cause of sanitary improvement. He invented the water-bed and floating mattress, which, in cases of patients confined to their beds, have been used with great success. He is also the inventor of "Arnott's stove" and "Arnott's ventilator," which are now in almost universal use. B. near Montrose, 1788.—Dr. Arnott, as an author, has obtained great celebrity for his work entitled "Elements of Physics; or, Natural Philosophy, General and Medical, explained in plain or non-technical language." In 1854 the Royal Society awarded him the Rumford medal, and in 1855 the jurors of the class of the Universal Exposition of Paris awarded him the great gold medal, and Napoleon III. presented him with the cross of the Legion of Honour.

ARNSTADT, arn'-stat, a well-built and thriving town of Saxony, on the river Gera, with a considerable trade in corn and wool. Pop. 5,000.

ARPAD, ar'-pad, a chief of the Magyars, and founder of the Hungarian monarchy. Having crossed the Carpathian mountains, he entered a country which was split up into petty principalities, consisting of numerous Sclavonic tribes. These he won by presents, or conquered by arms, and finally took up his abode on the island of Tsepel, in the Danube. From this place he governed Hungary, and bequeathed it to Zoltan, his son and successor. D. 907.

ARRAH, a'-ra, a town and capital of a district in the province of Bengal, British India, 36 miles from Patna. It was in going to the relief of a few Englishmen who had fortified themselves in the neighbourhood of this place, that 400 British fell into an ambuscade of the sepoys, and of whom 200 were slain, July, 1857.

ARRAN, ăr'-ăn, an island on the W. coast of Scotland, near the mouth of the Clyde, and forming the larger part of the shire of Bute. Ext. 20 miles long, and from 8 to 11 broad. Area, 165 square miles. Desc. Mountainous and picturesque. In it are found marble, jasper, agates, cairngorms, and a fine species of rock crystal commonly called the Arran diamond. Small patches of flax are cultivated, and an inconsiderable quantity of linen, and some woollens, are manufactured; and the island is laid out in extensive sheep-walks. Its shores are frequented by shoals of salmon, herring, and white fish. A few red deer are still found in the island, and blackcock and other species of grouse are plentiful. Pop. about 7,000.

ARRAN ISLES, a group of Irish islands, belonging to the county of Galway, Connaught. United Area, 11,287 acres. Pop. 3,500.

ARRAN FOWDY and ARRENIG, ar'-an fow'-de, a-ren'-ig, two Welsh mountains in the county of Merioneth, a few miles from Bala. Height, nearly 3,000 feet.

ARRAS, ar'-as, a large and strongly fortified town of France, the capital of the department of the Pas de Calais, on the Scarpe, 36 miles from Amiens. The seat of a bishopric, and there is a cathedral, a large building of the Grecian order. Manf. Tapestry, fine linen, dimities, lace, and porcelain; it has also some beet-root sugar and soap factories. Pop. 25,000. Lat. 50° N. Lon. 2° 46′ E.—This is one of the most ancient towns in the kingdom, being the Atrebatum of the time of Cæsar. It is the birthplace of Robespierre, Lebon, and Damiens. For two years, during the first French revolution, Lebon governed this town with a ferocity and terrorism to be matched only by the fiercest tigers of the jungle.—It is a principal station on the Northern Railway of France.

ARRIA, ăr'-e-a, the wife of Cæcina Pætus, who perceiving the hesitation of her husband, the Roman consul, who was condemned by Claudius to fall upon his sword, plunged a dagger into her bosom, and drawing it out said, "My Pætus, it is not painful."

ARRIAN, ăr'-e-an, a Greek historian, who united the character of a warrior and philosopher, and rose to the highest dignities in Rome. B. at Nicomedia. Lived in the 2nd century.

ARRIAZA, Juan Bautista, ar-e-ath'-a, a Spanish poet, who takes rank among the best contemporary writers of his country. Many of his effusions have had a political aim in favour of monarchy and legitimacy. B. at Madrid, 1770; D. 1837.—He enjoyed a pension from Ferdinand VII., and held a post in the ministry of Foreign Affairs.

ARROQUHAR, ăr-ok-ar, a parish and village of Scotland, 4 miles from Ben Lomond, much resorted to by tourists. Pop. 600.

ARROW, ăr'-o, two small rivers of England, the one falling into the Lug, in Herefordshire, and the other into the Avon, in Worcestershire.

ARROW, a small river and loch of Ireland, 5 miles from Sligo.

ARROWSMITH, MOUNT, ăr-o-smith, Tasmania. Lat. 42° S. Lon. 146° E. Height, 4,000 feet.

ARROWSMITH, Aaron, an English map-maker, who, from an obscure beginning, by diligence and industry rose to prosperity. He executed upwards of one hundred and thirty maps. B. in Winston, Durham, 1750; D. in London, 1823.

ARRU, or ARoo, ar'-oo, a group of islands in the Asiatic Archipelago, which produce pearl, tortoise-shell, and trepang. These articles the inhabitants exchange with traders for British manufactured goods. Lat. between 5° 20′ and 6° 55′ S. Lon. between 134° and 134° 45′ E.

ARSACES I., ar-sa'-sez, founder of the Parthian monarchy. He induced his countrymen to rise against the Macedonian yoke, 250 B.C., on which they raised him to the throne. Arsaces was slain in battle, after reigning 38 years.—His successors all took his name.

ARSACES TIRANUS, ti-ra'-nus, king of Armenia, who being taken prisoner by Sapor, king of Persia, was cast into prison at Ecbatana, where he died, 362 B.C. His country then became a Persian province.

ARSACIDES. (See SOLOMON ISLANDS.)

ARSINOE, ar-sin'-o-e, a name common to several females, fountains, and towns in ancient history.

ARTA, or LARTA, ar'-ta, a town of Albania, on a river of the same name. Manf. Coarse woollen and other cloths. 360 miles from Constantinople. Lat. 39° 30′ N. Lon. 21° 8′ E. Pop. 6,000.

ARTA, GULF OF, a gulf of the Ionian Sea, near the entrance of which the naval battle of Actium was fought, 29 B.C.

ARTABANUS IV., ar'-ta-ba'-nus, the last of the Parthian monarchs, who, in 217, escaping with great difficulty from a perfidious massacre commenced by the Romans, with Caracalla at their head, mustered an army, and engaged his foes in a battle which lasted two days; but as the armies were preparing to renew the combat, Artabanus was informed of the death of Caracalla: peace was then made on honourable terms. Artaxerxes afterwards incited his subjects to revolt, and in a battle in 226, Artabanus was taken and put to death. Thus ended, in the 3rd century, the Parthian empire.

ARTAVASDES I., ar'-ta-vās'-dez, a king of Armenia, who succeeded his father Tigranes. He joined the Roman forces under Crassus, but deserted to the enemy, and thus the Romans were defeated and Crassus slain. He similarly betrayed Mark Antony when engaged against the Medes; but afterwards, Artavasdes fell into Antony's power, and he was taken, with his wife and children, to Alexandria, where they were dragged at his chariot-wheels in chains of gold. After the battle of Actium, Cleopatra caused his head to be struck off, and sent to the king of Media. Reigned in the 1st century B.C.

ARTAXERXES I., ar'-ta-xer'-xez, surnamed Longimanus, was the third son of Xerxes, king of Persia, and, having murdered his brother Darius, ascended the throne, 465 B.C. D. 424 B.C. and was succeeded by his only son, Xerxes.—This prince is generally supposed to have been the Ahasuerus of scripture, who married Esther, and by whose permission Ezra restored the Jewish religion at Jerusalem. The seventy weeks of Daniel are also dated in his reign.

ARTAXERXES II., surnamed Mnemon, on account of his great memory, was the eldest son of Darius Nothus, and began his reign 404 B.C. His brother Cyrus formed a conspiracy against him, for which he was sentenced to death; but, at the intercession of his mother Parysatis, the sentence was commuted to banishment to Asia Minor. Cyrus repaid this act of clemency by mustering a large army of Asiatics, and some Greek troops under Clearchus, with whom he marched to Babylon; but, being encountered by Artaxerxes, he was defeated and slain. The Greeks, however, escaped, and reached their own country, under Xenophon. Artaxerxes died at the age of 94, after reigning 62 years.

ARTAXERXES III. succeeded his father, the preceding monarch, 359 B.C. To pave his way to the succession, he murdered two of his brothers, and afterwards put to death all the remaining branches of the family. He succeeded in suppressing several insurrections which were raised against him, and in Egypt slew the sacred bull Apis, and gave the flesh to his soldiers. For this his eunuch, Bagoas, an Egyptian, caused him to be poisoned, and after giving his carcass to cats, made knife-handles of his bones, 338 B.C.

ARTAXERXES BEBEGAN, or ARDSHIR, the first king of Persia of the race of Sassanides, was a shepherd's son; but his grandfather, by the mother's side, being governor of a province, he was sent to the court of King Ardavan. On the death of his grandfather, he, being refused an appointment, retired to Persia proper, where, exciting the people to revolt, he defeated and slew Ardavan and his son; on which he assumed the title of king of kings. He made vast conquests, and administered the affairs of his kingdom with wisdom. He married the daughter of Ardavan, who, attempting to poison him, was sentenced to death. The officer, however, to whom the execution of this sentence was committed, concealed the queen, who was soon afterwards delivered of a son. The king discovering the secret, applauded the conduct of his officer, and acknowledged the child as his heir. D. 240.

ARTEDI, Peter, ar-te-de, a Swedish naturalist, between whom and Linnæus there was such an attachment, that they made each other heirs to all their MSS. Artedi devoted himself chiefly to ichthyology, which he greatly advanced. He was drowned at Leyden in 1735; Be 1705. Linnæus published, in 1738, his "Bibliotheca Ichthyologica" and his "Philosophia Ichthyologica."

ARTEMISIA I., ar-te-mis'-e-a, queen of Caria, who assisted Xerxes in person against the Greeks, and behaved with such valour that the Athenians offered a reward for her capture, and the Spartans erected a statue to her. Lived in the 5th century B.C.

ARTEMISIA II., queen of Caria, erected a monument to her husband Mausolus, which was so magnificent, that every splendid structure of the kind has since been called a mausoleum. Lived in the 4th century B.C.

ARTER, ar'-ter, a town in the island of Majorca. Manf. Linen and dyeing. Many of the inhabitants employ themselves in fishing. Pop. about 3,500.

ARTEVELDE, James and Philip, ar'-te-vel, the name of two Flemings, a father and son, distinguished for their patriotism in the 14th century. James, the father, was killed in a popular tumult at Ghent, 1345; and his son Philip, after making himself master of Bruges in 1382, was killed in the same year, at the battle of Rosbecq, where 25,000 Flemings fell.

ARTHUR, ar'-thur, a British prince, the son of Uther, pendragon or dictator of the Britons, by the wife of the duke of Cornwall. He succeeded Uther in 516, and instituted the military order of the Knights of the Round Table, and settled Christianity at York in the room of paganism. Of this celebrated personage there are many fabulous circumstances related. D. 542 A.D.

ARTHUR, duke of Brittany, the posthumous son of Geoffrey Plantagenet, son of Henry I., by Constantia, daughter of the duke of Brittany, and declared heir by his uncle Richard I., who afterwards devised his kingdoms to his brother John. A peace, however, taking place, Arthur did homage to his uncle for the dukedom of Brittany. In another rupture between England and France, Arthur was taken prisoner by John, who caused him to be confined in the castle of Rouen, where it is supposed he was murdered. B. 1187. —It is upon the supposed murder of this prince that the interest of Shakspeare's play of "King John" turns.

ARTOIS, ar'-twaw, an old county and government of France, which is now divided into the departments of the Pas de Calais, the Somme, and the North. It is from the name of this province that the word Artesian, as applied to wells, is derived, from its being customary amongst the inhabitants to bore the earth for springs.

ARTVIN, art'-vin, a town of Asiatic Turkey, 35 miles from Batoum. It has a trade in honey, wax, butter, and oil. Pop. about 7,000.

ARUN, ă-run, a small river of England, which flows into the sea at Little Hampton, in Sussex.

ARUNDEL, ă'-run-del, a town and parish of Sussex, situate on the Arun, 50 miles from London. The town is supported principally by a shipping trade in timber and corn. Pop. about 3,000. This was formerly a place of great strength, and was besieged by Henry I. in person, by whom it was taken, after a gallant resistance from the earl of Arundel. It is a station on the South Coast Railway.

ARUNDEL, Thomas, archbishop of Canterbury, in the reigns of Richard II. and Henries IV. and V. He was a severe persecutor of the followers of Wickliffe, and was one of the leaders in procuring the act "De Hæretico Comburendo." B. 1353; D. 1413.

ARVA, or ORAWA, ar'-va, a district in Hungary, situate among the Carpathian mountains, with an inclement atmosphere and barren soil. Pop., composed chiefly of Bohemian Sclavonians, 74,000.

ARVE, ar'-vai, a river in Savoy, which falls into the Rhone near the town of Geneva. Length, 45 miles.

ARZAMASS, ar-za-mas, a town of Nijnii Novgorod, Russia, on the Teschu, a tributary of the Oka. Manf. Soap, leather, sail and linen cloths. Pop. about 5,000.

ARZANEAU, ar'-za-no, a town of France, in Brittany, department of Finisterre. Pop. 4,150.

ARZEW, ar'-zoo, a seaport-town in the W. of Algeria, 26 miles from Oran. It is considered to be the ancient Arsenaria, and it contains many relics of antiquity. Lat. 35° 52′ N. Lon. 1° E.

ARZIGNANO, arts'-en-ya'-no, a town of Lombardy, 12 miles from Vicenza. Manf. Woollens, leather, and silk twist. Pop. 4,000.

ARZILLA, ar-zil'-a, a small seaport-town of Morocco, the first on the Mediterranean after passing Cape Spartel, from which it is distant about 20 miles. Pop. 1,000.

ARZOBISPO ISLAND, ar'-zo-bis'-po, in the Pacific. (See BONIN ISLANDS.)

ASA, ai'-sa, 'physician,' a good king of Judah.

ASAPH, ai'-saf, a Hebrew musician of the tribe of Levi, cotemporary with David, and the composer of several of the psalms.

ASAPH, ST., ăs'-af, a town and parish of Flintshire, 20 miles from Chester. It has a plainly-built cathedral, 170 feet long and 90 feet deep. The episcopal palace is a spacious and commodious building. Pop. 3,500.

ASCALON, ăs'-ka-lon, a town of Palestine, 14 miles from Gaza. Lat. 31° 35′ N. Lon. 34° 47′ E.—In 1099 a great victory was won here by the Crusaders.

ASCENSION, ă-sen'-shon, a district of the United States, and of which we have very meagre information. Area, 280 square miles. Pop. about 11,000, of whom more than half are slaves.

ASCENSION, a volcanic island in the Atlantic, 800 miles from St. Helena, and a possession of Great Britain. Ext. 8 miles long, with an average breadth of 4 miles. Area, 35 square miles. Desc. Mountainous, with one peak rising to a height of nearly 3,000 feet. Scarcely any verdure whatever clothes its surface. Climate. Dry but healthy. The castor-oil plant, pepper, the Cape gooseberry, and tomata, are indigenous. Turtle and birds' eggs form the principal exports of its inhabitants. Pop., nearly all military, 500. Lat. 7° 55′ S. Lon. 14° 25′ W.—This island was, in 1501, discovered on Ascension Day; from which circumstance it takes its name. The British took possession of it in 1815, when Napoleon I. was sent to St. Helena, and made it a military station. There is a victualling establishment on the island for supplying the African squadron, engaged in the suppression of the slave trade.

ASCENSION BAY, on the E. side of the peninsula of Yucatan, in the Bay of Honduras. Lat. 19° 30′ N. Lon. 88° 56′ W.

ASCH, ash, a market-town of Germany, on a rivulet of the same name, in the Bohemian circle of Egra. Manf. Woollens, hosiery, and wire. Pop. 8,000.

ASCHACH, ash'-ak, a large market-town of Upper Austria, with a fine castle, on the Danube, 13 miles from Linz. It is an entrepôt for timber, lattis, linens, and fruits.

ASCHAFFENBURG, ash-af'-en-boorg, the ancient Mercynia, a fortified town of Bavaria, on the Maine, 24 miles from Frankfort. Manf. Woollens, paper, soap, straw goods, and tobacco. Shipbuilding is carried on, and it has a pretty fair transit trade. Pop. 10,000.—The electors of Mentz had here an elegant castle. The principal public buildings are the churches of St. Peter and St. Alexander, two other churches, the foundation called Insignis Collegiata, the Capuchin monastery, and the Jesuits' college, in which is now held the Lyceum, or public school, with a royal library of 25,000 volumes. It is a principal station on the Bavarian State Railway.

ASCHAM, Roger, ăs'-kam, a learned English writer, on whom, in 1544, Henry VIII. settled a pension of 10*l.* a year. About the same time he was appointed classical tutor to Lady, afterwards Queen, Elizabeth, and after being thus honourably employed two years, he returned to Cambridge, where he had been before teacher of Greek, and had a pension settled upon him by King Edward VI., at the same time filling the office of public orator with great reputation. In 1550 he attended Sir Richard Morysine in his embassy to the emperor Charles V., and remained in Germany three years. He was now appointed Latin secretary to King Edward, but on the death of that prince he lost his place and pension. Afterwards he was made Latin secretary to Queen Mary, and was employed by Cardinal Pole. On the accession of Queen Elizabeth, he continued in his office of secretary, and became her private tutor in the learned languages. The only preferment he obtained was a prebend in the cathedral of York. B. at Kirby Wiske, near Northallerton, 1515; D. in London, 1568.—His most esteemed work is entitled "The Schoolmaster," of which an excellent edition by Mr. Upton appeared in 1711; his Latin epistles have been frequently printed, and are admired as elegant compositions. His works were printed entire, in 1 vol. 4to, in 1769.

ASCHERSLEBEN, ash-ers-lā'-ben, the chief town of a district of Prussian Saxony, in the principality of Halberstadt, between the rivers Eine and Wipper, 27 miles from Magdeburg. It was formerly a Hanse town. Manf. Friezes, flannels, linen fabrics, and earthenware. Pop. about 12,000.—In the neighbourhood of this town are the picturesque ruins of the ancient burgh of Ascania, the ancestral seat of the house of Anhalt.

ASCOLI, as'-ko-le, a frontier town of the Papal States, in the province of Fermo ed Ascoli, standing on the bank of the Tronto, 15 miles from Teramo. It is one of the pleasantest and best-built towns in the Papal States, and from its strong position and the stern character of the country in which it is situate, has, at all times of trouble, been considered an important place. Its trade is not great. Pop. 12,000.

ASCOT-HEATH, ăs'-kot, a celebrated horseracing-ground in Berkshire, 6 miles from Windsor.—The races of this place are held in the second week after those of Epsom, and are generally patronized by the sovereign and great numbers of the aristocracy. A branch line of the London and South-western Railway takes passengers to within a short distance of the race-course.

ASDRUBAL, and ASDRUBAL BARCA. (See HASDRUBAL.)

ASELE-LAPPMARK, a'-sel-lăp-mark, a town of Swedish Lapland, in a district of the same name, 85 miles from Umea. Lat. 64° 12′ N. Lon. 17° 4′ E.

ASENATH, ăs'-e-nath, 'peril' or 'misfortune,' an Egyptian princess, the wife of Joseph.

ASH, ăsh, a village in Surrey, on the London and South-western Railway, which, with Tongham, is the nearest station to the military camp, Aldershott. ASH is a name common to several parishes of England, none of which have a population over 3,000.

ASHANTEE, ăsh'-ăn-te', an extensive territory of Western Africa, situate immediately behind the states which occupy the Gold Coast. Ext. About 300 miles long and the same broad; but its limits are very inaccurately defined. Desc., Mountainous and well watered, but in many parts covered with dense forests, which remain impervious, save by several paths, which have been hewn through them with immense labour. Rivers. The principal are the Assinie and the Volta. These, however, would seem to have different names in different parts of the country. Climate. Hot; but, in the more elevated districts, considered healthy. Zoology. Elephants, lions, hyænas, wild hogs, deer, and antelopes. These are the principal wild quadrupeds. Of tame ones, cows, with horses of a small breed, with a kind of hairy sheep, and goats, are the chief. Of Birds, there are numerous vultures and hawks; parrots abound in the woods, and there are several smaller species of beautiful plumage, which are possessed of mellifluent powers of song. Of Reptilia, alligators and snakes are plentiful. Pro. The principal vegetable grown is the yam; but rice, corn, sugar-cane, and a mucilaginous vegetable called encruma, are cultivated; tobacco and the pine-apple are also cultivated, and gum and dye-woods are plentiful. Minerals. Gold, iron, and lead; the first is washed down the rivers in particles as well as in lumps, mingled with sand in the earth. Towns. The principal are Coomassia, the capital, Dwabin, Mankarno, Boossoor, Dinkira, Kickiwheri, Korsuza, Buntakoo, Salaga, and Yahndi, which are all capitals of the various districts, provinces, or kingdoms composing the country. Manf. Principally cotton cloth, which the Ashantees weave on a loom worked by strings and held between the toes. Their patterns are painted with a feather, and are often of brilliant colours. Leather is tanned, sword-blades are made, and figures of gold executed with considerable ingenuity. Pop. variously estimated; perhaps about 1,000,000. Lat. between 6° and 8° N. Lon. 0° 3′ W.—In 1826 the Ashantees were defeated in a great battle by the British, under Sir Charles McCarthy, governor-in-chief of all the British settlements on the west coast of Africa, from the Gambia to the Volta, inclusive. Since that time there have been no further wars, and the power of the Ashantees has gradually declined.

ASHBOURNE, ăsh'-borne, a town and parish of Derbyshire, on the Dove, 140 miles from London. Area, 12,800 acres. Manf. Lace and cotton fabrics, whilst an active trade is carried on in cheese and malt. Pop. 6,000. It is a station on the North Staffordshire Railway.

ASHBURNHAM, ăsh-burn-ham, a parish of Sussex, 4 miles from Battle. Area, 4,280 acres. Pop. 1,000.—In the church of this place the shirt which Charles I. wore at his execution is preserved.

ASHBURNHAM, John, a stanch supporter of Charles I., and the only attendant, with the exception of Dr. Hudson, of that unfortunate monarch on his journey, in April, 1646, from Oxford to Newark, where the Scots army was lying. B. 1603; D. 1671.—This individual passed through many vicissitudes, yet was so fortunate as to be able to repurchase the family estates, which his father had squandered through dissipation. His grandson was made a peer in the time of William and Mary, and the earls of Ashburnham are now in the enjoyment of the estates which were recovered by his success.

ASHBURTON, ăsh-bur'-ton, a town and parish of Devonshire, 16 miles from Exeter. Area, 8,320 acres. Spinning and weaving are carried on in the town; and there are copper and tin mines in the neighbourhood. Pop. 3,400.

ASHBURTON, Alexander Baring, Baron, the second son of Sir Francis Baring, Bart., a London merchant of considerable wealth. In 1810, on the death of his father, he became the head of the firm of Baring Brothers and Co., and in 1812 was elected a member of parliament for Taunton. In 1834 he became a member of Sir Robert Peel's cabinet, as president of the Board of Trade and master of the Mint, and was created Baron Ashburton. In 1841 he proceeded to America, and amicably settled the boundary question with the United States, and which settlement is known by the name of the "Ashburton Treaty." He continued to support Sir Robert Peel in the House of Lords until Sir Robert brought forward his measure for repealing the corn laws. To this measure he gave a decided opposition, and after it had passed into law, he intermeddled very little with politics. B. 1774; D. 1848.

ASHBY-DE-LA-ZOUCH, ăsh'-be-del-a-zoosh, a market-town of Leicestershire, 16 miles from Leicester. Manf. Cotton goods, hosiery, hats, bricks, and it has some iron-smelting furnaces. Pop. 6,000.—Here are the ruins of a castle in which Mary queen of Scots was imprisoned. It is a station on the Midland Railway.

ASHCHURCH, ăsh'-church, a parish of Gloucestershire, 3 miles from Tewkesbury. Area, 4,240 acres. Pop. 800.—Reached by the Birmingham and Gloucester Railway.

ASHDON, ash'-don, a parish of Essex, 4 miles from Saffron Walden. Area, 4,840 acres. Pop. 1,300.—This parish is supposed to have been the scene of the defeat of Edmund Ironside by Canute the Great, in 1016.

ASHFORD, ăsh'-ford, a market-town in the county of Kent, 53 miles from London. The church is of Gothic architecture, and there is here a free school. Pop. 5,000.—It is a station on the South-eastern Railway. This name is common to several parishes of England, generally with small populations.

ASHLAND, ăsh'-land, a county of Ohio, U.S. Area, 342 square miles, with a fertile soil. Pop. 125,000.

ASHLEY, ăsh'-le, the name of several parishes in England.

ASHMOLE, Elias, ăsh'-mole, an eminent antiquary, who, on the breaking out of the Rebellion, went to Oxford, and entered Brasennose College. He was for some time in the royal army, but when the king's affairs were ruined, he settled in London, and became a member of the Society of Astrologers. On the restoration of Charles II. he was appointed Windsor herald, and became one of the first members of the Royal Society. In 1669 the university of Oxford conferred on him the degree of M.D. In 1672 he presented his "History of the Order of the Garter" to the king, who rewarded him with £400. In 1683 he presented the university of Oxford with his collection of curiosities, which gift was augmented at his death by the bequest of his MSS. and library. B. at Lichfield, 1617; D. in London, 1692.—He left a number of MSS., some of which were published; viz., "The Antiquities of Berkshire;" "Miscellanies on Several Curious Subjects;" and "Memoirs of his own Life."

ASHOVER, ăsh'-o-vĕr, a town and parish of Derbyshire, 6 miles from Chesterfield. Manf. Worsteds, stockings, and cotton goods. Pop. 3,500.

ASHTABULA, ăsh-ta-bu'-la, a county in the north-east part of Ohio, U.S., on Lake Erie, with a rich soil. Pop. 30,000.—Also a river of Ohio, which runs into Lake Erie, 45 miles W. of Erie.

ASHTAROTH, ăsh'-tă-roth, 'flocks,' 'the sheep,' or 'riches,' the idol goddess of the Zidonians. From her the Saxons derive their Æster, and we have our Easter.

ASHTON-UNDER-LYNE, ăsh'-ton-under-line, a town and parish of Lancashire, on the river Tame, 6 miles from Manchester. Area of parish, 9,300 acres, or 10 square miles. Manf. Principally cotton; but there are woollen, silk, and hat factories besides. Iron and brass-founding, brick-making, machine-making, bleaching, dyeing, and basket-making are also carried on to a considerable extent. In the immediate vicinity there are upwards of twenty collieries. Pop. 60,000.—The church of this town was built in the time of Henry V., and its tower has a peal of ten bells. Near it is "The Old Hall" and the remains of an ancient prison, which is known by the name of "The Dungeons," and which, till comparatively recently, was used as a place of confinement. The London and North-western, Manchester and Lincolnshire, and Lancashire and Yorkshire railways have each a station here. Ashton is a name common to many English parishes.

ASIA, ā'-she-a, the largest of the great divisions of the earth, taking its name from a syllable which signifies the 'sun,' and giving to its inhabitants the designation of 'People of the Sun.' It is bounded on the N. by the Arctic Ocean, on the E. by the Pacific, on the S. by the Indian, and on the W. by Europe and Africa. It is united to Africa by the Isthmus of Suez, which is about 75 miles across, and is separated from N. America by Behring's Straits, about 48 miles wide at their narrowest part. Ext. This has been variously estimated; but the difference between the authorities we have consulted is not great. From Behring's Straits to the Dardanelles, the length may be taken at 7,500 miles; and from Cape Sievero Vostotchnia, in Siberia, to Point Romania, at the southern extremity of the Malay peninsula, the breadth at 5,200. Area, 17,000,000 square miles; the northern part being in the frigid, the middle in the temperate, and the southern in the torrid zones. Coast. Limited in proportion to its great size, being not half so extended as the coast of Europe. On three of its sides its shores are singularly irregular, and in the north are indented with deep bays; but from the sea being almost continually frozen, these are of comparatively little value in a commercial point of view. Capes. The principal are Sievero Vostotchnia, or East Cape; North-east Cape; Lopatka; Cape Romania, the most southern; Negrais, Comorin, Ras-al-had, and Baba, which is the most western. East Cape is the most easterly part of the continent, and North Cape the most northern. Straits. The chief are Behring's; the straits of Corea, Perouse, Saugor, Formosa, Malacca, Palk, Ormus, Bab-el-Mandeb, the Dardanelles, and the Straits of Constantinople. Those of Palk, Perouse, and Behring's, are named after their discoverers; Bab-el-Mandeb means the 'gate of tears,' and is so called from the great number of ships which were wrecked on its coasts. It is only 20 miles wide between Africa and Arabia. Formosa signifies 'beautiful,' and was so named by the Portuguese. The Dardanelles being one key to Constantinople and the Bosphorus, are strongly fortified, whilst their shores are classical with memorable associations. They were crossed by Xerxes when he invaded Greece. Bays, Gulfs, and Seas. The Sea of Kara and the Gulf of Obi are connected with the Arctic Ocean; the Gulf of Anadyr with the Sea of Kamchatka, the seas of Okhotsk and Japan with the Gulf of Tartary, the Yellow and China seas and the Gulf of Tonquin, are all connected with the Pacific; whilst the Indian Ocean has the Gulf of Martaban, the Bay of Bengal, the Arabian Sea with the Gulf of Cambay, the Gulf of Cutch, the Persian Gulf, the Arabian Gulf, or Red Sea, with the gulfs of Suez and Akaba. Besides these there are the Levant, Archipelago, the Sea of Marmora, the Black or Euxine Sea, and the Sea of Azov. The immense indentations which many of these make, cause corresponding projections of land, which, in the form of peninsulas, run far out into the ocean on the south, west, and east coasts. Thus we have the Tchuktches, stretching towards America; that of Kamchatka, the Corea, the Malayan, the Indian, and the Arabian, the aggregate area of which alone, independently of the central continental mass, may be taken at 3,500,000 square miles. Desc. To give a brief and at the same time a comprehensive description of Asia is impossible; but notwithstanding its great elevations, it may generally be defined as a flat country; and although extremely fertile in China, further India, and the greater part of Hindostan, yet is it defaced by immense steppes and morasses, and by sandy deserts, mostly impregnated with salt, stretching almost without interruption from the shores of the Arabian Gulf to those of the Pacific Ocean. The largest of these is the Gobi or Shamo, which is 1,400 miles long, and from 500 to 700 broad. These deserts are, in certain places, separated or divided either by rivers or chains of mountains. The Himalaya chain separates the Shamo, or sea of sand, from the deserts of North-western India, which again are separated from those of Beloochistan by the Indus; and those of Persia are parted from those of Turkey and Arabia by the rivers Tigris and Euphrates. Plains, Steppes, and Table-lands. These are on the most gigantic scale. Nearly the whole of the north-west part of Asia is a vast plain, called the plain of Siberia and Tartary, extending from the mountains of Persia and the branches of the Hindoo-Koush to the shores of the Arctic Sea, and embracing an area of upwards of 7,000,000 square miles. Round the Caspian and the Aral seas there are extensive tracts of this territory many feet below the level of the sea, and exhibiting the largest physical depression on the face of the globe. In the north-east part of China there is an alluvial plain of 210,000 square miles, and Hindostan presents us with plains of 2,000 miles in extent. The plain of Iran, in Persia, covers an area of 1,700,000 square miles, and that of Tibet 7,600,000. The plain of Siberia is mostly a frozen morass in the north, whilst in the south it assumes the character of those steppes which produce a coarse kind of herbage. Very little of it is fit for cultivation. The Chinese plain, on the other hand, is extremely fertile. That portion of the Hindostan plain which is watered by the Ganges, is in the highest degree fertile; whilst that through which the Indus takes its course, is only so in detached parts and along the banks of the rivers. The plain of Iran is little better than a sandy desert, whilst the steppe or table-land of Tibet is struck with a stern sterility, which is heightened by the general coldness by which its atmosphere is characterized. Mountains. The chief mountain systems are the Himalaya, the Altai, the Thian-Shan or Celestial Mountains, and the Kuen-lun. These generally run parallel with the equator, and form the great central table-land of Asia, which is the most extensive on the earth. The entire length of the Himalayas is about 1,800 miles, measuring them from the Burrampooter, in Assam, to the western extremity of the Hindoo-Koosh, in Cabul. The amazing sublimity with which the summits of these rise amid the clouds of Indian skies, never fail to impress the mind with the deepest feelings of reverential awe of their Creator. Their peaks are the loftiest in the globe. Chumulari rises to nearly 24,000 feet; Consainthan to nearly 25,000; Jamnobri and Nanda Devi to nearly 26,000 each; Dhawalagiri to 27,600; and Kunchinginga—the monarch of mountains—to 28,178, according to the measurement of Lieutenant-Colonel Waugh, Surveyor-General of India. Many of the passes of this range are above 15,000 feet high, and some of them reach the extraordinary elevation of 18,000 and even 19,000 feet above the level of the sea. On the north side, the line of perpetual snow is at 16,620 feet, whilst that on the south is 12,981. The opposite of this would naturally be expected; but when the serenity of the sky on the north side is taken into consideration, with the more constant radiation of heat from the neighbouring plains, the apparent phenomenon is readily accounted for. The Altai system stretches, under various names, from the confluence of the Uba and Irtish, first to the Gulf of Okhotsk, and thence to East Cape. Their whole length is about 5,000 miles, and their breadth varies from 400 to 1,000. (See ALTAI.) The Thian-Shan, or Celestial Mountains, rise in Tartary, and taking a course nearly along the 42nd parallel of north latitude, terminate in the great desert of Gobi. Their highest mountain is the Bogdo-Oola, a huge, snow-clad, massive elevation, upheaving itself abruptly from a flat steppe, and deemed sacred by the Kalmucks. The Kuen-lun range runs nearly parallel with the Celestials, and in some places also with the Hindoo-Koosh. It takes its rise a little to the east of the 100th degree of east longitude, and under a variety of names runs west and north-west, and skirting the Caspian and Black seas on the south, finally terminates to the west of the latter. These are the principal mountain-chains of Asia. Those beyond the Altai ridges on the north-east are comparatively small, both in point of magnitude and elevation. In West Asia, the Ural and the Caucasian ranges are the principal. Besides these there are in Natolia the Taurus and the Anti-Taurus, the Persian mountains, the Western Ghauts in the Carnatic, the Vindyhias in Upper India, and the Assam chain, all of which will be more or less noticed when treating of the several countries to which they more especially belong. Volcanoes. Few on the continent in a state of activity, but in the Asiatic islands, these are abundant. Java contains a greater number than any other place on the globe of the same size. In West Asia, Demarcand is the only existing active volcano. On the eastern table-land, in the chain of Thian-Shan, there are two volcanoes, Peshan and Ho-cheou, widely apart from each other. In Kamchatka there are nine in a state of activity. In those regions where they occur, earthquakes are frequent. Rivers. Running into the Arctic Ocean, and draining the extensive country north of the great table-land, the principal are the Obi, with its tributary the Irtish, which has for its affluents the Ishim and Tobal; the Yenisei, with its tributary the Angara; and the Lena, with its tributary the Aldan. Running into the Pacific are the Amoor or Saghalen, the Hoang-ho, the Yang-tse-kiang, and the Si-keang, all of which have an eastern course; the Cambodia, or Maykiang, and the Meinam, which have a south course. Falling into the Indian Ocean are the Irrawady, Burrampooter, Ganges, with its tributaries the Jumna, which is swelled by its affluents the Chumbul and the Sone; the Mahanuddy, Godavery, Tapty, Kistnah, Nerbudda, and the Indus, which has for its tributaries the Cabul, Jhelum, Chenaub, Ravee, Beas, and Sutlej. In the west there is the Amoo or Jihoon, rising in a lake in the table-land of Parnir, and falling into the Sea of Aral. On the table-land there is the Yarkand, which, with many more smaller streams, flow for a certain distance, when they become lost in the deserts or discharge themselves into lakes, and have, therefore, no connection with the ocean. Some of the basins of these rivers are of great extent. That of the Obi has an area of 924,800 geographical square miles, which, with the exception of the basins of the Mississippi and the Amazon, is the largest in the world. The Yenisei has 784,530 geographical square miles; the Lena 594,000; and the Amoor, Yang-tse-kiang, and the Hoang-ho, have each above 500,000 geographical square miles. The Yang-tse-kiang has a length of 2,880 miles, and the Yenisei 2,800; these being the longest rivers in Asia. The other principal rivers have lengths varying from 1,300 to 2,400 miles. Lakes. The largest lake, of its kind, in the world, is that which is denominated the Caspian Sea, which takes its name from the Caspii, an ancient people who dwelt on its shores; and which, according to one authority, covers an area of 120,000 square miles, and according to another, 140,000. The other lakes are Aral, Van, Ooroomia, Asphaltites or the Dead Sea, which are all salt; and Baikal or Holy Sea. This last is of fresh water, has an area of 14,000 square miles, and forms a part of the great line of commercial communication between Russia and China. There are numerous other salt lakes distributed over Siberia, Tartary, Armenia, and Asia Minor; but these are the principal. Forests. These are regulated by the difference in climate and soil. In the north, trees are dwarfs, and vegetation decreases as we proceed eastward. In the south of Siberia we enter the region of the birch, the willow, and the fir; in Manchooria we are in the country of oak; but on the great north plain, and in the regions of the south-west, wood is thinly scattered. In Hindostan and further India, the teak and other oaks appear; the banyan-tree forms a grove in itself; the cocoa, areca, talpa, and other palms, spread their broad and protecting leaves, and the most esteemed woods, as ebony, rose, satin, sandal, and others, attain perfection. On the great table-land of Manchooria, the ginseng, valued so highly for its medicinal virtues by the Chinese, grows; and from Persia to China the rhubarb is found. The camphor-tree diffuses its fragrance in both China and Japan; the plant called asafœtida is found in Afghanistan, and the dried juice of the ash, designated manna, is produced in Persia and Turkey. In fruitage and floral vegetation Asia is prolific. To it Europe is indebted for many of its most esteemed fruits, which, with spontaneous luxuriance, are there growing wild. Amongst these may be noted the orange and the lemon, the peach and the apricot, the walnut and the cherry, the olive and the grape; whilst in Hindostan the pine-apple is so abundant as to be held by the natives as a fruit almost of no value. In flowers and ornamental shrubs, Europe has received from Asia the damask rose, the China aster, the Chinese primrose, chrysanthemums, hydrangea, and many others. Wild Animals. The principal are, the tiger, the panther, the leopard, and the jackal; the elephant, and rhinoceros; apes are abundant, and several kinds of deer, antelopes, and oxen. These all inhabit the southern or warmer portion of the continent. In the central regions there are the djiggetai, a kind of horse, the ass, musk, sheep, and goat. Here also are numerous herds of antelopes, roving at will over the boundless plains, but often falling sacrifices to the ferocity of the wolves and jackals, which pursue them in packs. The north is the habitat of the fur animals. Here the ermine and the sable have their haunts, and the fox pursues his depredations. The sea-otter infests the shores of Kamchatka, and the polar bear wanders over the trackless snows of the arctic regions, in which the hardy reindeer and elk also obtain a scanty subsistence. In Hindostan, the maneless, and in the south-west, the maned lion, are sometimes, but rarely, found. But in these regions, the tiger abounds, and has been found as far north as the 50th degree of latitude. Birds. Numerous and splendid in their plumage, but in general destitute of the charms of song. The more showy consist of parrots, parroquets, and peacocks; gold and silver pheasants, and all the wild stock of our common fowls. In Arabia, the ostrich sweeps the plains with the fleetness of an Arab steed, whilst herons, cranes, storks, pelicans, and wild ducks, are to be found in the vicinity of its lakes. To Southern Asia Europe is indebted for the common cock and hen. Reptiles. The principal haunts of Asiatic reptilia are the north and north-east parts of Hindostan, between the Himalayas and the Bay of Bengal; in China, and in the islands of Ceylon, Sumatra, Celebes, and Java. At their head are the different species of the crocodile, haunting, and, with their loathsome forms, rendering horrid, the rivers of India. In the Ganges especially they are numerous. Of frogs there are ten species peculiar to Asia, and of toads there are nine, most of which are distributed over the islands. Fresh-water tortoises, and chameleons, are frequently found, and the woods, swamps, and jungles abound in serpents and snakes. Of these, the cobra-de-capello is the most deadly, and the python is the largest of the Eastern world. Tree-serpents, like parti-coloured garters, entwine the stems of the tropical forests; and the Indian Ocean, as well as fresh-water streams and lakes, swarm with innumerable snakes, as venomous as they are ferocious. In the Persian Gulf, the Red Sea, and on the shores of Ceylon, the pearl-oyster is found. Insects. Abundant, especially in the south, where the locust and the mosquito are intolerable pests. Fish.

Every description is to be found along the coast, in accordance with the situation and the kind of water necessary to their existence; but their characteristics are too nearly assimilated to those of other continents to require a detailed or particular notice here. Domestic Animals. The same as those of Europe, with the addition of the one-hunched and the two-hunched camel, and the elephant. The greater number of European domestic animals are supposed to have come originally from Asia, as man himself is supposed to have done. In the north the reindeer and the dog are broken in and employed as beasts of draught. In the central regions, the grunting ox, or yak, an animal with a tail like a horse, is similarly used; and in the south it is the Brahmin ox that is used. In the desert districts the camel is found; the dromedary, or one-hunched species, traversing the "sandy seas" of Arabia, Turkey, Persia, Afghanistan, Beloochistan, North-west India, and Turkestan; the Bactrian camel, or two-hunched, the dreary wastes of the central table-land. This animal may be seen as far north as the 50th degree, and the reindeer may be seen as far south in the same hemisphere, although the one is naturally the inhabitant of an intensely hot, and the other of an intensely cold country. The elephant luxuriates in the rich vegetation of the south, whilst the Tibet or shawl-goat adheres to the central regions of the continent. The sheep whose tail often weighs from eight to ten pounds, is found in Afghanistan, Turkestan, and other parts, whilst the hog is abundant amongst the Chinese, although repudiated in the Mahometan countries of the south-west. Climate. Although Asia is mostly within the temperate zone, it is generally colder than might be supposed by the indications of its latitude. In the central, north, and east parts, the extremes of heat and cold are felt. The great table-land is both dry and cold; but to give a general and comprehensive definition, the continent may be said to be cold in the north; wet and cold in the east; dry and hot in the south-west; and wet and hot in the south, where the year is divided only into two seasons,—a wet and a dry. Here the monsoons blow from April to September from the south-west, and from September to April from the north-east. It is from this peculiarity that they have received their name, which, in the Malay language, signifies a season. The suffocating simoom—from the Arabic word samma, 'to poison,'—sweeps the deserts of Arabia, Mesopotamia, and Syria; whilst typhoons carry their terrors across Persia and the south-eastern countries generally. In China every variety of climate is experienced, in accordance with the difference of latitude in which it lies, and with other causes which combine to give it this character. Although its capital is in about the same latitude as Naples, in winter it has the atmosphere of the north of Europe, and in summer that of Egypt. Pro. The common cerealia, with rice, maize, and millet; the vine, olive, date; coffee, tea, sugar, orange, lemon, mulberry, tamarind, indigo, spices, pepper, cinnamon, and cotton. Barley and millet are produced in the north, wheat in the central, and maize and rice in the southern parts. Rice forms the staple article of food in the south-eastern hot and well-watered countries, and dates in the south-western sunny and dry ones. In the northern, central, and desert parts, there is little cultivation of any kind, the inhabitants being not only few in numbers, but mostly nomadic in their habits. From Turkey to China the vine is cultivated in about the same latitudes of these countries, whilst in the south-western countries the olive is carefully produced. Arabia supplies the coffee shrub; and China, Japan, and Assam, the tea-plant. Cinnamon, which is composed of the inner bark of a species of laurel, is produced in Ceylon; and sugar in Bengal, and other countries to the east. Malacca, Java, and Ceylon are also famed for their coffee and cloves; peppers and nutmegs have long been known as the products of the islands of the Indian Archipelago. The poppy is extensively cultivated in Natolia, Syria, and eastward into India. Minerals. All the useful as well as precious metals are found in Asia. Gold, silver, lead, platina, tin, copper, quicksilver, iron, coal, salt, diamonds, and other precious stones. In Siberia, India, China, and Japan, gold is found; silver in Siberia, India, China, Japan, and Turkey; lead, iron, and copper in several countries; platina in Siberia; tin in India and China; quicksilver in China, Japan, and Ceylon; coal in Hindostan and China; and salt in most parts. In Siberia it is said that there are coal districts to the west of the Yenisei, which are supposed to have been ignited by lightning, and which have been burning for upwards of one hundred years. Race. Circassian, Mongolian, and Malay. The Malayan race occupies the extreme south of Malacca; the Mongolian, Tibet, all the central table-land, Mandchooria, China, Japan, the Samoyede country, and are the inhabitants of further India; the Circassian, all the rest of the continent, including the inhabitants of Siberia and all the independent tribes of Tartary, the Georgians, Turks, Jews, Kurds, Maronites, Druses, and other inhabitants of Turkey; the Hindoos, Afghans, Beloochees, Persians, and Arabs. Rel. Brahminism, Buddhism, Mahometanism, and Christianity. As all these religions had their origin in Asia, they prevail more or less in all its parts. Hindostan is the principal seat of Brahminism, and Buddhism engrosses the venerative faculties of the inhabitants of further India, China, Japan, Mongolia, Tibet, and Corea. In independent Tartary, Afghanistan, Beloochistan, Persia, and Arabia, Mahometanism is professed, as it is also by the Tartars and Turks of Siberia and Turkey. In Asiatic Russia, Christianity prevails, and it has many believers in Turkey besides. In the extreme north of Siberia superstition and idolatry of the grossest kind hold dominion over the minds of the inhabitants. Political Divisions. These include six empires,—Arabia, Turkey, Persia, Britain, Russia, and China. That of Britain is chiefly in India, on the peninsula within the Ganges, where the Portuguese and the French still hold some comparatively trifling possessions. Pop. 650,000,000. Lat. islands inclusive, between 10° S. and 78° N. Lon. extending from 26° to 190° E. (or 170° W.)—Asia is considered to have been the cradle of the human race, as it is that division of the globe in which most of the events recorded in the Bible occurred. It has given birth to many of the greatest monarchies in the universe, and to its ancient inhabitants the moderns are indebted for most of the arts and sciences. In a political point of view, it was composed of many different empires, provinces, and states, of which the most conspicuous were the Assyrian and the Persian monarchies. As a continent, it was generally divided into Major and Minor. Asia Major was the most extensive, and comprehended all the eastern parts; and Asia Minor was a large country in the form of a peninsula, whose boundaries may be known by drawing a line from the Bay of Issus, in a northern direction, to the eastern part of the Euxine Sea. The western parts of Asia Minor were the receptacle of all the ancient emigrations from Greece, and it was totally peopled by Grecian colonies. The Romans generally and indiscriminately called Asia Minor by the name of Asia. (See NATOLIA and the various countries which now constitute this great continent.)

ASIA MINOR, the most western portion of the great continent of Asia, bounded N. by the Black Sea and the Sea of Marmora, E. by Armenia and Mesopotamia, W. by the Ægean Sea, and S. by Syria and the Mediterranean. Area, about 500,000 square miles. The whole country is under the Turkish government; and it is divided into several provinces, of which Natolia and Caramania are the most important. (See NATOLIA.)

ASIATIC or EASTERN ARCHIPELAGO, ā'-she-ăt'-ik, the largest collection of islands on the globe, running by the equator from the S.E. coast of Asia to the W. of Australia. They lie between the China Sea on the N., the Pacific on the E. and S., and the Indian Ocean on the W. Lat. between 11° S. and 19° N. Lon. from 95° to 105° E. The peculiarities of the groups comprehended within this vast space will be treated of under their proper heads. (See JAVA, BANDA, SUMATRA, PHILIPPINES, MOLUCCAS, &c.)

ASKEW, Anne, ăs'-ku, an accomplished English lady, daughter of Sir William Askew, of Kelsay, in Lincolnshire. She was married, when young, to one Mr. Kyme, much against her inclination, and on account of harsh treatment received from him, went to the court of Henry VIII. to sue for a separation, where much attention was paid her by those ladies who were attached to the Reformation. In consequence of this she was arrested, and having confessed her religious principles, was committed to Newgate. She was first racked with savage cruelty in the Tower, and then burnt in Smithfield. B. 1520; D. 1546. From her letters and other pieces in Foxe and Strype, it appears that she was an accomplished as well as a pious woman.

ASKOE, as'-ko, a small Danish island in the Great Belt. Lat. 54° 54′ N. Lon. 11° 29′ E.

ASLACTON, ăs-lak-ton, a parish in Norfolk, 3 miles from St. Mary Stratton. Area, 1,310 acres. Pop. 412. —It is a station on the Eastern Union Railway.—There is another small parish of this name in Notts, where Bishop Cranmer was born, in 1489.

ASNIERES, a'-ne-air, a small village a few miles from Paris, where are some large pleasure-gardens, much frequented by the Parisians and visitors to the capital of France. It is a station on the Western Railway of France.

ASOLA, a'-so-la, a fortified town of Northern Italy, situate on the Chiese, 20 miles from Mantua. Manf. Silk twist. Pop. about 5,000.

ASPASIA, ăs-pai'-se-a, a Grecian courtesan, celebrated for her beauty and her talents. She was so eminent for philosophy and rhetoric, that the greatest men of the age, including even Socrates, did not scruple to visit her house. Pericles having divorced his wife, married her. B. at Miletus. Lived in the 5th century B.C.

ASPATRIA, ăs-pā'-tre-a, a parish in Cumberland, 7 miles from Maryport. Area, 8,610 acres. Pop. 2,300. —It is a station on the Maryport and Carlisle Railway.

ASPERN, as-pern', a town of Austria, on the Danube, 6 miles from Vienna; the scene of a great battle in 1809, between Napoleon I. and the Austrians, in which the former was defeated.

ASPHALTITES, LAKE, ăs-făl-tī'-tes. (See DEAD SEA.)

ASPROPOTAMO, ăs-pro-pot'-a-mo, the largest river of the kingdom of Greece, rising in Albania, and, after a course of 100 miles, falling into the Ionian Sea, 15 miles from Missolonghi.

ASSAM, or ASAM, ăss'-am, a British province of further India, in the presidency of Bengal, bounded on the W. by Bengal and Bootan, on the N. by the mountains of Tibet, and on the S.E. and S. by Burmah and Cachar. Area, 21,805 square miles. Desc. The river Burhampooter flows through the whole length of it, and it contains several extensive tracts of well-cultivated land. Though the country is in general soft and swampy, being largely intersected with half-filled channels and stagnant lakes, still, in the dry season, it is capable of high cultivation, and amply repays any labour bestowed upon it. Rivers. They are said to be 61 in number, 37 of them flowing from the N., and 24 from the S. mountains. The Burhampooter is the principal. Climate. Unhealthy. Agriculture. Defective, although in some localities an excellent kind of tea is gathered. Manf. Unimportant. Some different qualities of silk are made, and large quantities of lac are prepared for export; but there is little or no trade, except by way of barter, which consists in exchanging salt for lac, gold-dust, and ivory. From China and Burmah, nankeens, lacquered and china-ware, lead, copper, and silver are imported. Towns. The principal are Ghergong, Joorhath, and Gowhati. Pop. estimated at 710,000. Lat. between 26° and 28° N. Lon. between 90° and 97° E.—The Assamese have generally been described as a degenerate race, inferior even to the Bengalese. Their moral character is extremely depraved. The invention of gunpowder is ascribed to the Assamese. It was known in China and Hindostan in very remote antiquity; and in the code of Gentoo laws, there is a prohibition of the use of fire-arms; but, perhaps, these fire-arms were only some sort of missive torches, and the powder much less effective than that which is made in later times. In 1826 the Burmese ceded Assam to the British. Brahminism has superseded Buddhism in this province.

ASSAROTTI, Ottavio Giovanni Battista, a'-sa-rot-ti, an ecclesiastic, who first instituted schools for the deaf and dumb in Italy. B. at Genoa, 1753; D. 1829.

ASSAYE, or ASSYE, ăs-ay, a small town of Hindostan, in the province of Berar, 30 miles from Jaulna.—Here, in 1803, the duke of Wellington, then General Wellesley, with but 8,000 men, only 1,500 of whom were Europeans, completely defeated the combined forces of Scindia and the rajah of Nagpoor, numbering 50,000 men.

ASSENDELFT, as'-en-delft, a village in Holland, 10 miles from Amsterdam. Pop. about 3,000.

ASSENEDE, as-en-eed, a town and parish in Flanders, 13 miles from Ghent. Manf. Woollen, cotton, and soap. Pop. 4,000.

ASSENS, as'-ens, a maritime town of Denmark, in the island of Fünen, 20 miles from Odense. Has a trade with Fünen and Schleswig. Pop. 3,000.

ASSER, or ASSERIUS MENEVENSIS, ăs'-er, bishop of Sherborne, was a native of Wales, and a monk of St. David's. It is said that Alfred contributed so greatly to the foundation of the university of Oxford by his advice. (See ALFRED.) In gratitude to that prince, by whom he was created a bishop, he wrote his life, which was published by Archbishop Parker in 1574. Lived in the 9th century.

ASSERGHUR, or HASSER, a'-ser-gur, a fort and town of British India, in the presidency of Bombay, 12 miles from Boorhanpoor.—First in 1803, and then in 1819, this fort was taken by the British. Since the latter period it has remained in their possession.

ASSHUR, ă-shur, a 'step' or 'pace,' the second son of Shem, and the founder of the Assyrian empire.

ASSINIBOINE, or RED RIVER, ăs-in'-i-baw'-in, a river of North America, which discharges its waters into the south-west side of Lake Winnipeg.

ASSINIE, as'-i-ne', a country of Africa, at the west extremity of the Gold Coast. Here the French founded a factory in 1843, when they took possession of the country.

ASSISI, as-e'-se, a town of Italy, in the Papal States, with a fine cathedral church. It is about 13 miles from Perugia. Manf. Files and needles. Pop. 4,000.

ASSUAY, a'-su-ai, a department of South America, lying between Guayaquil, Peru, and Brazil. Area, estimated at 250,000 square miles. Desc. Mountainous, and, on account of the varieties of elevation, more or less productive. Some of the mountains attain a height of from 13,000 to 15,500 feet. Pro. Every variety of the temperate and torrid zones. In the temperate, all the usual cerealia; and in the warmer, maize, indigo, sugar-cane, gums, bananas, &c., are raised. The cinchona bark is also produced. Minerals. Silver-mines are to some advantage worked at a place called Los Azoquis. Towns. Loxa, Cuenza, Jaca, and Borjei. Pop. uncertain; perhaps about 120,000. Lat. between 3° and 6° S. Lon. between 70° and 80° W.

ASSUMPTION, ăs-um'-shon, one of the Ladrone islands, in the Pacific Ocean. Lat. 19° 45′ N. Lon. 140° 55′ E. —There is another island of the same name, forming one of the Seychelles, in the Indian Ocean.

ASSUMPTION, a parish of Louisiana, United States, on the Mississippi. Area, 396 square miles. Pop. 11,000.

ASSUMPTION, or ASUNCION, the capital city of the province of Paraguay, in South America, situate on the Paraguay, 18 miles above the junction of the first mouth of the Pilcomayo. It is inhabited by Spaniards, and several thousands of Indians and Mestizoes. Its exports mostly consist of hides, tobacco, and sugar. Lat. 24° 47′ S. Lon. 59° 35′ W.

ASSYNT, ăs-int, a maritime parish in Sutherlandshire, Scotland. Area, estimated at 100,000 acres. Several of the mountains of this parish attain an elevation of 3,000 feet. Pop. about 3,000.—In it the marquis of Montrose was taken prisoner, and confined in the castle of Ardorack, previous to his being taken away to be beheaded.

ASSYRIA, ă-sir'-e-a. This ancient and extensive empire derives its name from Asshur, the second son of Shem, and cannot well be dated before the establishment of monarchy at Nineveh, in the person of Pul, 790 B.C. It was overthrown, and Nineveh taken, by Cyaxares, king of Media, and Nebuchodonoser, king of Babylon, 609 B.C. It afterwards shared the fate of the Babylonian and Persian empires, the greatest part being added to the Parthian empire. In 1514 it fell into the hands of Ismael Sofi, and was finally conquered by the Turks in 1637.

ASTBURY, J., ăst'-bur-e. The early history of this individual is quite unknown; but, by feigning weakness of intellect, he got himself introduced to the potteries of the Messrs. Elers, at Bradwell, near Burslem, and thus obtained many of their secrets in the art of making pottery. He subsequently established himself at Shelton, where he was the first to make use of Bideford pipe-clay for lining culinary vessels. He made many other improvements in his art, and realized a considerable fortune. B. about 1680; D. 1743.

Astbury, a parish in Cheshire, 1 mile from Congleton. Area, 18,970 acres. This parish has many silk-factories, which employ the greater portion of its population, amounting to about 17,000.

Aster, ăs-ter, a dexterous archer of Amphipolis, who offered his services to Philip, king of Macedonia. Upon being slighted, he retired into the city which Philip was besieging, and aimed an arrow, on which was written, "For Philip's right eye." It struck the king's eye, and put it out; and Philip, to return the pleasantry, threw back the same arrow, with these words, "If Philip takes the town, Aster shall be hanged." The conqueror kept his word.

Asterabad, or Astrabad, as-ter-a-bad', a town of Persia, capital of a province of the same name, situate on the shore of the Caspian Sea, at the mouth of the Aster or Ester, which forms a convenient bay for shipping. Its trade is chiefly confined to horses and cattle, which are given in exchange for various articles of necessity brought to them by way of the Caspian Sea. Pop. about 4,000. Lat. 36° 55′ N. Lon. 54° 31′ E.

Asti, as-te', the capital of the ancient district of the same name, on the Tanaro, in upper Italy, 26 miles from Turin. It is well built, and contains many churches and monastical institutions. Manf. Chiefly silk stuffs, and an active trade is carried on in corn and wine. The country around is said to produce the best wines in Piedmont. Pop. 26,000.—In the middle ages this place was celebrated for its commercial industry and enterprise. Here Alfieri was born. (See Alfieri.)

Astle, Thomas, ăs'-tel, an English antiquary, the son of a farmer in Staffordshire, who in 1766 was appointed to manage the printing of the ancient records of parliament. In 1775 he became chief clerk in the Record Office in the Tower, and on the decease of Sir John Shelley, succeeded to the office of keeper of the records. D. 1803.—Many papers by him are in the volumes of the "Archæologia;" besides which he wrote "The Origin and Progress of Writing, as well hieroglyphic as elementary," first printed in 1784, 4to, and again in 1803.

Astley, ăst'-le, the name of several English parishes of small populations.

Astley, Philip, the founder of Astley's amphitheatre, in Lambeth, London, was bred a cabinet-maker, became a soldier in the 15th regiment, known as Elliot's light horse, and after his discharge began his career as an equestrian performer. B. at Newcastle-under-Lyne, 1742; D. in Paris, 1814.—His name is here introduced more on account of the well-known character of the place which he founded and to which he gave his name, than from any idea of his personal merits.

Aston, Sir Arthur, ăs'-ton, a commander in the service of Charles I., who commanded the dragoons at the battle of Edgehill, and thrice defeated the earl of Essex. He was successively governor of Reading and Oxford. Having the misfortune to break his leg, he was obliged to have it amputated. After the execution of the king, he served in Ireland, and was appointed governor of Drogheda, on the taking of which by Cromwell, he had his brains beaten out with his wooden leg. B. in Fulham. Lived in the 17th century.

Astorga, as-tor'-ga, a walled town of Spain, of great antiquity, on the bank of a small river, 26 miles from Leon. It is the see of a bishop, and contains four parish churches, and other religious houses. Manf. Linen and cloth yarn. Pop. about 3,000.

Astracan, or Astrakhan, ăs-tra-kăn', a province of Asiatic Russia, in the government of Caucasus, lying on the N.W. of the Caspian Sea, and having the Maloi Uzan for its N.E. boundary, and the Manitch for its S.W. The Volga divides it into nearly two equal parts. Ext. 370 miles long, and 250 broad at its widest part. Area, estimated at 83,000 square miles. Desc. A vast sterile steppe or desert, divided in two by the Volga. Judging by the saline nature of its soil, it would seem at some former period, to have been submerged by the Caspian. Climate. One of extremes: winter shows 13°, and summer 70° of Fahrenheit. Pop. 290,000.

Lat. between 45° and 49° N. Lon. between 43° and 51° E.

Astracan, an archiepiscopal city, and the capital of the above province, is situate on an island about 52 miles from the mouth of the Volga, which discharges itself into the Caspian Sea. The buildings of this city were formerly chiefly of wood. Of the public ones, the most conspicuous are two commercial halls, for the reception and sale of merchandise, one for the Tartars, the other for the Persians. The modern houses are in general built of brick, or of a kind of freestone. The Kremlin stands on a hill, and contains the cathedral, a spacious brick edifice. There are many Russian churches and other houses for religious purposes, built by the various sects or denominations who form the population. Manf. Cotton, leather, silk, shagreen, gunpowder; and there are extensive salt-works in the neighbourhood. Exp. Among these may be enumerated fish, pig and bar iron, cochineal, and some indigo; woollen and linen cloths, Russia leather, brocades, taffetas, satin, and foreign velvets. Imp. Raw and spun cotton, and stuffs of the same material; raw and manufactured silk, shawls from Tibet and Cashmere, and some furs. There is a considerable trade in jewels; oriental turquoises are sold in great numbers, and at low prices, by the Astracan merchants; and the Indians deal in rubies and emeralds. The chief traffic with Persia is carried on by Armenians. Pop. about 50,000. Lat. 46° 27′ N. Lon. 48° 6′ E.—This place was taken from the Mongol Tartars in 1554.

Astura, as-too'-ra, a maritime village of Italy, at the mouth of the river Astura, 40 miles from Rome. Pop. 300.—We notice this place on account of the historical celebrity which attaches to it. It has a small harbour and a high tower, which is supposed to stand on the site of the villa of Cicero, and near which he was slain by order of Antony, B.C. 43. In 1268, after the battle of Tagliacozzo, Conradin, the last of the Hohenstauffen family, was here betrayed.

Asturia, or Asturias, as-too'-re-a, a principality in the north of Spain, bounded N. by the Bay of Biscay, E. by Las Montanas and the province of Biscay, S.E. by Old Castile, S. by Leon, and W. by Galicia. Area, 3,460 square miles. Desc. Wooded though mountainous. Climate. Damp and foggy. Rivers. The Eo, the Nalan, Navai, and their affluents. Pro. Maize, chestnuts, timber, cider, cattle, horses, and sheep. Minerals. Coal, iron, copper, antimony, and lead. Towns. Oviedo, Aviles, and Gijon. Manf. Unimportant. Pop. 510,000. Lat. between 42° and 43° 47′ N. Lon. between 4° 30′ and 7° 9′ W.—The eldest son of the king of Spain takes the title of prince of Asturias, and bears the arms of the country.

Atacama, a-ta-ka'-ma, a maritime province of Bolivia, embracing a large part of the coast-line on the Pacific. In the south it is nothing more than a sandy desert. Pop. about 30,000. Lat. 23° 30′ S. Lon. 69° 30′ W.

Atahualpa, or Atabalipa, a'-ta-hoo-al'-pa, the last of the incas of Peru. His father dying in 1529, he became king of Quito, and his brother Huascar obtained the throne of Peru; on which a war broke out between them, in which Huascar was defeated. About this time the Spaniards, headed by Pizarro, invaded Peru, where they were hospitably entertained by the king and his people, in return for which they treacherously held Atahualpa in captivity. The inca offered as a ransom, to fill a room full of gold; but after the Spaniards had received the treasure, they inhumanly burnt the unhappy monarch at the stake, in 1533.

Ate, a'-te, daughter of Jupiter, and the goddess of evil. She raised such jealousy and sedition in heaven among the gods, that Jupiter dragged her away by the hair, and banished her for ever from heaven, and sent her to dwell on earth, where she incited mankind to wickedness, and promoted discord among them.

Ath, or Aeth, at, a fortified town of Belgium, in Hainault, on the river Dender, 13 miles from Mons. Manf. Principally linen. There are, besides, several bleachfields and iron-works. Pop. 1,200.—Ath was ceded to France by the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, in 1668, and then pretty regularly fortified by Vauban; it was restored, however, to the Spaniards, by the treaty of Nimeguen, in 1678. The French, under Marshal Catinat, took it in 1697, but in the same year it was restored by the peace of Ryswick. The allies, under Field-marshal d'Averque, took it, October 1, 1706; and Ath remained in the possession of the Dutch till the year 1716, when it was given up to the emperor of Austria, with the rest of the Spanish Netherlands.

ATHABASCOW, ă-tha-băs'-ko, a lake in the N. W. of North America, in the 59th degree of N. lat.

ATHANASIUS, ă-tha-nai'-she-us, a native of Alexandria, who distinguished himself so much at the council of Nice, that, on the death of Alexander, bishop of Alexandria, he was chosen to succeed him. He had been greatly opposed by the Arians before his consecration, and now their efforts against him were redoubled, as he refused to admit their leader into the church. (See ARIUS.) They raised against him various accusations, and at length procured his banishment. On the death of the emperor he returned to Alexandria, where he was received with great joy. When Constantine came to the throne, his enemies again prevailed; on which he fled to Rome, where Pope Julius espoused his cause, and caused him to be reinstated in his bishopric. At the end of the emperor Julian's reign, he was driven into exile again; but, on the accession of Jovian, he was restored, and the Nicene creed with him. D. 371.—The creed of St. Athanasius is supposed to have been compiled by an African bishop in the 5th century.

ATHBOY, ăth-boy, the 'yellow ford,' a town and parish of Ireland, in Meath, 6 miles from Trim. Area, 11,884 acres. Pop. of parish, 5,365; of town, 1,826.

ATHELING, Edgar, ăth'-e-ling, son of Edward, and grandson of Edmund Ironside, king of England, was educated by Edward the Confessor, his great-uncle, who intended him for his successor. On his death, however, he was supplanted by Harold, son of Earl Godwin; and the success of William, duke of Normandy, at Hastings finally debarred him from the throne. He subsequently went with Baldwin II. to the crusade, and on his return was honoured by several of the European sovereigns for his valour. D. at Malmesbury.

ATHELNEY, ăth'-el-ne, formerly a small island, but now a tract of land, of about 100 acres, at the junction of the Tone and Parrot rivers. During the Danish invasion, Alfred the Great took refuge in this place, and founded an abbey about the year 888. (See ALFRED THE GREAT.)

ATHELSTAN, ăth'-el-stan, king of England, was the natural son of Edward the Elder, whom he succeeded in 925. He obtained a great victory over the Danes in Northumberland, after which he reigned in tranquillity. He greatly encouraged commerce by conferring the title of thane on every merchant who had made three voyages. D. 941.

ATHELSTANEFORD, ăth-el-stan'-ford, a village and parish of Scotland, 4 miles from Haddington. Area, 4,000 acres. Pop. 1,000.—Here Home, while minister of this parish, wrote his tragedy of "Douglas," which gave such offence to the Scottish Presbytery, that he was compelled to resign his living. (See HOME.)

ATHENÆUM, ăth-e-ne'-um, a place at Athens, sacred to Minerva, where the poets, philosophers, and rhetoricians generally declaimed and repeated their compositions.

ATHENÆUS, ă-the-ne'-us, a Greek grammarian, who wrote a work entitled the "Table-talk of the Sophists," published by Casaubon in 1657. B. at Naucratis, Egypt. Lived in the 3rd century.

ATHENAIS. (See EUDOCIA.)

ATHENS, ath'-enz, the Athenæ of ancient Greece, and now the capital of the kingdom of Greece, or Hellas, and of the government of Attica. It stands on the rivulets Ilissus and Cephissus, a few miles from the western shore of Attica. Athens, though much of its ancient glory has departed, is still famous for many beautiful remains. A considerable portion of the Acropolis, or ancient citadel, is still in existence. Of the Temple of Victory, there remain several exquisite columns of white marble, with gateways between them. Of the Parthenon, eight columns of the eastern front, and several of the side porticos, are still standing. There are various other splendid remains of ancient sculpture and architecture to be found in the streets, houses, churches, and fountains. The Theseum (the ancient temple of Theseus) is still entire, with the exception of the roof, which is of modern construction. The Areopagus, or Hill of Mars (see AREOPAGITE), which was almost in the centre of ancient Athens, is outside the present town; and here may still be discerned the steps cut in the rock to ascend to that famous tribunal; as also the seats of the judges, the accusers, and the accused. Of the three small harbours of Athens, the most ancient is the Phalerum, or Phalereus; the strongest, Munychia; but the most celebrated is the Piræus. This last, which was anciently the best-frequented port of Greece, is five miles distant from the town, and is formed by a recess in the shore, with two rocky points guarding a narrow entrance. It is now known by the name of Porto Leone. Pop. 25,331. Lat. 37° 38′ 10″ N. Lon. 23° 43′ 50″ E.—Athens was founded by Cecrops, who was either a native of Attica or Egypt, about 1556 B.C. His successors, amongst the most famous of whom were Erechtheus and Theseus, reigned for a period of nearly 500 years, Codrus being the last king of Athens. (See CODRUS.) On his death, in 1070, the government was administered by magistrates or archons; and under them we do not hear much of Athens until the time of Solon, 594 B.C., one of the seven wise men of Greece. (See SOLON.) This great lawgiver effected vast reforms, and Athens rose to such a prominent position, that Sparta, and other states of Greece, became jealous of her eminence, when the appearance of the Persians caused them to turn their attention to the common foe, who, at the great battle of Marathon, 490 B.C., were completely defeated by the Athenians. In 480 B.C., Xerxes, with an immense army, invaded Greece, and though, for a time, his progress was delayed by Leonidas at Thermopylæ, yet he made his way to Athens, which he burnt, and from which the inhabitants were compelled to flee. At Salamis, however, 480 B.C., the Athenians and other Greeks obtained a great naval victory over the Persians, and Xerxes retreated into Asia. His general Mardonius was also defeated at the battle of Platæa. Themistocles now rebuilt and extended the city, and the state rose to a great height of power and influence, when, in the time of Pericles, 431 B.C., the Peloponnesian war commenced, in which Sparta and the combined Greek states were banded against Athens. For twenty-seven years the struggle was continued with various success, until, in 404 B.C., the city was forced to yield, and never recovered its former supremacy, although the Athenians ceased not to cultivate those arts which have rendered them immortal. In 87 B.C. the Romans, under Sylla, took Athens by assault, demolished the fortifications, and inflicted a final blow on its commerce. It was afterwards ravished by the Goths, and in 1204 was given to Venice, and continued in the possession of the Christians till 1456, when it was seized by Mahomet II. Under the dominion of the Turks it fell into comparative insignificance, and in 1827, being occupied by the insurgent Greeks, it was bombarded by the sultan's troops, and much injured. In 1832 Greece was erected into an independent kingdom under Otho, son of Louis of Bavaria, and in 1835 became the seat of the Greek government, hitherto held at Nauplia. In 1853 the development of the resources of the country is such as may be viewed as giving hopeful encouragement to a new era in Grecian affairs. Ports, which centuries of barbarism had choked up, are now cleared out or constructed anew. The Strait of Chalcis has been enlarged and deepened. It is now for Greece an internal waterway, and it saves European ships a tedious route in fair weather, and a dangerous one in bad. Lighthouses are established at Salamis, Zea, Negropont, and Andros. High roads are being generally constructed throughout the kingdom, and the drainage of the marshes, Praotos, Alcas, Nikaria, and Florus, is being pursued with the appearance of soon being accomplished.

ATHENS, a county in Ohio, United States. Area, 468 square miles. Desc. Fertile, though hilly, and containing bituminous coal and salt-works. Pop. 20,000.

ATHENS, a post-town in Greene county, New York, U.S., on the Hudson, opposite Hudson city, 28 miles below Albany. Pop. 3,000. This is also the name of several other townships in the United States.

ATHERSTONE, ăth'-er-stun, a market-town of Warwickshire, 12 miles from Coventry. Manf. Ribbons and hats. Pop. about 4,000.—It is a station on the North-western Railway.

ATHERTON, or CHOWBENT, ăth'-er-tun, a township of Lancashire, 7 miles from Newton. Manf. Cotton-factories, and in its neighbourhood are some large collieries and iron-works. Pop. 5,000.—It is a station on the Bolton and Kenyon Railway.

ATHLONE, ăth-lone', 'ford of the moon,' a market-town of Ireland, in county Westmeath, on the Shannon, by which it is intersected, 70 miles from Dublin. Its opposite sides are connected by a long, narrow, ancient stone bridge. Manf. Soap and leather. It has several distilleries, breweries, flour-mills; and carries on a considerable trade with Dublin by means of the Grand and Royal canals, and with Shannon harbour by Limerick steamers. The town, however, derives its principal support from the garrison, it being the military head-quarters for the West of Ireland. Pop. about 10,000. Lat. 53° 25′ N. Lon. 7° 56′ 20″ W.—Athlone forms the great pass between Leinster and Connaught, and in 1691 was taken by General Ginkell from the army of King James. It gave the title of earl in the Irish peerage to the family of Ginkell.

ATHOL, ATHOLE, or ATHOLL, ath-ole, a district comprising the N. part of Perthshire, Scotland. Area, 450 square miles. Desc. Mountainous and highly picturesque. In it the celebrated mountain Cairn Gower attains a height of 3,690 feet, and a number of red deer still inhabit the forests of Athol. The pass of Killiecrankie, in which Grahame of Claverhouse, Viscount Dundee, fell in 1689, is in this district. Athol gives the title of duke to the ancient house of Murray.

ATHOL, a town of Massachusetts, U.S., 35 miles from Worcester, and 72 from Boston.

ATHOS, ăth'-thos, a mountain of Macedonia, projecting like a promontory into the Ægean Sea. When Xerxes invaded Greece, he made a trench of a mile and a half in length at the foot of this mountain, into which he brought the sea-water, and passed his fleet through it. Vestiges of this canal have been found. Athos is now called Monte Santo. Lat. 40° 16′ N. Lon. 24° 10′ E. Height, 6,778 feet.

ATHY, ăth'-thy, the 'western ford,' a town of county Kildare, Ireland. It stands on the Barrow, on an arm of the Grand Canal, 33 miles from Dublin. Pop. 9,000.—It is a station on the South-western Railway.

ATLANTIC OCEAN, ăt-lăn'-tik, taking its name from Mount Atlas, in Africa, lies between the continents of Africa and Europe, and the continent of America. Its least breadth, from Guinea, in Africa, to Brazil, in S. America, is 2,300 miles; its greatest, about 5,000. Area, 25,000,000 square miles. Desc. On one side of the equator it is called the North Atlantic Ocean, and on the other, the South Atlantic Ocean. Its coast is of unequal elevation, exhibiting some places rising in immense banks to within a few fathoms of the surface, and others sinking to immeasurable depths. In these depths communication was, in 1858, effected between the old and the new worlds, and was carried on from Valentia, in Ireland, to Newfoundland, by means of the electric telegraph wire; but the intercourse, through an accident, was interrupted shortly afterwards.

ATLAS, ăt'-las, an extensive and lofty chain of mountains, stretching through the greater part of Barbary, and dividing most of its cultivated territory from the vast desert of sand which fills the greater part of central and northern Africa. The mountains which form the eastern boundary of the empire of Morocco are by far the loftiest part of this chain. Their height, according to repeated observations, rises to upwards of 13,000 feet. (See AFRICA.)

ATLAS, one of the Titans, son of Japetus and Clymene.

ATOLL, or ATOLLAN, a'-tol, a name applied to several groups of coral islands, composing the Maldives, in the Indian Ocean. Lat. between 0° 45′ and 7° 6′ N. Lon. between 72° and 73° E.

ATOOI, or ATOWAY, a-too'-e, one of the largest Sandwich Islands, in the South Pacific Ocean. Area, 500 square miles. Lat. 21° 57′ N. Lon. 159° 39′ W. Pop. 55,000.

ATRANI, a-tra'-ne, a maritime town of Naples, 1 mile from Amalfi, on the Gulf of Salerno. Manf. Principally woollens and maccaroni. Pop. 3,000.

ATRATO, a-tra'-to, a large river of S. America, which, after a course of about 200 miles, enters the Gulf of Darien, to the W. of the Bay of Choco. It is navigable to within 140 miles of its source. It disembogues itself at lat. 8° 10′ N.; lon. 77° 0′ W.

ATREUS, a'-tre-us, a son of Pelops, by Hippodamia, daughter of Œnomaus, king of Pisa, was king of Mycenæ, father of Agamemnon and Menelaus.

ATRI. (See ATRIA.)

ATRIDÆ, ă-tri'-dæ, a patronymic given by Homer to Agamemnon and Menelaus, as being the sons or descendants of Atreus.

ATROPOS, ăt'-ro-pos, one of the Parcæ, daughters of Nox and Erebus. According to the derivation of her name, atrepos, 'unchangeable,' she is inexorable, and her duty among the three sisters is to cut the thread of life, without any regard to sex, age, or quality. (See PARCÆ.)

ATTALA, ăt'-a-la, a county of the United States, in the middle of the state of Mississippi. Area, 720 square miles. Pop. 12,000, of whom one-fourth are slaves.

ATTALUS, ăt'-ă-lus, a name common to several kings of Pergamus, of whom there is little to record.

ATTENBOROUGH, ăt'-en-bur-o, a parish in Nottinghamshire, 4 miles from Nottingham. Area, 1,930 acres. Pop. 1,030.

ATTERBURY, Francis, ăt'-er-bur'-e, an English prelate, who, after studying at Westminster school, was in 1681 elected to Christchurch, Oxford. In 1687 he took his degree of M.A., and, in the same year, vindicated the character of Luther against Obadiah Walker. He had for a pupil the Hon. Charles Boyle, afterwards earl of Orrery, whom he assisted in his controversy with Bentley. In 1691 he came to London, where his eloquence brought him into notice. He became chaplain to William and Mary, lecturer of St. Bride's, and preacher at the Bridewell chapel. In 1700 he engaged in a dispute with Dr. Wake on the rights of convocations, and was presented with his doctor's degree by the university of Oxford; the same year he was installed archdeacon of Totness. In 1704 he was promoted to the deanery of Carlisle, and in 1707, Bishop Trelawney appointed him canon residentiary of Exeter. In 1709 he had another dispute with Hoadly on passive obedience. In 1710 he assisted Dr. Sacheverel in drawing up his defence, for which the doctor left him a legacy. The same year he was chosen prolocutor of the lower house of convocation. In 1712 he was made dean of Christchurch, and in the year following promoted to the bishopric of Rochester and the deanery of Westminster. The death of Queen Anne put a stop to further advancement. On the breaking out of the rebellion in Scotland, he and Bishop Smalridge refused to sign the declaration of the bishops; besides which, Atterbury drew up some violent protests in the House of Lords. In 1722 he was apprehended on suspicion of being engaged in a plot to bring in the Pretender, for which he was committed to the Tower. Before his trial, he raised a difficulty as to whether he should appear in person or by counsel. This point produced a warm debate in the upper house. It was, however, ultimately decided that a bishop is not a peer of the realm, but only a lord of parliament, and that, therefore, the honour of the peerage could not be touched by his being tried before the Commons. He was then banished for life, and left the kingdom in June, 1723. B. at Milton, in Buckinghamshire, 1662; D. at Paris, 1732. His remains were brought to England, and interred in Westminster Abbey. Bishop Atterbury was a man of great learning and brilliant talents, and as a speaker, a preacher, and a writer, has had few equals.

ATTERCLIFFE, ăt'-er-klif, a township in Yorkshire, 1½ mile from Sheffield. Area, 1,270 acres. Pop. 5,000.

ATTICA, ăt'-i-ka, a country of Achaia, or Hellas, at the south of Bœotia, west of the Ægean Sea, north of the Saronicus Sinus, and east of Megara. It received its name from Atthis, the daughter of Cranaus, but was originally called Acte, which signifies 'shore,' and Cecropia, from Cecrops, the first of its kings. The most famous of its cities is Athens, with its port the Piræus, and the towns Megara and Marathon. Its chief mountains are Elatea and Oxea, respectively attaining the heights of 4,629 and 4,636 feet above the level of the sea. It is watered by the Ilissus and Cephissus. Pro. Principally oil, honey, and marble. Lat. between 37° 39′ and 38° 20′ N. Lon. between 23° 5′ and 24° 5′ E.

ATTICUS, ăt-i-cus, Titus Pomponius, a Roman knight, who was descended from an ancient family, and whose manners were so affable that he preserved the good-will of opposite parties in times of the greatest dissensions. Whilst assisting Marius the younger in his schemes of ambition, he preserved the friendship of his adversary Sylla. In the contest between Cæsar and Pompey, he maintained the friendship of both these generals, as well as that of Brutus and of Antony. Notwithstanding, likewise, the contentions between Antony and Augustus, he enjoyed the esteem of both. He was greatly beloved by Cicero, and effected a reconciliation between him and Hortensius. Atticus never attempted to aggrandise himself, and to his moderation may be attributed the tranquillity and influence he enjoyed. His daughter was married to Agrippa. B. 109 B.C.; starved himself to death at the age of 77, 32 B.C.

ATTILA, ăt'-i-la, king of the Huns, who ascended the throne with his brother Bleda in 433, and afterwards caused his associate to be assassinated. He obliged Theodosius II. to sue for peace, and laid him under tribute. In the reign of Valentinian, he invaded the Roman empire with an army of 500,000 men, laying waste many of its provinces. He entered Gaul at the head of a numerous army, and committed great ravages. The imperialists, however, attacked him at Châlons, and after a bloody contest forced him to retreat. Having devastated the greater part of Italy, he retired, on condition that Valentinian should pay him a large sum of money. Soon after his return home he married a beautiful maiden, and died the same night by the bursting of a blood-vessel (453), and with him expired the empire of the Huns.—Attila rejoiced in the name of the "scourge of God," and, expressing a wish to extend his conquests over the whole world, often feasted his barbarity by dragging captive kings in his train. His body, deposited in a golden coffin, cased by another of silver and a third of iron, was buried in the midst of a large plain; and, like that of Alaric, his grave was filled with the most magnificent spoils obtained by conquest and war. After the ceremony, the barbarous Huns, desirous of concealing the tomb of their monarch, slaughtered all those captives who had dug the grave.

ATTIRET, Jean Denys, ăt'-e-rai, a French painter, attached to the Jesuit mission at Pekin, who, after completing his studies at Rome, went to China, and obtained the favour of the emperor Kien-Long, to whom he had presented a picture of the Adoration of the Kings. The "celestial" monarch, however, disliking oil-colours, chiefly employed him in water-colour painting. He made drawings of many Chinese processions, festivals, and other public ceremonials, which heightened his reputation with his sovereign, who created him a mandarin, but he refused that high dignity. Amongst others of his works was a portrait of the emperor, surrounding whom were introduced many of his distinguished officers, some of whom had to travel 2,400 miles merely to get their likenesses taken. B. at Dole, in Franche-Comté, 1702; D. at Pekin, 1768.

ATTOCK, or ATTOCK BENARAS, at-ok, a town and fort of the Punjaub, on the Indus, where it becomes navigable, and is crossed by a bridge of boats 40 miles from Peshawur. Pop. 2,000. Lat. 33° 0′ N. Lon. 71° 15′ E.—The fortress was built in 1581 by the emperor Akbar, and the town is supposed to be the ancient Taxila. Notwithstanding that the neighbourhood of this place was greatly agitated by the crisis of 1857, it soon became perfectly quiet, and the business of ploughing, sowing, and reaping continued with greater regularity and safety than it did previous to the mutiny.

ATTON, at-on, the largest of the Aleutian islands, in the Pacific Ocean. Ext. 70 miles long by about 30 broad. Desc. Volcanic and sterile. Lat. 52° 58′ N. Lon. 172° 17′ W.

ATTOOR, at-oor, a town of Hindostan, in Barramaul, presidency of Madras, 70 miles from Pondicherry. Another in Dindigul, 6 miles from Dindigul.

ATTWOOD, Thomas, ăt'-wood, an eminent musical composer, who, for the coronation of George IV., produced "The King shall rejoice," and for that of William IV., "O Lord, grant the King a long life," both of which are deservedly esteemed. He also composed a number of glees and songs of great merit. B. 1765; D. in London, 1838.—At the time of his death Attwood was composer to the Chapels Royal, and organist of St. Paul's, and was buried in the vaults of the cathedral, under the organ which he was in the habit of playing.

ATWOOD'S KEY, four or five small islands among the Bahamas. The highest hill of the group is in lat. 23° 5′ N., and lon. 63° 43′ W.

ATZGERSDORF, ats'-gers-dorf, a town of Austria, 5 miles from Vienna. Manf. Principally chemicals. Pop. 2,000. It is a station on the railway from Baden to Vienna.

AU, ou, a market-town of Bavaria, in the circle of the Iser. Pop. 1,000.—This is the name of several other small villages in Germany.

AUBAGNE, o-ban', a town of France, in Provence, department of the Mouths of the Rhone, 10 miles from Marseilles. Manf. Paper, earthenware, tiles; and there are some tanneries. Pop. 6,500.

AUBE, obe, a river of France, rising in the department of the Upper Marne, and, after a course of 90 miles, falling into the Seine at Marsilly.

AUBE, a department of France, bounded N. by the department of the Marne, E. by that of the Upper Marne, S.E. by that of the Côte d'Or, S.W. by that of the Yonne, and N.W. by that of the Seine and Marne. It comprehends part of the south of Champagne and a small part of Burgundy. Ext. 70 miles long from E. to W., and 54 from N. to S. Area, 2,317 square miles. Desc. In the north and north-west the surface is bare, but affords excellent sheep-pasture, and the flocks are numerous. In other portions of the department wood abounds, and the soil is in general fertile. As timber is dear, however, the houses of the peasantry are very inferior to those in other parts of France, being mostly built of turf, or sods dried in the sun, and their roofs covered with straw. The west of the department is soft and swampy. Forests. Clairvaux, Montmorency, Orient, and Soulaines. Rivers. The Seine, Aube, Ource, Troyes, the Yonne, and the Varines. Pro. All the usual cerealia, fruits, pulse, hemp, and considerable quantities of honey are gathered. There are some large vineyards laid out, and excellent wine is produced. Towns. The chief are Troyes, Arcis-sur-Aube, Nogent-sur-Seine, Bar-sur-Aube, and Bar-sur-Seine. These are the capitals of the five arrondissements of which the department is composed. Manf. Cottons, hosiery, broadcloths, yarns, blankets, leather, straw hats, gloves, pottery, porcelain, glass, paper; and there are numerous distilleries, large beetroot-sugar factories, vinegar-yards, and dyeing and bleaching establishments. Pop. about 300,000. Lat. between 47° 55′ and 48° 42′ N. Lon. between 3° 2′ and 4° 48′ E.

AUBENAS, obe'-na, a town of France, department of the Ardèche, 14 miles from Privas. Manf. Silk, woollen cloths, and paper. Pop. 7,500.

AUBER, Daniel Francis Esprit, o'-bair, a modern French musical composer, the son of a printseller, in which trade he was initiated, but did not long pursue. His abilities were originally displayed in the composition of small pieces; but he soon became known by more important productions, although his first operas, "Le Séjour Militaire" and "Le Testament et les Billets-doux," were not at all successful. "La Bergère Châtelaine," however, produced in Paris 1820, was a complete success; and after that he rose gradually in public favour, discovering a marvellous facility of composition, and writing about forty operas in the same number of years. B. at Caen, 1784.—Auber's style is light and graceful, and amongst his best-known works are—"Fra Diavolo," "Le Cheval de Bronze," "Le Domino Noir," "Les Diamans de la Couronne," "L'Enfant Prodigue," and "Muette de Portici," better known as "Masaniello."

AUBIGNÉ, Theodore Agrippa d', do-been'-yai, a celebrated French soldier and historian, greatly esteemed by Henry IV., who was desirous of advancing his fortunes. Having, however, lost the royal favour by his frankness and bluntness, he retired to Geneva, where he devoted himself to literary pursuits. B. 1550; D. 1630.—His chief work is a Universal History, in 3 vols. folio, which was condemned by the parliament of Paris. His son, Constant d'Aubigné, was father of the celebrated Madame de Maintenon.

AUBIGNÉ', D. MERLE. (See D'AUBIGNÉ.)

AUBIGNY, or AVIGNY, o-ben'-ye, a town of France, department of the Cher, 28 miles from Bourges. Manf. Chiefly woollens and hardware. Pop. 2,500. There are several small towns of this name in France.

AUBIN, ST., aw'-bin, a small town in the island of Jersey, on the W. side of a beautiful bay of the same name, 4 miles from St. Heliers. Pop. 2,500.—There is an excellent pier here, running out from a rock, and above which is a fortress called St. Aubin's Castle.

AUBREY, John, aw'-bre, an English antiquary, who, in 1646, was entered of the Middle Temple, but did not continue the study of the law; and his means, which had been ample, began gradually to decline. He was one of the first members of the Royal Society; but, being reduced to poverty, was supported at the close of his life by Lady Long, of Draycot, in Wiltshire. B. at Easton-piers, Wiltshire, 1626; D. at Draycot, 1700.—His works are:—1. "Miscellanies, on Apparitions, Magic, Charms, &c.," 1696 and 1721, 8vo. 2. "A Perambulation of the County of Surrey," 1719, 5 vols. 8vo. Besides which he left several curious MSS. to the museum at Oxford, some of which were subsequently printed.

AUBRIOT, Hugh, o'-bre-o, mayor of Paris, who built the Bastille, in 1369, it being intended as a fortification against the English. He being accused of heresy, was sentenced to perpetual imprisonment within the very building he had raised. In 1381 he was released by the Maillotins, a mob of insurgents who had risen against taxation, and named him as their chief; but, quitting them, he retired into Burgundy, where he died in 1382. Besides building the Bastille, he designed and improved many public edifices, bridges, and canals in Paris.

AUBRY, Céleste, o'-bre, a French opera-dancer, who, in the revolutionary times of 1793, was, from the rare beauty of her form, chosen to personify the Goddess of Reason in those ceremonies by which it was sought to supersede Christian worship.

AUBRY DE MONTDIDIER, a French soldier, supposed to have been assassinated by his comrade, Richard de Macaire, in 1371. He is the hero of many dramatic compositions, founded on the details of the discovery of his murderer. Aubry's faithful dog persisted in pursuing and harassing Macaire; and this coming to the ears of King Charles V., he ordered a combat to be tried between them. In this singular battle the dog was the victor; and he has been celebrated ever since in the play of the "Dog of Montargis," and the "Dog of Aubry, or the Forest of Bondy."

AUBRI DE LA BOUCHARDERIE, boo-shar'-de-re, Claude Charles, Count, an able French artillery officer, who, entering the army at an early age, was present at all the great battles on the Rhine, from 1792 to 1796. He afterwards joined Napoleon's army of Italy, and had the charge of the artillery during the perilous crossing of the Alps. Subsequently he served in St. Domingo; and, returning to France, performed great engineering feats with the army, and was present at the battle of Essling, where he was severely wounded. He accompanied Napoleon in the expedition to Russia, having the command of the artillery of the second division of the army, and greatly distinguished himself at Smolensko, Polotsk, and Beresina. At Lutzen and Bautzen, also, in 1813, he displayed great skill and bravery; and finally at Leipsic received his death-wound. B. 1773; D. 1813.

AUBURN, aw'-bern, capital of Cayuga county, New York, U.S., and 174 miles from Albany. It has numerous mills and manufactories. Pop. about 10,000. —Here is a very large prison, occupying a plot of ground 500 by 1,000 ft. It is held to be a model for all such institutions, and a few years since the earnings of the prisoners exceeded the expenditure by £1,700. There are several other places of this name in the United States.

AUBURN, formerly Lisoy, a hamlet in Westmeath, 6 miles from Athlone, Ireland, remarkable as being the supposed scene of Dr. Goldsmith's poem entitled "The Deserted Village."

AUBUSSON, o-boos'-sawng, a town of France, on the Creuse, 20 miles from Guéret, in the department of the Creuse. Manf. Woollens, carpets, yarns, velvets, and cotton thread. Pop. 6,000.

AUBUSSON, Peter d', grand master of the Knights of St. John, who, in 1480, vigorously repulsed the attack made upon the island of Rhodes by the Turks, and which was called the first siege of Rhodes, and lasted eighty-nine days. This was in the time of Mahomet II., who on this occasion is said to have had 9,000 slain and 15,000 wounded. Prince Zizim, brother of Bajazet, and son of Mahomet II., having escaped to Rhodes to avoid the vengeance of the sultan, d'Aubusson was, with much difficulty, prevailed on to deliver him to the pope; and for this and his other great services, both in the defence of Rhodes and in aid of the Christian religion against the Turks, he received a cardinal's hat. B. at La Marche, 1423; D. 1503.

AUCH, or AUSCH, oshe, a town of France, department of the Gers, 42 miles from Toulouse. Manf. Woollens, linens, cottons, and leather. There is a trade done in wine and Armagnac brandy. Pop. about 13,000.—Auch is built in the form of an amphitheatre, and in the time of Cæsar was the capital of the Ausci. It has a very fine cathedral, founded in 1489, though not completed till the reign of Louis XIV. The town itself, however, has a mean appearance, the streets being narrow, crooked, and ill-paved.

AUCHINLECK, awk'-in-lek, a parish in Scotland, 11 miles from Ayr. Area, 18,000 acres. Pop. 4,000.—It is a station on the Glasgow and Ayr Railway.—Boswell, the biographer of Dr. Johnson, lived in this parish, and here entertained the distinguished lexicographer on his return from his "Journey to the Hebrides."

AUCHMUTY, General Sir Samuel, awk-mu'-te, an American, who, in 1776, entered the British army as a volunteer under Sir William Howe, and was present at several actions during the first American war. In 1801, 1802, and 1803, he served in Egypt, and on his return to England, had the grand cross of the Bath conferred upon him. He subsequently commanded in South America, and on the 3rd October, 1807, attacked and took Monte Video, the Gibraltar of America, for which he received the thanks of both houses of parliament. In 1810 he sailed for India as commander-in-chief in the presidency of Fort St. George, and in 1811 commanded at the reduction of the island of Java. For this service he also received the thanks of both houses of parliament. On his return he was made a lieutenant-general, and subsequently commander of the forces in Ireland. B. in New York, 1756; D. in Dublin, 1822.

AUCHTERARDER, awk'-te-rar'-der, a town and parish of Scotland, 12 miles from Perth. Pop. 4,300, principally engaged in weaving.—In 1716 the town was burned by order of Prince Charles Edward Stuart. In more recent times, this parish originated the litigation between the earl of Kinnoul and the Scotch Presbytery, regarding the Veto Act; the result of which being in favour of his lordship, led to the formation of the Free Church of Scotland.

AUCHTERMUCHTY, awk'-ter-muk'-te, a town and parish of Scotland, in the county of Fife, 8 miles from Cupar. Manf. Woollen shawls, and linen and cotton goods. Pop. about 4,000.—It is a station on the Northern Railway.

AUCHTERTOUL, awk'-ter-toul, a parish and village of Scotland, county of Fife, 4 miles from Kirkcaldy. Pop. 517.—It is a station on the Northern Railway.

AUCKLAND, or OAKLAND, BISHOPS, awk'-land, a market-town of Durham, 9 miles from Durham. This town is in the parish of St. Andrew Auckland, which has an area of about 45,000 acres, and a population of 23,000. Pop. of town about 5,000.—The name is derived from its being in the neighbourhood of the bishop's palace, which was originally erected in the 13th century, but since entirely rebuilt.

AUCKLAND ISLANDS, a group lying to the S. of New Zealand, in the South Pacific Ocean. Lat. 50° 48′ S. Lon. 166° 42′ E.—These islands have been granted by the British government to the Messrs. Enderby as a central whaling station.

AUCKLAND, the capital of New Zealand, in the island of New Ulster, at the head of Waitimata Bay. The general appearance of the town is not attractive. Pop. uncertain; perhaps 8,000. Lat. 36° 51′ 30″ S. Lon. 175° 45′ E.

AUDE, ode, a river of France, which rises in the Eastern Pyrenees, and after a course of 90 miles, falls into the Mediterranean, 6 miles from Narbonne. It is connected with Narbonne and Cette by the canal of Narbonne.

AUDE, a maritime department of France, including the S.W. part of Languedoc. It has the department of the Herault to the N.E., that of the Tarn to the N., the Mediterranean to the E., the department of the Eastern Pyrenees to the S., and that of the Ariège to the W. Ext. 79 miles from E. to W., and 52 from N. to S. Area, 2,436 square miles. Desc. Mountainous, intersected with numerous valleys running north and south, and highly productive. Rivers. The principal are the Aude, of which there are thirty feeders; the Robive, and the Bère, which falls into the shore-lake of Sigean. Pro. Wheat, maize, millet, and barley. Both red and white wines are produced in considerable quantities, and chestnuts, walnuts, and olives are extensively cultivated. Great attention is paid to the rearing of bees, and large quantities of honey are collected. Minerals. Antimony, manganese, copper, silver, and lead. Coal, gypsum, and marble of great beauty, in association with slate, is found. Manf. The principal are fine broad-cloth, leather, hosiery, paper, hats, and pottery. There are numerous flour-mills, saw-mills, distilleries, and iron furnaces and foundries. Towns. The chief are Carcassonne, Limoux, Narbonne, and Castelnaudary, which are the capitals of the several arrondissements of which the department is composed. Pop. about 300,000. Lat. between 42° 38′ and 43° 29′ N. Lon. between 1° 41′ and 3° 13′ E.

AUDEBERT, Jean Baptiste, o'-de-bair, a talented French naturalist, draughtsman, and engraver, who excelled in elegant representations of animals. His productions in this respect are esteemed the most valuable of their kind. B. at Rochefort, 1759; D. 1800. —His first performance was "L'Hist. Nat. des Singes, des Makis et des Galéopithèques," 1 vol. folio, 1800; a work which, from the general excellence with which it was produced, created a great sensation among naturalists. He was engaged upon other works of equal magnificence when he died.

AUDENSHAW, aw'-den-shaw, a township in Lancashire, 5 miles from Manchester. Manf. Cottons, silks, and hats. Pop. 5,500. It is a station on the Sheffield Railway.

AUDLEY, James, Lord, awd'-le, of Heleigh, an English knight, who distinguished himself under Edward III. in France, and was one of the first knights of the Garter. He was present at the battle of Poictiers, where he was so badly wounded, that his esquires were obliged to bear him from the field. For his services a pension was assigned him, and he was appointed constable of Gloucester castle, governor of Aquitaine, and seneschal of Poitou. B. in Staffordshire, 1314; D. at Fontenay-le-Comte, Poitou, 1386.

AUDLEY, or AWDELY, Thomas, chancellor of England, was born of a noble family in Essex, and in 1529 was chosen speaker of the parliament, in which capacity he was very subservient to Henry VIII., who, on the resignation of Sir Thomas More, gave him the seals, and the priory of Christchurch, with all its church plate and lands. He sat in judgment on his predecessor, Sir Thomas More, and on Bishop Fisher. B. at Earl's Colne, Essex; D. in London, 1544.—Audley appears to have been a mere tool of King Henry, and to have been rapacious in the seizure of church property. He was a great benefactor to Magdalen College, Cambridge.

AUDONIN, Jean Victor, o'-do-nĭ, a French entomologist and comparative anatomist, who added many important facts to the science of which he was an ardent investigator. B. at Paris, 1797; D. 1841.

AUDRAN, o'dra, the name of a family of French artists. Charles, the elder, produced a great many excellent works, known by a letter K. B. at Paris, 1594; D. 1673.—Claude, a nephew of the preceding, studied under his uncle. He was employed by Le Brun in painting part of the pictures of Alexander's battles, at Versailles, and became professor of painting in the Royal Academy of Paris. B. at Lyons, 1639; D. at Paris, 1684.—Gérard, the brother of the last-mentioned, and the most celebrated of the family, studied under Le Brun at Paris, and engraved that artist's pictures of Alexander's battles in a masterly manner. B. at Lyons, 1640; D. at Paris, 1703.—Claude, nephew of Gérard, became famous for painting ornaments. He was appointed king's painter. B. at Lyons, 1685; D. 1734.

AUDUBON, John James, aw'-doo-bon, a distinguished American naturalist, whose father was the first to inspire him with that love of natural objects with which his pursuits were to be afterwards so prominently associated. The study of birds especially became a passion with him; and, in order that he might become a good draughtsman, his father, at the age of 14, sent him to Paris, and placed him in the studio of the celebrated David. By his seventeenth year he had applied himself so diligently, that he had become a skilful artist when he returned to his native country; and his father gave him a farm on the banks of the Schuylkil. Here ornithological studies employed a great deal more of his time than farming employments. He married, and continued to explore the American forests in search of new specimens of the feathered tribes to enlarge his collections: these excursions were prolonged to nearly fifteen consecutive years. Having removed to Louisville, he met Wilson, the celebrated Scotch ornithologist, whose conversation still added to his ardour in his favourite pursuits. In 1810, with his wife and child, he set out on an expedition down the Ohio; next went through Florida; and so continued, as long as he lived, to extend his knowledge of American birds. He visited England twice, and was everywhere received with the attention and distinction due to so truthful a naturalist. He became a fellow of the Zoological and Linnæan societies in London; of the Natural History Society of Paris, and of numerous other societies of smaller note. His book on American ornithology is the largest and grandest that has ever been published. B. in Louisiana, 1780; D. at Minniesland, near New York, 1851.

AUENBRUGGER, or AVENBRUGGER, Leopold, ow'-en-broog'-er, an eminent German physician, the inventor of percussion as a means of discovering diseases of the chest. B. at Gratz, in Styria, 1722; D. at Vienna, 1793.—Percussion was little practised in England till 1824, when the work of Auenbrugger, with Corvisart's commentaries, was translated by Dr. John Forbes; after which it came more into practice.

AUERBACH, ow'-er-bak', the name of several towns and villages of Germany with small populations.

AUERSTADT, ow'-er-stat, a village of Prussian Saxony, 10 miles from Naumburg. On the 14th Oct., 1806, the Prussians were here defeated by the right division of the French army, under Davoust, on the same day that the battle of Jena was won by Napoleon with his left division. For his service on this occasion, Davoust received from Napoleon the title of Duke of Auerstadt.

AUGE, VALLE'E D', ozhe, a county of France, in the department Calvados. The county is distinguished for producing the finest horses and cattle of Normandy.

AUGEAS, or AUGIAS, aw'-ge-as, son of Eleus, was one of the Argonauts, and afterwards ascended the throne of Elis. He had an immense number of cattle, and the stables in which they were kept had never been cleansed, so that the task seemed an impossibility. Hercules undertook it, on promise of receiving the tenth part of the herds of Augeas. The hero changed the course of the river Alpheus, which immediately carried away the filth from the stables. Augeas refused the promised recompense, on pretence that Hercules had made use of artifice, and had not experienced any labour or trouble. The refusal was considered as a declaration of war. Hercules conquered Elis, put to death Augeas, and gave the crown to Phyleus. The proverb of the Augean stable is now applied to any arduous and difficult undertaking.

AUGER, Athanase, ozh'-ai, a French ecclesiastic, who, after having entered the Church, devoted nearly the whole of his life to the study of the Greek and Roman authors. B. at Paris, 1734; D. 1793.

AUGER, Edmund, a French Jesuit, who is said to have converted 40,000 Protestants to the Roman communion by the force of his arguments. B. 1530; D. 1591.

AUGEREAU, Pierre François Charles, ozh'-e-ro, duke of Castiglione, and marshal of France, entered the French carabiniers at 17, but subsequently became a soldier in the Neapolitan service. Having obtained his discharge in 1792, he volunteered into the revolutionary army of his country, and so rapidly distinguished himself, that when Napoleon invaded Italy, he considered Augereau one of his most daring and successful officers. At the bridge of Lodi he headed his brigade, and carried it in the face of the batteries of the enemy; he captured Bologna, and gave Lugo up to pillage and massacre, on account of the stout resistance which its inhabitants made to his arms. At Castiglione, Augereau covered himself with glory, and had the title of duke conferred on him. At Arcola he particularly distinguished himself, and had his bravery rewarded and acknowledged by the Directory. The coup d'état of the 18th Fructidor, planned by Barras, was intrusted to his execution, and carried out with perfect success. For this service he had the command of the army on the German frontier given him; but, on account of the violence of his revolutionary principles, he was deprived of it and removed to Perpignan. When Napoleon returned from Egypt he was in Paris, but was slighted by that great general. In the campaign of Marengo he had the command of a division, and in 1805 was created a marshal. In 1806 he fought at Jena, and at Eylau commanded the left of the French. In this great battle he was suffering from a wound and from fever; but he had himself tied upon his horse, and remained to the last on the field. In 1809 and 1810 he commanded in Spain. In 1812, when Napoleon set out for Russia, he was left behind to form a corps of reserve at Berlin. In 1814 he was appointed to defend the south-east of France against the Austrians, but gave way before superior numbers. This irritated Napoleon, who viewed his conduct as approaching to treachery. On the fall of Napoleon, Augereau made his peace with the Bourbons, and was created a peer. On the return of the emperor from Elba he offered his services to Napoleon, but they were not accepted, and after Waterloo he sat on the council which condemned Marshal Ney. Soon after this his own life terminated. B. in Paris, 1757; D. 1815.

AUGSBURG.

AUGHAVAL, or OUGHEVAL, aw'-ga-val, a parish in county Mayo, Ireland. Area, 33,695 acres, consisting mostly of hills and bogs. Pop. 9,000.

AUGHNAMULLEN, awg'-na-mul-en, a parish of Ulster, Ireland, 3 miles from Ballybay. Area, 30,710 acres. Pop. about 19,000.—This parish has a great many lochs.

AUGILA, aw'-ge-la, a district and town of Africa, on the route between Siwah and Fezzan. Lat. 29° 35′ N. Lon. 22° 25′ E.

AUGLAIZE, aw'-glaiz, a county of Ohio, U.S. Area, 396 square miles. Pop. 12,000. The Miami and Erie Canal intersects this county.

AUGSBURG, augs'-boorg, an ancient city of Bavaria, at the conflux of the Lech and Wertach, 35 miles from Munich. Desc. It is large, and has still some fortifications in the old style, with four principal gates and six smaller ones. The Catholics have several churches and monasteries, and the Lutherans have also several churches. In the public library there is a valuable collection of Grecian works, both in manuscript and print. There is an academy, a lyceum, and a polytechnic school. Of the public edifices, the cathedral, the town-house, the Perlach tower, the bishop's palace, and the beautiful bronze fountains, are worthy of attention. Manf. Fine cotton, wire, looking-glasses, tobacco, coloured papers, carpets, ribbons, chemicals; and there are considerable dyeing and bleaching works. A large trade is carried on in engraving, printing, and bookbinding, and the celebrated Allgemeine Zeitung, the leading journal of Germany, is here published. Next to Frankfort, Augsburg is the most influential money-market on the continent. Pop. 38,000.—Here the celebrated "Augsburg Confession," which, under the auspices of Luther, was drawn up by Melancthon, was, in 1531, presented to the emperor Charles V. In 1806, Augsburg, by the treaty of Presburg, was merged into the dominions of Bavaria, and was surrendered by the French general René into the hands of his Bavarian majesty. I is the birthplace of Holbein, Holl, and other eminent artists. It is connected by railroads with Munich and Lindau, on Lake Constance; and northward with Nurnberg and Bamberg, whence a line runs north-east, connecting Bavaria with the Saxon and Prussian railway system; and another westward to Frankfort-on-the-Rhine.

AUGST, oste, the name of three villages in Switzerland, of small populations. One of them, 6 miles from Basle, is supposed to occupy the site of the ancient Augusta Rauracorum. Several Roman antiquities have been found in its vicinity.

AUGURES, aw'-gu-reez, certain officers at Rome, who foretold future events. They were first created by Romulus, and were three in number. Servius Tullius added a fourth, and the tribunes of the people increased the number to nine; and Sylla, during his dictatorship, added six more. The augur generally sat on a high tower to make his observations. His face was turned towards the east, and he had the north on his left and the south on his right. With a crooked staff he divided the face of the heavens into four parts, and afterwards sacrificed to the gods, covering his head with his vestment. There were generally five things from which omens were drawn; namely, the phenomena of the heavens, the chirping or flying of birds, the feeding of the sacred fowls, the motions of quadrupeds, and different casualties, such as spilling salt, stumbling, sneezing, &c.

AUGUSTA, aw-gus'-ta, a settlement in W. Australia, founded by Governor Stirling in 1830. The district is fertile, and is situate to the west of Flinders Bay.

AUGUSTA, a county of Virginia, U.S. Area, 860 square miles. Desc. Fertile, and producing the usual cerealia. Pop. about 25,000, of whom one fifth are slaves.

AUGUSTA, the capital of Richmond county, Georgia, U.S., on the Savannah river, 127 miles from Savannah, and the centre of a cotton district. Pop. 7,000. It is a station of the Charleston and Milledgeville Railway.—There are several other smaller towns and townships of the same name in America.

AUGUSTA HISTORIA, aw-gus'-ta his-tor'-e-a, a name applied to several Roman writers who composed the biographies of the emperors from the accession of Adrian to the death of Carinus, the immediate predecessor of Diocletian, embracing a period of 167 years of the Roman empire.

AUGUSTI, Christian J. W., a distinguished German theologian, who rose to the highest academical honours. B. at Eschenberg 1772; D. 1841.

AUGUSTINE, ST., aw-gus'-tine, a cape in Brazil, 25 miles from Pernambuco. Lat. 8° 21′ S. Lon. 34° 56′ W. —This was the first point of land in S. America discovered in 1500 by Penzon.

AUGUSTINE'S, ST., a port and river on the Labrador coast.—Also a number of small islands on the same coast.

AUGUSTINE, ST., one of the fathers of the Christian church, who, although he had all the advantages of a good education, squandered much of his time in debauchery. In 371 his father sent him to Carthage, where he became a convert to the Manichees, and taught rhetoric with great reputation, but still continued his licentious course of life, notwithstanding the great efforts his mother made to reclaim him. Wearied with his African life, Augustine removed to Rome, where he taught rhetoric with great applause, and was appointed its professor at Milan. Here the sermons of St. Ambrose effected his conversion; and, renouncing his heretical opinions, he was baptized in 387. The next year he returned to Africa, and was ordained a priest. He was at first the coadjutor of Valerius, bishop of Hippo, and afterwards his successor. B. at Tagaste, in Africa, 354; D. 430.—His writings have always been held in veneration by the Catholic Church; and from them was formed that system commonly called scholastic divinity.

AUGUSTINE, or AUSTIN, ST., the first archbishop of Canterbury, was a Roman monk, sent, about 596, by Gregory I., with forty others, to preach the gospel in England. On landing in Thanet, they informed King Ethelbert of their purpose, when the king assigned them Canterbury for their residence, with permission to exercise their function. The monarch himself embraced Christianity, but never attempted to bring over his subjects by force. Augustine was consecrated at Arles, archbishop and metropolitan of the church, and fixed his seat at Canterbury. He now endeavoured to convert the Welsh bishops to his tenets, but met with great opposition from them, and died without accomplishing his object. D. early in the 7th century.

AUGUSTULUS, or ROMULUS AUGUSTUS, aw-gus'-tu-lus rom'-u-lus, the last of the Roman emperors in the West, was the son of Orestes, who, having deposed Julius Nepos, refused the throne for himself, but in 476 placed his son upon it. Shortly after, Odoacer, king of the Heruli, invaded Italy, slew Orestes, and deprived the young emperor of his dignity. He was, however, suffered to live a private life in Campania, and a pension of 6,000 pieces of gold annually allowed him. With him ended the Roman empire in the West.

AUGUSTUS OCTAVIANUS CÆSAR, aw-gus'-tus ok-tai'-ve-ai'-nus se'-sar, second emperor of Rome, was son of Octavius, a senator, and Accia, daughter of Julius, and sister of Julius Cæsar. He was born during the consulship of Cicero, and was adopted by his uncle, Julius Cæsar, the greatest part of whose fortune he inherited. At the age of twenty he was made consul, and though his youth and inexperience were ridiculed by his enemies, yet he rose by his prudence and valour, and made war against them, on pretence of avenging the death of his uncle. He waged, with success, five civil wars,—Mutina, Perusia, Philippi, Sicily, and Actium. The first and last were against M. Antony, the second against L. Antony, the brother of the triumvir. The third was against Brutus and Cassius, and the fourth against Sext. Pompey, the son of Pompey the Great. He united his forces with those of Antony at the battle of Philippi; but had he not been supported by the activity of his colleague, he would have been totally defeated in that engagement. In his triumvirate with Antony and Lepidus, he obtained the western parts of the Roman empire, and, like his two colleagues, more firmly to establish his power, he proscribed his enemies and cut them off. The triumvirate lasted ten years. He had given his sister Octavia in marriage to Antony, to cement their alliance; but when Cleopatra fascinated Antony, Octavia was repudiated. Augustus immediately took up arms, ostensibly to avenge the wrongs of his sister, but, perhaps, rather from a desire to remove a man whose existence and power kept him in continual alarm. Both parties met at Actium, 31 B.C., to decide the fate of Rome. Antony was supported by all the strength of the East, and Augustus by Italy. Cleopatra fled from the battle with sixty ships; an event which ruined the interest of Antony, who followed her into Egypt. The conqueror soon after pursued them, besieged Alexandria, and honoured with a magnificent funeral the unfortunate Antony and the celebrated queen, whom the fear of being led in the victor's triumph at Rome had driven to commit suicide. (See ANTONY.) Augustus having established peace all over the world, he closed the gates of the temple of Janus, in the same year which saw the birth of our Saviour. He was twice resolved to lay down the supreme power, immediately after the victory obtained over Antony, on account of his failing health; but his two faithful friends, Mœcenas and Agrippa, dissuaded him, and observed that he would leave the empire the prey of the most powerful, and expose himself to the greatest dangers. B. at Rome, 63 B.C.; D. at Nola, 14 A.D. after reigning 57 years.—He was an active ruler, and consulted the good of the Romans with the most anxious care. He visited all the provinces except Africa and Sardinia, and his consummate prudence and experience gave rise to many salutary laws. He is, however, accused of licentiousness; but the goodness of his heart, the fidelity of his friendship, and the many excellent qualities which the poets whom he patronized have, perhaps truly, celebrated, made some amends for his natural infirmities. He was ambitious of being thought handsome, and, as he was publicly reported to be the son of Apollo, he wished his flatterers to represent him with the figure and attributes of that god. He distinguished himself by his learning, was a master of the Greek language, and wrote some tragedies, besides memoirs of his life, and other works, none of which are extant. He married four times, but he was unhappy in his matrimonial connections, and his only daughter, Julia, disgraced herself and her father by the debauchery and licentiousness of her manners. He recommended at his death his adopted son, Tiberius, as his successor. Virgil wrote his scarcely-surpassed epic poem, the Æncid, at the desire of Augustus, whom he represented under the character of Æneas. The name of Augustus was afterwards given to succeeding Roman emperors.

AUGUSTUS I., elector of Saxony, reigned in general peace, and was, by some, esteemed a prince so wise as to be called the Justinian of Saxony. He greatly embellished Dresden, and built the splendid palace of Augustenburg. B. 1526; D. 1586.

AUGUSTUS FREDERICK II., king of Poland and elector of Saxony. To the former dignity he was elected in 1697, out of many competitors. He formed a strict alliance with Peter the Great against Sweden and Turkey; and from this time may be dated the origin of Russian influence in Poland. In his wars with Sweden he may be said to have been unsuccessful, although his troops gained some victories; and at length, completely defeated at Klissof, 1702, he was forced by Charles XII. to abandon his claim to the Polish throne. The Swedish monarch, however, being beaten by Peter at Pultowa, Augustus was reinstated, and continued in possession of his kingdom, although it remained in a state of great disorganization, from which it never recovered. B. at Dresden, 1670; D. 1733.—His habits were luxurious and licentious, and one of his many natural children was the famous Marshal Saxe.

AUGUSTUS FREDERICK III., elector of Saxony and king of Poland, was the son of Augustus II. He was an indolent, idle, and pleasure-seeking prince, and his politics were entirely dependent on Russia. His daughter Maria Josepha was married to the Dauphin of France, from which alliance sprung Louis XVI., Louis XVIII., and Charles X. B. at Dresden, 1696; D. 1763.

AUGUSTUS FREDERICK, prince of Great Britain and Ireland, and duke of Sussex. This was the sixth son and the ninth child of George III. He was a benevolent, unostentatious prince, taking a deep interest in those questions which had for their object the amelioration of the social condition of the people, promoting political reform, and giving his hearty support to the abolition of the slave-trade. He was twice married; first to Lady Augusta Murray, second daughter of the earl of Dunmore, Scotland, which marriage was subsequently set aside; and secondly, to Lady Cecilia Letitia Buggin (widow of Sir George Buggin), who was created Duchess of Inverness. B. at Buckingham Palace, 1773; D. at Kensington Palace, 1843.

AULDEARN, awl-dern, a village and parish of Scotland, in the county of Nairn, on the Moray Frith. Pop. 1,809.—Here, in 1645, Montrose gained a victory over the Covenanters.

AULUS GELLIUS, aw'-lus jel'-e-us, a Greek grammarian, whose "Noctes Atticæ," or Attic Nights, has gone through a variety of editions, and been translated into English by Mr. Beloe. Lived in the 1st century, during the reign of Trajan.

AUMALE, o'-mal, formerly Albemarle, a town of France, on the Bresle, 13 miles from Neufchâtel. Manf. Earthenware, woollens, and yarns. Pop. 2,300. —Here, in 1592, a battle was fought between the Spaniards and Henry IV., in which the latter was wounded.

AUMALE, Charles de Lorraine, duc d', one of the leaders of the Catholic party in Paris, after the assassination of the duke of Guise, in 1588. He was sentenced to be broken on the wheel for high treason by the parliament of Paris. The sentence was carried out in effigy in July, 1595. D. at Brussels, 1631.

AUMALE, Henri Eugène Philippe Louis, duc d', fourth son of Louis Philippe, king of the French. He early entered the army, and served in Africa under the duke of Orleans and Generals Bugeaud and Baraguay d'Hilliers. Weakened by fever, he returned to Paris in 1841; and here an unsuccessful attempt was made to shoot him. Rejoining the forces in Algeria, he gained some considerable successes, and in 1847 was appointed governor-general, and in that capacity received the submission of Abd-el-Kader. The news of the revolution in Paris, of February, 1848, reached him in Algeria, and in the following month, embarking with his brother, he sailed to England to join there the other members of his family. B. 1822.

AUMONT, John d', o'-mawng, count of Châteauroux, a French general, who displayed great abilities, and was made, by Henry III., marshal of France. Henry IV. appointed him governor of Champagne, and afterwards of Brittany. He was shot at the siege of Camper, near Rennes, 1595. B. 1522.—He had served six monarchs, —Francis I., Henry II., Francis II., Charles IX., Henry III., and Henry IV.

AUNOY, or AULNOY, Marie Catharine, countess of, o'-noi, a French authoress, who, at the close of the 17th century, was a distinguished ornament of the French court, and contributed largely to the light literature of her day. She is principally known through the success of her "Fairy Tales," which were imitations of a style of composition introduced in France by Charles Perrault, and which achieved an amount of popularity equal to those of her master. The titles of her stories will, to some extent, indicate their character. Some of these are "The White Cat," "The Yellow Dwarf," "The Fair One with the Golden Locks," "Cherry and Fair Star;" several of which have formed the basis of successful spectacles and pantomimes, and other extravaganzas. B. 1650; D. 1705. —This lady left four daughters behind her, one of whom, Madame de Hère, inherited similar talents to those by which her parent was distinguished.

AURAY, o'-rai, a town of France, department of Morbihan, 10 miles from Vannes. Manf. Cotton spinning, and there is a considerable trade done in fish. Pop. about 4,000.

AURELIAN, Lucius Domitius, aw-re'-li-an, a Roman emperor, was the son of a peasant in Illyricum. He displayed such skill and valour as a soldier, that Valerian, having raised him to very high rank in the army, at last invested him with the consulate. On the death of Claudius II., in 270, who recommended him as his successor, he ascended the imperial throne. He delivered Italy from the barbarians, defeated Tetricus, who had assumed the title of emperor in Gaul, and conquered Zenobia, queen of Palmyra, 273. After these victories he entered Rome in triumph, and next turned his attention to the improvement of Rome, and to the reformation of public manners. On his march against Persia, he was assassinated by his mutinous troops, 275. B. about 212.

AURELIUS, aw-re'-li-us, a post township of the United States, New York, on Cayuga lake. Pop. about 3,000.

AURELIUS VICTOR, Sextus, a Roman historian, who, though born of mean parents, in Africa, raised himself by his talents to distinction. In 361 Julian made him prefect of the second Pannonia, and in 369 he was chosen consul with Valentinian. Lived in the 4th century.—His Roman history has been several times printed, and is considered both faithful and minute.

AURICH, ow'-reesh, the capital of the principality of East Friesland, in the kingdom of Hanover, 12 miles from Emden, with which it is connected by a canal. The town is built in the Dutch style, and has a handsome old palace, in which the former princes of East Friesland resided. Manf. Brandy, paper, leather, tobacco, and pipes. Pop. 4,000. A telegraph station.

AURIGNY, o-reen'-ye, one of the Channel Islands. (See ALDERNEY.)

AURILLAC, o-ree'-yak, the chief town in the department of the Cantal, France, on the river Jordanne, 40 miles from Tulle. Manf. Jewellery, copper utensils, paper, woollens, carpets, and blonde lace. There are tanning, dyeing, and brewing works, and a good trade is carried on in horses, mules, and cattle. Pop. 10,300. It is a telegraph station.

AURIOL, o'-re-ole, a town of France, in the department of the Mouths of the Rhone, 15 miles from Marseilles. The town is irregularly built, though many of the houses have an elegant appearance. Manf. Cloths, paper, soda, bricks; and in the neighbourhood there are some collieries and beds of gypsum. Pop. 5,000.

AURORA, aw-ror'-a, a goddess, daughter of Hyperion and Thia, or Thea, or, according to others, of Titan and Terra. She married Astræus, by whom she had the winds, the stars, &c. She is generally described by the poets as drawn in a rose-coloured chariot, by white horses, and opening with her rosy fingers the gates of the east, pouring the dew upon the earth, and making the flowers grow. She is covered with a veil, Nox and Somnus fly before her, and the stars of heaven disappear at her approach. She always sets out before the sun, and is the forerunner of his rising. The Greeks call her Eos.

AURORA, a name common to several islands. 1. One of the Society Islands in the S. Pacific. Pop. 350. Lat. 16° 50′ S. Lon. 148° 11′ W.—2. One of the New Hebrides. Lat. 14° 50′ S. Lon. 168° 6′ E.—3. One in the Red Sea, inhabited by Bedouins. Lat. 25° 30′ N. Lon. 36° 20′ E.

AURORA, a town of New York, U.S., 15 miles from Buffalo. Pop. 3,000.—There are several small towns of this name in the United States.

AURUNGABAD, o-rung'-a-bad, an old province of Hindostan, formerly comprehending Ahmednuggur and Dowlatabad. It was situate in the Deccan, and in 1636 became one of the provinces of the Mogul empire, under the reign of Shah Jehan. It was subsequently divided between the Nizam and the Mahrattas, the latter receiving about three fourths, and the former one fourth of the territory. The greater part of it is now under the power of the British. Desc. In general mountainous, a large portion of it consisting of a table-land rising to about 1,800 feet above the level of the sea. The soil is fertile, producing rice in great abundance, and bringing European fruits, particularly grapes, strawberries, and peaches, to the highest state of perfection. Rivers. The Neera, Beema, and Godavery. Towns. The principal are Aurungabad, Ahmednuggur, Poonah, and Dowlatabad. Lat. between 18° and 21° N. Lon. 73° and 77° E.—In this district are most of the cave-temples of India,—those of Elephanta, Salsette, Elora, and Carlee.

AURUNGABAD, a considerable city of the Deccan, and capital of Dowlatabad. It is but a modern city, owing its rise to the great Aurungzebe, from whom it had its name. The chief ornament of the city is a mausoleum, built for a favourite daughter by this monarch, and is somewhat like, though very inferior to, the Taj Mahal of Agra. Pop. about 60,000. Lat. 19° 45′ N. Lon. 76° 2′ E.—This city is inclosed by a wall; and, at the distance of a mile from it, are cantonments, where a battalion of the Nizam's army, under British officers, were quartered. Here the Nizam's irregular cavalry rebelled late in May, 1857, when it was found necessary to remove the English ladies to a place of greater safety. The mutineers, however, fled without having committed any of those excesses by which their conduct was marked in other places.

AURUNGZEBE, aw-rung-zeeb', emperor of Hindostan, known as the Great Mogul, was the youngest son of Shah Jehan, of the dynasty of Timur, and early in his youth affected religious sanctity; but, in 1658, he and his brother Morad seized Agra, and made their father prisoner. Soon afterwards he put Morad and another brother, Dara, to death, still, however, acting with kindness towards his father, who died in 1666. Aurungzebe greatly enlarged his dominions, and became so formidable, that all the eastern princes sent him ambassadors. His latter days were embittered by jealousy of the ambitious views of his sons, and he constantly resided in his camp, which was prodigiously large, and resembled a populous city. B. 1618; D. at Ahmednuggur, 1707. By his will, Aurungzebe divided his possessions among his sons. He was the last of the energetic sovereigns who sat on the Mogul throne during the 17th century.

AUSONIUS, Decimus Magnus, aw-so'-ne-us, son of a physician at Bordeaux, who became a teacher of grammar and rhetoric, and also a writer of Latin poems, at that place. His fame reached Rome, and Valentinian, the emperor, appointed him tutor to his son Gratian. In 379 he was raised to the consular dignity. Flourished in the 4th century. His poems, though unequal, have great merit.

AUSPICES, 'aws'-pi-sez, a sacerdotal order at Rome, nearly the same as the augurs.

AUSPITZ, ous'-pitz, a town of Moravia, in the circle of Brunn, 42 miles from Olmutz. Pop. 3,000. It is a station on the railway from Vienna to Brunn.

AUSSEE, ous-see, a town of Styria, Austria, 8 miles from Hullstadt. Pop. 1,400.—The rock-salt mines of this place have been worked for upwards of 1,000 years.

AUSSEGG, or AUSSIG, ous'-seeg, a village of Prussian Saxony, in the district of Merseburg, where the emperor Charles V. had his head-quarters previous to the battle of Mühlberg, fought in 1547, with the elector of Saxony.

AUSTEN, William, aws'-ten, an English metal founder of considerable celebrity, who had a share in constructing the tomb of Richard de Beauchamp, earl of Warwick, to be seen in St. Mary's church, Warwick. Lived in the 15th century.

AUSTEN, Jane, the authoress of several popular novels, which have appeared in different editions. All her portraitures are the delineation of characters of every-day English life, being marked by no very strong traits either morally or intellectually. The chief of her productions are "Sense and Sensibility;" "Pride and Prejudice;" "Mansfield Park;" "Emma;" and "Persuasion." B. at Steventon, Hampshire, 1775. D. at Winchester, 1817.

AUSTERLITZ, or SLAWKOW, aws'-ter-litz (Ger. ous'-ter-litz), a small town of Moravia, circle of Brunn, 12 miles from Brunn. Pop. 2,500. This town is noted for being the scene of a great battle fought on the 2nd December, 1805, between the French and the allied armies of Austria and Russia, in which the former gained a decisive victory. This battle was followed by the peace of Presburg, which was concluded on the 26th of the same month, and which stripped Austria of nearly 24,000 square miles of territory and 2,786,000 subjects. The fight was subsequently called the "battle of the three emperors," from there being present in the field, the emperors of France, Austria, and Russia.

AUSTERLITZ, the name of two small towns in the United States.

AUSTIN, aus'-tin, the capital of Texas, on the Colorado, in the U.S. Pop. 3,000.

AUSTIN, John, author of "Lectures on the Province of Jurisprudence."

AUSTLE, St., aws'-tel, a town and parish of Cornwall, 13 miles from Truro. Near it are several tin-mines, and large quantities of porcelain clay are exported to different places for the potteries. Pop. about 11,000.

AUSTONLEY, aws'-ton-le, a township in the W. Riding of Yorkshire, 8 miles from Huddersfield. Area, 1,760 acres. Pop. 2,300.

AUSTRALASIA (SOUTH ASIA), aws'-tral-ai'-she-a, in modern geography, the fifth great division of the globe. It comprises New Holland or Australia, Van Diemen's Land or Tasmania, Papua or New Guinea, New Britain, New Ireland, New Caledonia, and New Zealand, together with a multitude of islands surrounding them in all directions. It forms one of three portions into which some geographers have divided Oceanica; the other two being Polynesia and Malasia. For a general designation, the British have adopted Australasia, the French Oceanica, and the Germans have changed the Terra Australis into Australia. The principal island or continent is now termed Australia; and the French and other geographers apply the term Oceanica to all the islands in the eastern seas and in the Pacific Ocean, lying between lat. 35° N. and 56° S., and lon. 94° E. and 105° W. To the smaller islands and the mainland or continent of Australia, they give the name of Polynesia. Area, estimated at 6,096,000 geographical square miles. Pop. estimated at about 2,500,000.

AUSTRALIA, or NEW HOLLAND, aws-trai-le-a, is the largest island in the world; indeed, it might rather be called a continent, from its great size. It lies to the S. of Asia, between the Indian and Pacific oceans; and is bounded on the N. by Torres Strait, the Sea of Timor, and the islands of Papua or New Guinea, Timor, &c.; on the S. by Bass's Strait, Van Diemen's Land, and the S. Pacific; on the E. by the S. Pacific; and on the W. by the Indian Ocean. Ext. Its greatest length is from Sharks Bay on the W., to Cape Sandy on the E. coast, which is estimated at 2,400 miles. Its greatest breadth is between Cape York, on Torres Strait, and Cape Otway, on Bass's Strait, which is computed at 1,400 miles. Area, 3,000,000 square miles. Coast-line, 8,000 miles. Capes. Beginning with Cape York, there are, on the E., Melville, Flattery, Gloucester, Townsend, Sandy, Moreton, Byron, and Howe; on the S. Wilson's Promontory, Cape Otway, Northumberland, Lannes, Jervis, and Radstock; on the W. Leeuwin, Naturaliste, and N.W. Cape; on the N. Bourgainville, Londonderry, and Cape Wessel. Gulfs and Bays. Notwithstanding that there are a great many excellent harbours on the Australian coasts, extensive indentations are comparatively few. The principal are the Gulf of Carpentaria on the N. and Spencer's Gulf on the S. The former has a breadth of 400 miles, and runs inland between 600 and 700, whilst the latter has a width at its broadest part of not more than 80 miles, and extends no further inland than about 180. Sharks Bay, on the W., is not more than 40 or 50 miles in length and width, and Harvey's Bay, on the E., is about the same. Straits. Torres, on the N., separating it from the island of Papua, and on the S. Bass's, separating it from Van Diemen's Land. Seas. The interior of this vast country cannot be fully described, as it has been explored in an extremely partial manner. It is believed to consist of an immense plain, here densely covered with vegetation and there running into boundless stony deserts, the termination of which it has been impossible to trace. Every traveller coincides with the general description given of it by Captain Sturt, who in 1845 set out from Adelaide with the intention of penetrating the interior, and pursued his object as far as lat. 25° 30′ S. and lon. 138 E. Speaking of the country through which he passed, he says it consisted of sand-ridges perfectly insurmountable, and so close that the base of one touched the base of the other, the whole aspect of the country being nothing but sand. The sand-hills he describes as a fiery red, running for miles and miles in parallel rows, with points like the vanishing points of an avenue. These were finally lost in a stony desert that stretched before him in absolute boundlessness. From this description and the concurring testimony of others, it would seem that the best parts of this continent have been already appropriated, and form the greater portions of its southern and eastern shores. In these localities the finest scenery is to be found. Extensive tracts are still available for farming and pasturage, whilst there is an abundance of both wood and water. At a distance varying from 30 to 90 miles from the sea, on the E. coast, a ridge of mountains runs for a considerable extent; but from Spencer's Gulf to Cape Leeuwin, on the S., the coast is generally low and flat. The same may be observed of the W. and N. in so far as they have yet been explored; these extensive and dreary regions offering few temptations to induce the settler to take up his habitation upon their inhospitable shores. Mountains. The Warragongs, or Australian Alps, the Liverpool range, the Blue Mountains, and another range not yet named. This system extends from Wilson's Promontory on the S., and terminates in a series of low heights at Cape York, on Torres Strait. Their elevation is in general not great. The culminating point of the Blue Mountains is Mount York, which is 3,292 feet. The loftiest peaks of the Liverpool range have been variously computed at from 4,000 to 7,000 feet, whilst Mount Kosciusko, in the Australian Alps, has been ascertained to be 6,500 feet, estimated to command a prospect of country of 7,000 square miles. From this circumstance some idea of the flatness of this portion of Australia may be formed. On the S. coast the Australian Grampians, with which are connected the Australian Pyrenees, begin at Portland Bay, and, extending along the coast, take a northern direction, and finally become connected with the Australian Alps. In the S. another mountain-chain takes its rise at Cape Jervis, and running N. is lost in the depression of Lake Torrens. These are the principal mountain-ranges of Australia; amongst which are to be found many evidences of extinct volcanoes. Rivers. Of the rivers in the interior, the principal is the Murray, which has for its affluents the Darling, Castlereagh, Peel, Macquarie, Bogan, Lachlan, and Murrumbigee. The extent of the basin drained by this water-system is not known. The other chief rivers are the Hunter, Hawkesbury, and Shoalhaven, which fall into the Pacific on the E.; the Blackwood and Glenelg on the S.; the Swan and the Canning on the W.; and the Victoria, the Adelaide, the Liverpool, and the Alligator, on the N.: few of these, however, are open to internal navigation. Lakes. These hardly deserve the name, being rather marshes than lakes. The largest are the Victoria, the Dambeling, and the Torrens. The first is traversed by the river Murray, and is in S. Australia; the Torrens is also in this region, and is estimated to be about 400 miles in length, with an average breadth of from 15 to 20. In the dry season it is nothing more than a salt-marsh. The Dambeling is in W. Australia, and was discovered in 1843 by Messrs. Lander and Lefroy. It is 15 miles long and 8 broad, and is quite salt. Forests. Our knowledge of Australian vegetation is necessarily circumscribed, if the immense extent of territory yet to be explored is taken into consideration. As yet we can hardly be said to have penetrated beyond the coasts and maritime districts, where we find that the trees have generally an unvaried dull monotonous hue of olive-green: gloom is their pervading characteristic. In describing the general appearance of Australian tree-life, travellers say that, amid its apparent sameness, spots may be found teeming with a luxuriant and gigantic vegetation, sometimes laid out in stately groves, divested of copse or underwood, and at other times skirting an open country of hill and dale, gracefully sprinkled with isolated clumps of trees covered with the richest tufted herbage. Sometimes, again, they appear in immense thickets, interwoven with innumerable creepers, and forming bowers as impenetrable and picturesque as those which are found amid the forests of Brazil. The trees are mostly evergreens, and have a hard and horny species of leaves, which grow from the branches vertically, and not horizontally, as is the case with the trees of this country. It is affirmed that one eighth of all the known species of vegetables are peculiar to Australia. The most beautiful tree of the Australian forest is the fern-tree, which, when it has attained a height of 15 or 20 feet, throws out its gigantic leaves in every direction, each to the extent of 4 or 5 feet. Grass-trees are also numerous, but palms are confined to the E. and N. shores, where the vegetation assimilates itself more to that of India. Wild Animals. Not numerous, but peculiar, many of them being of the order Marsupialia, or having a pouch; the kangaroo, wombat, wild dog or dingo, and the ornithorhynchus, being the principal. The kangaroo is the largest native animal, and often attains the weight of from 160 to 200 lb. Australia has many varieties of it, the smallest and most beautiful being the kangaroo rat. The wombat is about the size of a badger, burrowing in the sand-hills of the interior, and feeding exclusively upon vegetables. It is social in its habits, and, like the most of the Australian mammals, it is nocturnal, sleeping in its burrow during the day, and moving about in search of food only in the night. The dingoes, or wild dogs, do not bark like the common dog, but only yelp, and are the most frequently met with. When hard pressed by hunger, they devour each other, and, being very destructive to the sheep, they are eagerly hunted by the settlers. The ornithorhynchus is one of the most remarkable animals in existence. It has the bill of a duck, a body covered with fur, and resembling an otter. It is about thirteen inches long, from the tip of its beak to that of its tail. It is an aquatic animal, laying eggs, and frequenting the margins of rivers and lakes. In the autumn of 1858, the hare was introduced from this country. Birds. Of these the most remarkable are the emu, the black swan, and a kind of thrush called the laughing jackass. Birds of paradise are numerous in the north, and many of the songsters are exceedingly gorgeous in their plumage. The most magnificent, perhaps, are the rifle-bird and the ring oriole. The lyre-bird has a tail shaped like a lyre, and is most superbly plumaged. Of game birds, pheasants and partridges were, in the autumn of 1858, introduced from this country. Reptiles. These are numerous, but not dangerous. The most formidable is the alligator, which abounds in the north. There are many kinds of serpents; amongst which may be named the diamond-snake, the black snake, the grey, brown, yellow, and whip snakes, the bites of which are all more or less dangerous: that of the yellow snake especially is almost instantly fatal. Lizards and frogs abound; and scorpions, centipedes, and tarantulas exist in considerable numbers. Insects are also numerous, although requiring no especial notice here on account of peculiarity. Fish are also plentiful along the coasts. Domestic Animals. The same as in this country. Sheep are very abundant, and their wool is very fine. In the autumn of 1858 twenty-one Alpacas were presented to the colony by a few returned colonists, in the hope that that animal would thrive, and become ultimately a valuable contribution to the commerce of the country. At the same time a goodly number of blackbirds and thrushes were transported with them, to be set free in the Australian forests; that the song-birds of the British emigrant may be heard reverberating in the far-away woods which have become the home of his adoption, and which, in this manner, may be a means of recalling those who are still dear to him in his father-land. Climate. In general dry and healthy, except during the heavy winter rains, which do not last long. It is, however, liable to sudden changes of temperature. Pro. Wheat, maize, the usual European cerealia, and fruits are cultivated. Tobacco, flax, sugar, olives, and grapes are also being extensively raised. As Australia, however, is a wool-growing country, sheep-farming is pursued on the largest scale. Minerals. Coal, slate, potters' clay, and beautiful marbles, suitable for the purposes of the statuary. Tin, lead, and copper abound; but the gold discoveries of 1851 in New S. Wales, and of 1852 in Victoria, have eclipsed all other mineral products. Race. The aborigines belong to the Papuan negro race, and are of a chocolate-colour, wandering in their habits, and exceedingly disgusting in the food which they eat. They are declared British subjects, having the protection of the laws equally with any of the colonists. They are extremely superstitious, believing in two spirits, a good and a bad, respectively called Koyan and Potoyan. Their number is not great, and is steadily decreasing. Australian Colonies. New South Wales, Victoria, South Australia, Western Australia, Tasmania or Van Diemen's Land, and New Zealand. The colony of New S. Wales was formed in 1788; that of W. Australia, or Swan River, in 1829; S. Australia in 1834; and Victoria in 1852. Each, however, will be treated fully under its respective name. Pop. of British colonies, including Tasmania and Norfolk Island, nearly 500,000. Lat. between 10° and 39° S. Lon. between 113° and 154° E.—About the beginning of the 17th century the Spaniards or the Dutch were the earliest European discoverers of Australia; but little was known of it till Dampier, Wallis, and Cook explored its coasts. settlement was at Port Jackson, in 1788. Steam communication is established between Great Britain and Australia, and there is continual intercourse between these two countries, forming the antipodes of each other. There are three routes to Australia; the one by the Isthmus of Suez, called the East route; the other by the Cape of Good Hope; and the third by the Isthmus of Panama, called the West route. By this last the distance is only 12,690 miles; by the Cape it is 13,880; and by the first route it is 14,488. In going by Panama, then, the voyager would go 1,798 miles less than he would by the Isthmus of Suez and Singapore. (See NEW S. WALES, ADELAIDE, VICTORIA, MELBOURNE, PERTH, SYDNEY, and the various articles on the colonies and principal towns of Australia.)

AUSTRALIA FELIX. (See PORT PHILLIP.)

AUSTRALIA (EASTERN). (See NEW SOUTH WALES.)

AUSTRALIA (NORTH) is that part of the island-continent which lies N. of lat. 26° S., and E. of lon. 129° E. Ext. Its greatest length from W. to E. is about 1,500 miles, and its greatest breadth from N. to S. about 1,000. Gulfs. Carpentaria on the N., and Van Diemen and Cambridge on the W. Comparatively little is known of this large tract of country. There was a government station established at Port Essington, but, from the hot and unhealthy character of the climate, it was abandoned in 1849. At present not a single permanent settlement exists upon it.

AUSTRALIA (SOUTH) lies on the S. shore of the island-continent of Australia, and is bounded on the N. by unexplored territory, E. by Victoria, W. by Western Australia, and S. by the Southern Ocean. Area, 300,000 square miles. Coast. About 1,500 miles. Desc. The surface of this region is generally traversed by mountain-ranges, the highest summits of which do not attain an elevation of more than 3,012 feet. Of these, the highest are Mount Lofty, Black Rock Hill, Razor-back, and Mountain Bryan; the respective heights of which are 2,334, 2,750, 2,992, and 3,012 feet. It is at Mountain Bryan where the celebrated Burra Burra mine is. Rivers. Almost the only river of the colony is the Murray, which falls into the lagoon called Lake Victoria, communicating with Encounter Bay. All the other streams, for the greater part of the year, are nothing more than lines of ponds. Climate. Hot, but healthy. Pro. All the ordinary grain crops, maize, and potatoes. The vine flourishes, and many other fruits; whilst melons attain not only a large size, but are of an excellent quality. The country, however, is rather pastoral than agricultural. Minerals. Copper is the principal, and, with wool, forms the chief article of export in the colony. Progress of the Colony. The rapid development of this colony is seen by the official returns, which begin in 1840. In that year the entire population was only 14,610 souls, but in 1857 it had increased to 109,917 persons. The revenue of the colony in 1840 was £30,200; in 1857 it was £726,326. As regards the imports and exports,—in 1840 South Australia shipped colonial produce to the value of £15,050 only, and received £303,357; making, consequently, the imports more than the exports, or the colony a debtor to the mother or other countries; but this state of affairs soon changed, and in 1857 she was a creditor for £121,128, the exports having amounted to £1,744,180, while the value of imports was £1,623,052. The portion of the colony under cultivation in 1840 was 2,503 acres; in 1857 it was 235,965 acres; and more than 10,000 persons are engaged in pursuits connected with the land so brought into a productive state. There were then 70 flour-mills in the colony, and 226 manufactories of various descriptions. Horned cattle and sheep numbered 2,386,205 in 1857, besides 26,220 horses. The three principal branches of colonial merchandise in South Australia are pastoral, agricultural, and mining; and, taking the general population, with the acreage under cultivation, together with the value of the exports in 1857, there are about two acres to each individual, and the earnings are equivalent to £15. 17*s.* 4*d.* for every man, woman, and child. This is much in excess of the statistical results of other countries. The Burra Burra, Kapunda, and other copper-mines in the north, have hitherto been the chief source of supply; but other mines are now being developed; such as the North Rhine and Bon Accord. Pop. say 110,000. Lat. between 26° and 38° S. Lon.

between 132° and 141° E.—This colony was founded in 1834 by the South-Australian Company; but it was not firmly established till 1837. Adelaide is the capital. (See ADELAIDE.)

AUSTRALIA (WESTERN) is bounded on the E. by North and South Australia; and on the N., W., and S. by the Indian and S. Pacific oceans. Area, 1,000,000 square miles. Of this immense territory very little is yet known; its shores have only been partially explored; whilst its interior has never yet been penetrated. Lat. between 13° 45′ and 35° 10′ S. Lon. between 112° 40′ and 127° E.—The only portion of this country known with any degree of certainty is that which is embraced by the colony of West Australia, which see.

AUSTRALIA, WEST (Colony of). This portion of the above territory lies on the S.W. coast, and is the most thinly-populated of all the Australian colonies. Ext. 300 miles long from N. to S., and about 170 broad from E. to W. Coast-line. About 600 miles. General Desc. Consisting mostly of downs and slightly undulating hills, with a soil by no means remarkable for its fertility. The colony, however, is the least developed in its resources of all the others established in this part of the globe. Little trade is carried on with S. Australia or N. S. Wales; but with the Mauritius and Singapore an active communication is kept up. Its most important part is the Swan River settlement, which was founded in 1829 by Captain Stirling, who was appointed governor. Wool is the chief export. Pop. about 7,000. Lat. between 30° 30′ and 35° 10′ S. Lon. between 115° and 119° 35′ E. (See PERTH.)

AUSTRALIAN ALPS, GRAMPIANS, and PYRENEES, mountain-ranges of Australia. (See AUSTRALIA.)

AUSTRIA, CIRCLE OF, awst-tre-a, the largest of the ten circles into which the empire of Germany was divided. Bounded on the N. by Bohemia, Bavaria, and Suabia; on the W. by Bavaria, Switzerland, and the country of the Grisons; on the S. by Lombardy and Istria; and on the E. by Croatia and Hungary. It comprehends Austria proper, Styria, Carinthia, Carniola, part of Friuli and the Littorale, Tyrol, Vorarlberg, certain districts in Suabia, Trent, Brixen, and several domains belonging to the Teutonic order, since 1802. Most of these territories, however, are now comprised in the Austrian empire. Salzburg and part of Passau have likewise been included in it.

AUSTRIA, ARCHDUCHY OF, or, as it is frequently called, the "Hereditary States," forms a part of the above circle. It is bounded N. by Bohemia and Moravia; E. by Hungary; S. by Styria, Carinthia, and the Tyrol; and W. by Tyrol and Bavaria. Area, 15,052 square miles. Divisions. This archduchy is divided by the river Enns into two great parts, namely, Upper Austria and Lower Austria; and is further subdivided into the following four quarters:—on the south bank of the Danube, the quarter "above the forest of Vienna," and the quarter "below the forest of Vienna;" on the north bank of the Danube, the quarter "above the Manhartsberg," and the quarter below that mountain-tract. Upper Austria, in like manner, contains four divisions; viz. those of the Traun, Hausruck, and Inn, on the south bank of the Danube, and the Muhl on the north bank. General Desc. Fertile, and cultivated with great care and skill; abounding in forests and vineyards, producing annually 25,000,000 gallons of wine, and raising admirable crops of wheat, oats, and barley. Minerals. Gold, silver, copper, lead, iron, coal, alum, arsenic, and graphite. Manf. Weaving and spinning wool, cotton, and flax. Towns. The principal are Vienna, Linz, Wiener-Neustadt, and Salzburg. Pop. about 3,000,000. Lat. between 47° and 49° N. Lon. between 12° 10′ and 17° E.

AUSTRIA, EMPIRE OF, a central state of Europe, occupying a larger portion of the continent than the dominions of any other power, except Russia and Sweden. It is bounded on the N. by Russia, Prussia, Saxony, and Bavaria; on the E. by Russia; on the S. by Parma, Modena, the States of the Church, Turkey, and the Adriatic; and on the W. by the Sardinian states, Lichtenstein, and Switzerland. Ext. Estimated at 870 miles long and 690 broad. Area, 255,722 square miles. Coast. The only seacoast possessed by this great empire is in the Adriatic, including the gulfs of Venice and Trieste, the numerous islands and channels of the Dalmatian coast, and the Gulf of Cattaro, at the extreme south. The extent, therefore, of its coast-line may be taken at about 700 miles. Desc. Extremely mountainous, the plains not occupying more than a fifth part of the whole surface. Mountains. The Rhætian or Tyrolese, the Noric, the Carinthian, the Julian or Carniolian, and the Dinaric Alps. These mountains seldom exceed 6,000 feet in height, with the exception of the Ostler-Spitz, in the Tyrol, near the Swiss border, which has an elevation of 12,811 feet. The great Carpathian range forms the northern boundary of Hungary: it separates it from Galicia, and terminates a course of nearly 700 miles on the banks of the Danube, near the Wallachian frontier. The Carpathians are usually divided into the Lesser Carpathians, commencing near Presburg, and running in a north-easterly direction, and forming the boundary of Moravia, never exceeding 2,000 feet in elevation. The Central Carpathians, a grand range of an Alpine character, with glaciers, lakes, chasms, &c., have an average height of over 6,000 feet. The extent of the Carpathians is about 900 miles, with an average breadth of about 100. The Waldgebirge, or Forest Mountains, extend from south-eastern Galicia in a north-westerly direction across Hungary to the banks of the Hernad. The Transylvanian Alps, a series of parallel ranges, stretch from the Banat into the province whence they take their name, and subside in the plains of Moldavia, seldom reaching 4,000 feet in elevation. An extensive mountain-range, the Sudetes, or Hercynian chain, rises in the low country between the Vistula and the Oder, and follows a north-westerly direction of about 200 miles through Moravia, Silesia, and the north of Bohemia, until it reaches the Elbe at the borders of Saxony. Many of these mountains are extremely rich in minerals, especially the Carpathians, which abound in all the common sorts, with the exception of tin. Plains. These lie in Lower Hungary, Upper Hungary, Lombardy, and in N. Italy. They are remarkable for the uniformity of the level which they present. That of Lower Hungary occupies 36,000 square miles. Rivers. The Danube and the Dniester, falling into the Black Sea; the Po and the Adige, debouching into the Adriatic; the Vistula into the Baltic, and the Elbe into the German Ocean. Some of these have each several tributary streams of great extent and importance. Lakes. The principal in the mountain regions are Como, Maggiore, Lugano, Garda, and Iseo; in the plains, the Platten See and Lake Nieusiedel. Forests. Everywhere extensive, except in the lowlands of Lombardy, Hungary, and Lower Austria. They are estimated to cover an eighth part of the productive soil of the empire, and form a considerable source of its wealth. In Transylvania the forests abound with oak and other trees well adapted for shipbuilding and all other kinds of carpentry. Wild Animals. The black bear, the fox, and the lynx are plentiful; the chamois is getting rare; but herds of wild swine haunt the forests, and wild deer and horses roam over the plains. Birds. More numerous than in any other part of Europe. The white heron is especially abundant amongst the marshes of Hungary, and the vulture and golden eagle are numerous amongst the Alpine ranges. Reptiles. The land tortoise and leeches, which last are abundant. Fish. Plentiful in the rivers, the Theiss being considered the most plentifully supplied with fish of any river in Europe. Domestic Animals. The same as those of Britain. In Hungary and Galicia cattle-raising is extensively pursued, and in the mountains large herds of goats are reared. Climate. Various, but generally healthy. Pro. In the mountain districts in the N. the produce is nearly the same as in Britain; in the S. maize, millet, mulberries, and grapes are produced. The Hungarian wine, called Tokay, is deemed the finest in the world; and the hops of Bohemia are considered of the very best quality. In Lombardy the mulberry-tree is extensively cultivated for the support of the silkworm. As a matter of course, in the high Alps there is much land that cannot be reduced into productiveness; but in Lombardy, Galicia, and Hungary, the soil is as rich as any in Europe. Minerals. Abundant and valuable; comprising gold, silver, copper, iron, native steel, quicksilver, lead, coal, salt, marble, and precious stones. Transylvania may be pronounced the gold region, and Hungary the silver. Copper in both Hungary and Moravia; iron and coal in Styria, Carinthia, Carniola, Hungary, Bohemia, and Moravia; lead and quicksilver in Carinthia and Carniola; native steel in Styria; and salt in Transylvania, Galicia, Upper Austria, and Hungary. The Bohemian carbuncle and the Hungarian opal are both much esteemed; and the chalcedony, emerald, jasper, ruby, amethyst, cornelian, and beryl are frequently found. Marble abounds in most of the provinces. Race. Sclavonic, German, Latin, and Asiatic. M. Czoernig, an Austrian statistician, estimates their division, in round numbers, thus:—The German races, including Austrians proper, and the bulk of the inhabitants of the Tyrol, Bohemia, Moravia, and Transylvania, 8,000,000; the Sclavonic, including the Czechs of Bohemia, the Poles, Croats, and other races, 15,000,000; the Latin, of which the principal inhabit the Italian states, 8,000,000; and the races of Asiatic origin, 6,000,000, of whom the Hungarian Magyars number about 5,000,000. The remainder of the population is composed of Armenians, Jews, gipsies, and various other races. Towns. The principal are Vienna, Linz, Innspruck, Graetz, Laybach, Trieste, Prague, Brunn, Lemberg, Buda, Klausenburg, Peterwardein, Zara, Milan, and Venice. In 1840 there were 795 towns, 2,315 boroughs, and 69,002 villages. Manf. Silk, linen, cotton, and woollen cloths, hardware, paper, and glass are the principal. COMMERCE. Not very great. Exp. Wool and woollen goods, silk in its raw, spun, and manufactured states, cotton goods, fine linens, and metals. Imp. Sugar, and other colonial produce, dye-stuffs, yarns, and olive-oil. Army. The peace establishment is 414,000, and the war establishment is from 700,000 to 800,000 men. Navy. Small, not carrying more than 800 guns. Rel. Roman Catholic; but there is a universal toleration. Gov. An hereditary monarchy, by order of primogeniture, in the male, and, failing it, in the female line; but nearly all the provinces have independent peculiarities and distinct usages. Pop. about 38,000,000, thus distributed:—Austria proper, 2,600,000; Hungary, 8,200,000; Tyrol, 1,000,000; Styria, 1,200,000; Bohemia, 4,600,000; Moravia and Silesia, 2,200,000; Illyria, 1,300,000; Galicia, 5,000,000; Croatia, 900,000; Transylvania, 2,200,000; the Military Frontier, 1,100,000; Servia and the Banat, 1,600,000; Dalmatia, 400,000; and the Italian provinces, 5,000,000. To these numbers we may add the army and navy, about 800,000. Lat. mostly between 45° and 51° 2′ N. Lon. 8° 35′ and 26° 35′ E.—The Austrian empire has been denominated the "Campania of Germany," and takes its name from "Oesterreich," or eastern kingdom, which word designated the limit of the emperor Charlemagne's dominions. After the death of Charlemagne, it became a dependency of Bavaria, and then came into the possession of the counts of Babenberg, in whose family it continued till 1246. On the demise of the last of this line, a war broke out, and, in 1276, Rudolph of Hapsburg, emperor of Germany, from whom sprang the present royal race, conquered Austria, and, seven years afterwards, invested his son Albert with the kingly dignity. In 1437 Albert II. was elected emperor of the German empire; and from that date till 1806, when Francis II. laid down the imperial dignity, and the great German empire was dissolved, it remained in the Hapsburg family. In 1526, Ferdinand I. became possessed, by marriage, of the kingdom of Hungary. The partition treaty of 1772, by which Poland was dismembered, added Galicia to the dominions of the empress Maria Theresa, and, in 1778, the Bakowine, or south-eastern portion, was ceded by the sultan. The Italian provinces were annexed in 1713 by the treaty of Utrecht; but many vicissitudes occurred, and it was not till the treaties of Paris and Vienna, in 1814 and 1815, that this great empire, formed of so many antagonistic elements, was consolidated. During the continental revolutionary movements of 1848, the emperor Ferdinand abdicated in favour of his son Francis Joseph, who, in 1849, gave his subjects a new liberal constitution. This constitution, however, was set aside at the commencement of 1852, since which period ministers have been responsible to the emperor alone, who is, to all intents and purposes, an absolute monarch.

AUTAUGA, aw-taw'-ga, a county of Alabama, U.S., with a rich and fertile soil. Pop. about 16,000, of whom one half are slaves.

AUTOLYCUS, aw-tol'-i-kus, a son of Mercury, by Chione, a daughter of Dædalion, and one of the Argonauts. His exploits as a thief have been greatly celebrated. He stole the flocks of his neighbours, and mingled them with his own, after he had changed their marks. He appropriated some of those of Sisyphus, son of Æolus; but Sisyphus knew his own by a mark which he had made under their feet, which piece of cleverness greatly pleased Autolycus.

AUTUN, o'-tu(r), an ancient town of France, 28 miles from Châlons-sur-Saône, on the Arroux, in the department of the Saône and Loire. It is picturesquely situate at the foot of a lofty range of mountains covered with wood. It has a fine cathedral, founded in the 11th century, a museum, library, and other buildings of interest. Manf. Carpets and paper; and has a trade in cattle, timber, and hemp. Pop. about 12,000.—Julius Cæsar mentions this place under the name of Bibracte, and under Augustus, its name was changed to Augustodunum, of which there are some fine ruins. It was the see of the great French diplomatist Talleyrand.

AUVERGNE, o-vairn', an ancient province of France, now chiefly divided into the departments of the Puy-de-Dôme, in Lower Auvergne, and the Cantal, in Upper Auvergne. Desc. Mountainous, a branch of the Cevennes mountains occupying a great portion of the territory. The culminating points of some of these are Puy-de-Dôme, 4,806 feet; Cantal, 6,093; and Mont-d'Or, 6,188. Many of them have the appearance of being extinct volcanoes.

AUVERGNE, Theophilus de la Tour d', a distinguished French soldier and scholar, who early entered the service, distinguishing himself by his military bearing and by his devotion to study. He was present in many actions during the American war, and was offered a pension by the king of Spain, which, however, he refused. The French revolution found him a captain, and he was one of the first volunteers to defend the territory of France against its enemies, without any wish for promotion; and it was only as captain of the longest standing that he accepted the command of all the grenadier companies, called the Infernal Column. In every conflict he was ever foremost, and he introduced more generally the bayonet into the French army. He was taken prisoner by the English, and after regaining his liberty, resumed his career by replacing a simple conscript, the son of an old and feeble friend. He served in many battles under Bonaparte, who offered him higher rank, but which he refused, and was declared by Napoleon "the first grenadier of the French republic." B. 1743; killed at the battle of Newburg, 1800.—He is the author of a French-Celtic dictionary, a glossary of forty-five languages, and other philological works of merit. The following anecdote is told of him:—A person connected with the government was boasting of his influence, and desired to know what he could do for Auvergne, whose clothes were in a deplorable condition. "What do you wish to have, the command of a battalion, or a regiment? you have only to speak." "Oh no!" said La Tour, "I only want a pair of shoes."

AUXERRE, okes-air', an ancient town of France, department of the Yonne, on the river Yonne, 90 miles from Paris. It has a fine Gothic cathedral, an ancient palace, and an abbey in which are the tombs of the early counts of Auxerre. Manf. Woollens, serges, druggets, blankets, hosiery, hats, yarns, violin-strings, and earthenware. Pop. about 12,000.—This was the ancient capital of the Auxerrois, or county of Auxerre, of which the district of that name is now the chief part.

AUXON, okes-ong', a town of France, on a river of the same name, department of the Aube, 15 miles from Troyes. Manf. Chiefly hosiery. Pop. between 2,000 and 3,000.

AUXONNE, okes-one', a town of France, on the Saône, 18 miles from Dijon. It has a castle, is fortified, the seat of a court of commerce, and has an artillery school. Manf. Woollens, serges, muslins, and hardware. It trades also in fruit, wine, brandy, flour, grain, coal, wood, and iron. Pop. about 5,000.—It was the capital of a small sovereignty, the monarchs of which took the title of Sires d'Auxonne.

AUZOUT, Adrian, o-zoo', a French mathematician, who is said to have invented the micrometer, which is still in use amongst astronomers to measure the apparent diameter of celestial bodies, and his treatise on which was printed in 1667. B. at Rouen; D. 1691.—He was the first who thought of applying the telescope to the astronomical quadrant.

AVA, a'-va, a chief city of the Burmese empire, on the Irrawady. It is skilfully fortified, but many of its defences are in ill condition. The palace is of modern date, and possesses richness and beauty in its details. The habitations here are far better than those of Bengal and neighbouring states, being more generally elevated above the ground. The country round Ava is well cultivated; but there is little industry in the town, which is gradually deteriorating. Pop. from 25,000 to 30,000. Lat. 21° 51′ N. Lon. 95° 58′ E. (See BURMAH.)

AVAL, AWAL, or BAHREIN, a'-val, the largest of the Bahrein islands, in the Gulf of Persia. Ext. 30 miles long and 12 wide. Desc. Hilly towards its centre. Pro. Wheat, barley, dates, and other fruits. Pop. uncertain; perhaps 40,000. Lat. 26° 12′ N. Lon. 50° 40′ E.—In the sixteenth century this island was occupied by the Portuguese, who, in 1622, were expelled by the Persians. These again were driven from the island by the Arabs, who, in 1790, became its possessors. Since 1819, the fishermen along its coasts have been protected by British cruisers.

AVALON, a'-va-long, a town of France, department of the Yonne, 26 miles from Auxerre. It is well built, and has a court of commerce, a communal college, and an agricultural society. Manf. Woollen cloths, paper, and staves. It has some fulling-mills and tanneries, besides a trade in wine, coals, and grain. Pop. about 5,000.—It is the ancient Aballo.

AVALOS, Ferdinand Francis d', a'-va-los, marquis of Pescara, a Neapolitan who served with great distinction in the army of Charles V., and in 1512 was taken prisoner at the battle of Ravenna. He beguiled the hours of captivity by writing a "Dialogue on Love," which he dedicated to his wife, the beautiful and accomplished Vittoria Colonna. On being released, he again entered into active service, and contributed greatly to the gaining of the battle of Vicenza over Alviano and the Venetian forces. Subsequently he took Milan, gave up Como to pillage, and in 1522, in the campaign against the French, assisted in relieving Padua, and was present at Lodi and Pizzigetthone, as well as at the reduction of Cremona. In 1524 he played a foremost part in the battle of Pavia, which was so disastrous to Francis I., and his conduct to the captive king showed much magnanimity. He revealed to Charles V. a plot of the Italians to drive out the Spaniards, and soon after died. B. 1496; D. at Milan, 1525.—There are others of this name.

AVARES, AWARES, or OAR, a-var-es, a town and district of Persia, in the province of Lesghistan, in the eastern part of the Caucasus. Area, 2,287 miles. Desc. Mountainous, and infested by predatory tribes, who are nominally subject to Russia. Pop. uncertain: the province is said to contain 30,000; but, as they live mostly by plunder and the chase, this cannot be ascertained with accuracy.

AVATCHA, a-vat-cha, a spacious bay on the eastern coast of Kamchatka, into which the rivers Avatcha and Paratounka discharge. The entrance is in lat. 53° 51′ N., lon. 158° 49′ E. There is in this bay a mountain of the same name, which is volcanic, and, in 1827, was in a state of violent eruption. Height, upwards of 9,000 feet. The town of Avatcha also stood here, but its name was changed to Petropaulovski, which has been strongly fortified, and was, in 1854, unsuccessfully attacked by a small squadron of French and English vessels.

AVEBURY, ABURY, or ABERY, ai'-bur-e, a parish and village of Wiltshire, 29 miles from Salisbury. Area, 5,450 acres. Pop. 768.—In its neighbourhood are the remains of what was once the largest Celtic or Druidical structure in Europe.

AVEIRO, a-vai'-e-ro, a seaport-town of Beira, Portugal, 33 miles from Oporto. It trades in fish, salt, oil, wine, and oranges. Pop. 5,900.

AVELLINO, a'-vel-e'-no, a town of Naples, capital of the Principato Ultra. It is mostly composed of narrow, crooked, and gloomy streets, with a cathedral of little beauty. Manf. Paper, woollens, sausages, and maccaroni. The neighbourhood abounds in chestnuts and hazel-nuts. Pop. about 15,000.—In 1694 and 1731 this town suffered considerably by earthquakes. Not far from it is the famous Val di Gazzano, where the Samnites forced a Roman army to lay down their arms, and pass singly under the yoke, 321 B.C.

AVEN, or AVON, a name common to several rivers in England and Scotland. (See AVON.)

AVENCHES, a-vanzh', a town in Switzerland, 18 miles from Berne. Pop. 1,500.—This was the ancient Aventicum, of which there are some remains, and the capital of the Helvetii, which became a flourishing Roman colony, and was destroyed in 447 by the Huns.

AVENING, av-ning, a parish of Gloucester, 3 miles from Ledbury. Area, 4,660 acres. Pop. 2,300, chiefly employed in woollen-cloth weaving.

AVERDY, Clement Charles de l', a-vair-de', a French statesman and finance minister under Louis XV. He was counsellor of parliament; but, through his propositions for reform, lost his position, and, in 1764, received his dismissal. He retired to his estate, where he employed himself in agricultural pursuits, but was guillotined in 1793 on an absurd charge. B. at Paris, 1723.

AVERNUS, ă-ver'-nus, 'without a bird,' a lake of Campania, near Baiæ, the waters of which were so unwholesome and putrid, that no birds ever visited its banks. The ancients made it the entrance of hell. In the time of Virgil, a communication between it and the neighbouring Lucrine lake was made by Agrippa; but, in 1538, the latter was filled by a volcanic eruption, when Monte Nuovo rose in its place, rendering the Averno again a separate lake.—It is now called Averno (a-vair'-no), and on its banks, instead of pestilential marshes, are now beautiful gardens and vineyards. The grotto of the Cumæan sibyl is still to be seen here.—It may be observed, that all lakes whose stagnated waters were putrid and offensive to the smell, were indiscriminately called Averna.

AVERROES, or IBN ROSCHID, a-ver-o'-es, an Arabian philosopher and physician, who succeeded his father in the chief magistracy of Corduba, the capital of the Moorish possessions in Spain. He was afterwards made chief judge in Morocco, and having appointed deputies there, he returned to Spain. The freedom of his opinions, however, gave offence to the more zealous Mussulmans, and he was degraded from his office and thrown into prison; but on doing penance, and making a recantation, he was released. D. at Morocco, 1206. The admiration of Averroes for Aristotle was almost enthusiastic, and his commentaries on that philosopher's works procured him the name of the commentator. He also wrote a treatise on the art of physic, an epitome of Ptolemy's "Almagest," and a treatise on astrology.

AVERSA, a-vair'-sa, a town of Naples, in the Terra di Lavoro, 8 miles from Naples. It is situate in a very fine plain, covered with vineyards and orange-trees, and is a sort of nursery for the artists and artisans of the kingdom. Its sweetmeats are in great repute in Naples. Pop. about 16,000.—This place had formerly a castle, which served for an occasional palatial residence of the kings of Naples: it was replaced by a convent, in which Andreas of Hungary, the husband of Queen Joanna I., was strangled, in September, 1345. There is here a celebrated lunatic asylum.

AVES, or BIRD ISLANDS, ai'-vees, a small group of the Lesser Antilles, belonging to Holland, in the West Indies. Lat. 15° 30′ N. Lon. 63° 15′ W.—These islands received their name from the great number of birds which frequent them.

AVESBURY, Robert of, aivz'-bur-e, an English historian who wrote the history of the reign of Edward III. as far as 1356. D. 1356.—This personage styles himself registrar of the archbishop of Canterbury's court. The principal excellence of his work consists in the accuracy of its dates, and the simplicity with which he works his facts into a plain narrative.

AVESNES, or AVENNES, a-vain', a fortified town on the river Helpe, in the department of the Nord, France, 50 miles from Lille. It is generally well built, and has a cathedral with a tower 300 feet high. Manf. Hosiery, serges, and soap. It has some tanneries, breweries, and marble-sawing works. Pop. about 3,000.—The name of several other smaller places in France.

AVEYRON, or AVEIRON, a'-vai-rong', a department in the S. of France, bounded N. by the department of the Cantal, N.E. by Lozère, E. by Gard, S.E. by Herault, S.W. by Tarn, and W. by Lot. Ext. 70 miles long, with an average breadth of 40. Area, 3,385 square miles. Desc. Mountainous, especially in the N., where are numerous offshoots of the Cevennes and Cantal ranges. The W. consists chiefly of plains, well cultivated and productive, whilst the S. may be regarded as a high table-land connecting the Cevennes with the mountains of Cannes. Rivers. The Lot, with its feeders the Truyère and the Dourdon; the Aveyron, with its affluents the Serre, Alson, and Caude on the right, and on the left the Viaur, the Ceron, and the Verre; the Tarn, with its tributaries the Dourbie, the Lorgue, and the Rance. Pro. Oats, rye, wheat, truffles, chestnuts; and, where the soil is good, vineyards are planted. A great many horses, mules, and cattle are raised. Goats, sheep, and swine are numerous; and oxen and cows are used for ploughing. Minerals. Silver, copper, zinc, antimony, sulphur, alum, coal, iron, marble, rock-crystal, serpentine, marl, and gypsum. The department is rich in coal-mines. Towns. There are five arrondissements, of which the capitals are Rodez, Espalion, Milhau, Saint-Affrique, and Villefranche. Manf. Woollen stuffs, cotton goods, paper, leather, and iron wares. Pop. upwards of 395,000. Lat. between 43° 41′ and 44° 45′ N. Lon. between 1° 50′ and 3° 26′ E.

AVEYRON, a rapid river of France, rising from the springs of the Cevennes mountains, and after a course of 130 miles, falling into the Tarn a little above Moissac.

AVIGLIANO, a-veel'-ye-a'-no, a town of Piedmont, 11 miles from Turin. In the neighbourhood of this town the finest and largest oxen in the kingdom are raised. Pop. 9,000.—In 1824, from a continuous fall of rain, a landslip carried away a considerable portion of the town.

AVIGNON, a-veen'-yong, a large and beautiful city of France, the capital of the department Vaucluse, 76 miles by railway from Marseilles. It is situate on the left bank of the Rhone, just above the junction of the Durance, and has narrow streets, but contains elegant churches and other public buildings. The palace formerly occupied by the popes is built in the old Gothic style, on the southern slope of the rock of Doms; and around the town there runs a fine avenue of trees, fully three miles long. Manf. Silk stuffs, saltpetre, oil of vitriol, and aquafortis, with several printing-establishments and copper-works. Its trade consists of wine, brandy, almonds, dried fruits, olives, oil, saffron, truffles, corn, and wool, all the products of the district in which it stands. This territory was formerly called the state or sovereignty of Avignon. It belonged to the Papal States till the period of the French revolution, when, in 1791, it was conquered by France. Pop. about 35,000.—Avignon, while under the dominion of the popes, was a much more interesting town than at present. It then contained sixty churches, among which was that of the Cordeliers, which contained the tombs of Laura de Sade and of the Laura of Petrarch. Its site is now converted into a fruit-garden and a cypress-tree indicates the spot where Laura is interred.—A railway connects the city with Cette, and the great trunk-line connects it with Lyons and Paris. Constant communication is kept up by steamers with Marseilles, Lyons, and Arles.

AVILA, a-ve'-la, a town of Old Castile, Spain, on the river Adaja, 53 miles from Madrid. This was once one of the richest cities in Spain, but it is now in a state of rapid decay. Manf. Chiefly woollen and cotton goods. Pop. 5,000.

AVILA, a province of Old Castile, near the centre of the peninsula. Area, 4,917 square miles. Desc. Level in the N. and mountainous in the S. Rivers. The Alberche, Adaja, and several smaller streams. Pro. Grapes, mulberries, and other fruits, and the usual cerealia. A great many sheep, pigs, and horned cattle are reared. Minerals. Not plentiful; but silver, copper, lead, iron, and coal are found and partially wrought. Manf. Linen, silk, cloth, paper, earthenware, hardware, and leather. Pop. 133,000.

AVILA, Louis d', a Spanish historian, and commander of the order of Alcantara. He wrote the history of the war carried on by Charles V. against the German Protestants, and "Memoirs of the War in Africa." Lived in the 16th century.—Charles deemed himself fortunate in having such an able chronicler of the remarkable events by which his reign was characterized. There are others of this name mentioned in Spanish history.

AVILA, Sancho d', a Spanish commander, who served under the duke of Alva and Requesens in the Netherlands, and equalled the ferocious Alva in his atrocities. He defeated Louis of Nassau, and gave up Antwerp to what is called the "Spanish fury." He was killed at the siege of Maestricht, 1579.

AVIZ, a-veez', a walled town of Portugal, on the river Aviz, 27 miles from Portalègre. Pop. 1,415.—This was the principal place of the order of Military Knights of Aviz, founded by Alphonso I. in 1146.

AVOCA, or OVOCA, a-vo'-ka, a valley and river of county Wicklow, Ireland, celebrated as the scene of one of the many beautiful lyrics of Thomas Moore.

AVOLA, a-vo'-la, a seaport-town of Sicily, 12 miles from Syracuse. Manf. Home-grown sugar, and it does a considerable trade in cattle, corn, fruit, and oil. Pop. about 7,000.—This town occupies the supposed site of the ancient Ibla, and was built after an earthquake, which, in 1693, destroyed the ancient Avola.

AVOLONA, or AVLONA, av-lo'-na, a town and seaport of Albania, on a gulf of the same name, in the Adriatic. It is defended on its south side by the rocky fortress of Canina. Pop. about 8,000, consisting of Christians, Turks, and Jews. Lat. 40° 27′ N. Lon. 19° 26′ E.

AVON, ăv'-on, a name common to several rivers in both England and Scotland. 1. A river of Scotland, which rises in the county of Banff, and falls into the Spey. 2. Another in the county of Lanark, which falls into the Clyde, near Hamilton. 3. Another which falls into the Frith of Forth west of Borrowstounness. 4. A river of England, in Wiltshire, which falls into the English Channel. 5. Another of South Wales, which runs into the Bristol Channel. 6. Another of North Wales, which flows into the Irish Sea.

AVON, LITTLE, a river of England, which runs into the Severn near Berkeley.

AVON, LOWER, a river in Wiltshire, which flows into the Severn.

AVON, UPPER, a river which flows into the Severn at Tewkesbury.

AVON, a river of Nova Scotia, which falls into the Atlantic, eastward of Halifax.—It is the name of some small places in the United States.

AVONDALE, or AVENDALE, ăv'-on-dail, a parish of Lanarkshire, Scotland, not far from Strathaven. Area, 40,000 acres. Pop. about 7,000. Here, at the battle of Drumclog, fought June 1, 1679, Claverhouse was defeated by the Covenanters.

AVRANCHES, av'-ranzh, a town of Lower Normandy, France, in the department of Manche, 30 miles from St. Lô. It has a cathedral church, which was founded in 1120, a castle, and an episcopal palace. Manf. Chiefly lace; but it trades in grain, flax, hemp, cattle, butter, wheat, salt, and cider. Pop. about 9,000.—In the cathedral the stone is preserved on which Henry II. did penance for the murder of Thomas à Becket.

AWE, LOCH, aw. (See ARGYLESHIRE.)

AX, aks, a town of France, department of the Ariège, 20 miles from Foix. Much frequented on account of its thermal springs. Pop. 2,000.

AX, or AXE, ăks, a river of England, which falls into the sea a little below Axmouth.—Another which falls into the Bristol Channel, about 8 miles lower down.

AXBRIDGE, ăks'-bridge, a town and parish in Somersetshire, on the AX, 11 miles from Glastonbury. Pop. about 1,000.

AXEL, aks'-el, a town of Holland, 27 miles from Antwerp, and the capital of a canton of the same name, in an island in the Scheldt. Pop. 2,200, chiefly devoted to agricultural pursuits.

AXHOLME, ISLE OF, ăks-home, Lincolnshire, is formed by the rivers Trent, Idle, and Don. Ext. 17 miles long and 5 broad. Area, 47,800 acres. Desc. Fertile, and large quantities of hemp, flax, rape, and turnip-seed are cultivated. Pop. upwards of 12,000.—In 1747 the body of a woman was found buried in a peat moss in this island, and, as she had antique sandals on her feet, it is supposed that she had lain there for ages. Her hair, her nails, and her skin showed scarcely any signs of decay.

AXMINSTER, ăks'-min-ster, a parish and town of Devonshire, on the AX, 26 miles from Exmouth. Area of parish, 6,590 acres. Manf. Carpets in imitation of those of Turkey, &c., druggets, woollen cloths, &c. Pop. about 3,000. Its church is a very ancient edifice, and contains some antique monuments. It was founded by Athelstan to commemorate a battle fought with the Danes in the neighbourhood.

AXMOUTH, ăks'-mouth, a village and parish of Devonshire, at the mouth of the AX, 2 miles from Colyton. Area, 4,280 acres. Pop. about 700.—In 1839, a great landslip, causing a chasm of more than a mile and a half long, occurred in this neighbourhood, in consequence of the peculiar structure of the lias formation, the great belt of which here abuts upon the coast.

AXTEL, Daniel, äks-tel, a colonel in the Parliamentary army during the civil war, who was originally a grocer, but becoming a follower of the Puritans, was persuaded to engage against the king. He had the principal charge of Charles I. on his trial, and behaved with singular brutality. He accompanied Cromwell to Ireland, where his courage procured him the governorship of Kilkenny. In 1659 he returned to England, to prevent, if possible, the restoration of Charles II. In 1660 he was seized by the royalists, tried for high treason, and executed.

AXUM, äks'-um, the ancient capital of Abyssinia, of which little remains, and which is situate about 85 miles from Antalo. The church of Axum appears to have been built in 1657, and is considered as the finest in the province of Tigré, except that of Chelicut.

AY, or AI, ai, a town of France, on the river Marne, celebrated for its champagne wine. Pop. 3,300.

AYACUCHO, a'-ya-koo'-cho, a town of Peru, in the department of the same name. Here, on December 9, 1824, the Spaniards were totally defeated by the Peruvians; and with this battle ended the dominion of Spain in America.

AYALA, Pedro Lopez de, a-ya'-la, the most popular of Spanish chroniclers, and a great favourite of Peter the Cruel, king of Castile, as well as of his three successors, Don Henry of Trastamare, Don John I., and Henry III. He was made prisoner at the battle of Najera, in 1367, brought to England, where he was cast into a dark dungeon, and fettered with chains. His sorrows and sufferings in this state of "durance vile" are described in his poems. He was set at liberty after the payment of a large ransom; and, returning to Castile, was again actively engaged in the service of the crown. B. 1332; D. at Calahorra, 1407.—He was the contemporary of Froissart, and his chronicle embraces that period of history when Spain was most nearly connected with the political action of France and England. It is wanting in the picturesque chivalric painting of Froissart, but it is deemed honest and trustworthy.

AYAMONTE, a'-ya-mon'-tai, a fortified town of Andalusia, Spain, at the mouth of the Guadiana. Manf. Principally soap, but a trade is done in fish. Pop. about 6,000.

AYCLIFFE, ai'-klif, a village and parish of Durham, 5 miles from Darlington. Area, 10,490 acres. Pop. 1,366.—It is a station at the crossing of the Clarence and the Great North of England railways.

AYESHA, ai-e'-sha, wife of Mahomet, and daughter of Abubeker, one of the first and warmest supporters of the prophet. Though she bore her husband no children, yet he loved her better than his other wives; and in his last illness had himself conveyed to her house, where he died in her arms. She opposed the succession of Ali, and levied an army against him. After a severe contest she was taken prisoner, but was treated by the conqueror with great lenity. D. 677.

AYLESBURY, ailz'-bur-e, a borough and market-town of Bucks, 15 miles from Buckingham, situate in the fertile vale of Aylesbury. The parish church is a large cruciform structure, combining the Early English and the Perpendicular styles of architecture. Manf. Chiefly lace and straw-plait. Pop. 6,081. It is a station on the London and North-Western Railway.

AYLESFORD, ailz'-ford, a town and parish of Kent, on the Medway, which is here crossed by a stone bridge, 3 miles from Maidstone. Area, 3,330 acres. Pop. 1,487.—In this parish is the cromlech called Kit's-cot-house, which is supposed to indicate the burying-place of Catigern, who, in 455, was here slain, with his enemy Horsa, in the third battle fought between the Saxons and the Britons.

AYLMER, John, ail'-mer, an English prelate, who was tutor to Lady Jane Grey. In 1553 he was made archdeacon of Stow, in Lincolnshire, and exerted himself strenuously against popery. On the accession of Mary he was forced to leave his country, but found a quiet retreat amidst the beautiful scenery of Zurich. Whilst here he answered a pamphlet published by the celebrated John Knox against government by women. When Queen Elizabeth came to the throne, he returned to his native country; and in 1576 was made bishop of London. He was a very diligent prelate, and severe against the Puritans, for which he has been severely censured by their writers; but it is said that he was learned in the languages, a deep divine, and a ready disputant. B. in Norfolk, 1521; D. at Fulham, 1594.—An instance of the humour with which this prelate roused an inattentive audience whilst preaching, is given by Wood. "When his auditory grew dul and inattentive, he would, with some pretty and unexpected conceit, move them to attention. Among the rest was—He read a long text in Hebrew; whereupon all seemed to listen what would come after such strange words, as if they had taken it for some conjuration; but he showed their folly that, when he spake English, whereby they might be instructed and edified, they neglected and hearkened not to it; and now when he read Hebrew, which they understood no word of, they seemed careful and attentive." Something of this sort might be advantageously practised by some of our modern divines when they find their audiences becoming inappreciative of their discourses.

AYLOFFE, Sir Joseph, Bart., ail'-lof, of Framfield, in Sussex, an eminent antiquary, and fellow of the Royal and Antiquarian societies. In 1737 he was appointed secretary to the commissioners for building Westminster bridge, and became one of the keepers of the state papers in the Paper-office. B. at Framfield, Sussex, 1709; D. 1781.—Sir Joseph was called the Montfaucon of England, and his wide and accurate knowledge of our municipal rights and national antiquities, and the agreeable manner in which he communicated what he knew to his friends and the public, made his death be sincerely regretted by all who had the pleasure of his acquaintance. He printed in 1772 calendars of the ancient charters, &c. in the Tower of London. He also edited "Leland's Collectanea," in 9 vols., "Liber Niger Scaccari," and "Hearne's Curious Discourses," besides other works. There are many curious papers of his in the "Archæologia."

AYMAR, or AIMAR, James, ail'-mar, a French impostor, who gained considerable wealth at the close of the 17th century by pretending to have a divining-rod, whereby he could discover hidden treasure. The fraud being detected, he returned to his former obscurity; but it gave occasion to De Vallemont's learned book on the powers of the divining-rod. B. at St. Vernau, Dauphiné, 1662.

AYR, air, a river of Scotland, which rises on the borders of Lanarkshire, and, after a westward course of 33 miles, falls into the sea, and forms a harbour at the town of Ayr.

AYR, a royal borough and seaport of Ayrshire, of which it is the capital, situate at the mouth of the river of the same name, 30 miles by railway from Glasgow. The town is remarkably clean, well paved, and lighted with gas. The "Twa Brigs" of Burns connect the town with the suburbs, Newton and Wallace-town, both on the right bank of the river. In the High street there is an erection called Wallace's Tower, standing on the site of an old structure, in which it is said that Wallace occasionally lived. It contains several handsome buildings, besides two parish churches and other religious houses for the various denominations in the town. Manf. Ship-building, rope and sail-making. It has a considerable trade in Glasgow woven goods, carpets, leather, iron, and coal. Pop. 9,115; with its suburbs, 17,624. Lat. 55° 27′ N. Lon. 4° 37′ W. The Glasgow and South-western Railway connects Ayr with all the principal lines of Scotland and England.

AYRSHIRE, air-shire, a maritime county of Scotland, bounded N. by Renfrewshire, E. by the counties of Lanark and Dumfries, S. by Galloway, and W. by the Irish Channel and Frith of Clyde. Ext. 70 miles, with a varying breadth of from 12 to 22. Area, 668,800 acres. Desc. Hilly to a considerable extent, but much of the county is fertile and productive. The insular rock of Ailsa, and the two Cumbraes, belong to it. Rivers. Besides the Frith of Clyde, which washes for a considerable extent the confines of the county, there are the rivers Stinchar, Lugar, Girvan, Doon, Irvine, Garnock, and Ayr; from which last the whetstone so useful to mechanics is obtained; and also several lakes. Most of these rivers rise in the shire, and fall into the sea or the Clyde. Minerals. Copper, lead, and iron are found; also black-lead and antimony. There is vast abundance of coal of different kinds, in successive seams, limestone, freestone of the best quality, agates, porphyry, jasper, and calcareous petrifactions. Manf. Woollen, cotton, muslin, thread, and iron. Towns. The principal are Ayr, Kilmarnock, Irvine, Maybole, and Ardrossan. Pop. 189,858.—In the parish of Alloway, in this shire, Burns the poet was born, in 1759. The cottage stands by the roadside, about 2 miles from Ayr, and not far from the "auld haunted kirk" of Alloway, immortalized in the poem of "Tam o' Shanter." Many of the localities of the county are memorable in history, but Burns has given them a poetical celebrity, which has spread them to the ends of the earth. The Lugar recalls his "Nannie O," in which is one of the most beautiful, and at the same time simple similes, illustrative of the purity of a female, to be found in any poet:—

"The opening gowan wat wi' dew, Nae purer is than Nannie O!"

And the "Braes o' Doon" are hallowed in the memory of every mind that can appreciate the pathetic in song.

AYR HEAD, or POINT OF, the northern point of the Isle of Man, on which is a revolving light, 106 feet high. Lat. 54° 24′ 59″ N. Lon. 4° 21′ 59″ W.

AYSCOUGH, Samuel, ais'-ko(r)f, an industrious compiler, who from being the servant of a miller, obtained a situation in the British Museum, where his abilities began to be respected and his salary increased, till he was appointed assistant-librarian. Entering into orders, he obtained the curacy of St. Giles-in-the-Fields, and in 1790 was appointed to preach the Fairchild lecture on Whit-Tuesday, at Shoreditch church, before the Royal Society, which he continued to do till 1804. B. at Nottingham, 1745; D. at the British Museum, 1804. This person seems to have been gifted with the powers of labouring at the driest of all occupations,—that of index-making. He assisted in the regulation of the records in the Tower, and compiled a catalogue of the MSS. in the British Museum; an index to 56 vols. of the "Gentleman's Magazine," to the "Monthly Review," the "British Critic," to Shakspeare, and other works. He was also the author of "Remarks on the Letters of an American Farmer." Not long before his death, the lord chancellor gave him the living of Cudham, in Kent. In reference to the "American Farmer," Charles Lamb, in 1805, thus writes in a letter:—"Oh, tell Hazlitt not to forget to send me the 'American Farmer.' I dare say it is not so good a book as he fancies; but a book's a book."

AYSCUE, Sir George, ais'-ku, a brave admiral, descended from an ancient family in Lincolnshire, and knighted by Charles I. He early declared for the Commonwealth, and distinguished himself greatly in the wars against the Dutch. In 1651 he and Admiral Blake reduced the Scilly Isles, and afterwards, proceeding to the West Indies, Sir George effected the conquest of Barbadoes and other islands. After the Restoration, he was appointed rear-admiral of the Blue, and in 1666 he hoisted his flag on board the Royal Prince, the finest ship then in the world. He was engaged in the great fight with the Dutch, in 1666, which lasted four days; but, on the third day, striking on the Galloper Shoal, his crew forced him to yield to the enemy. After remaining in Holland a prisoner for some time, he was permitted to return to England, where he spent the remainder of his days in retirement.

AYSGARTH, ais'-garth, a parish in the North Riding of Yorkshire, 8 miles from Middleham. Area, 79,980 acres. Pop. 5,635.

AYTON, ai'-ton, a village and parish of Berwickshire, on the Eye, in which there are vestiges of supposed ancient camps. Pop. 1,959.—It is a station on the North British Railway.

AYTON, a name common to several parishes of England, with small populations.

AYTON, or AYTOUN, Sir Robert, a native of Fifeshire, in Scotland, and the author of poems in the Latin, Greek, French, and English languages. He was employed, both at home and abroad, by James I. and Charles I.; and Aubrey says that "he was acquainted with all the wits of his time in England." He was very intimate with Hobbes, as well as with rare Ben Jonson; both of whom were employed as Aristarchi by the philosopher, while drawing up his dedicatory epistle to his translation of Thucydides. It is affirmed that the poems attributed to him in his own vernacular were greatly admired by Burns, who founded his "Auld Lang Syne" upon one of them. B. 1570; D. at Whitehall, 1638.

AYTOUN, William Edmonstoune, professor of literature and belles-lettres in the University of Edinburgh, and editor of "Blackwood's Magazine." To this celebrated periodical he was a long time a contributor, under the nom de plume of Augustus Dunshunner; and married the daughter of John Wilson, the former editor of Blackwood, and the distinguished Christopher North of his own pages. He is a poet of the very finest feather, with a strength of wing that knows no faltering in its flight. His "Execution of Montrose" and his "Burial-march of Dundee" are two noble historical ballads. His "Lays of the Scottish Cavaliers" are chiefly illustrations of the stirring scenes of the mediæval history of Scotland, and place before us, in vivid representation, some of the most striking incidents and events that form the narrative of the best historical pens. B. 1813.—Besides his "Lays of the Scottish Cavaliers," Professor Aytoun has written "Fermilian, a Spasmodic Tragedy," designed to ridicule a false and extravagant taste in some of the modern followers of the muses; "Poland, and other poems;" "Bothwell," a long poem; "The Life and Times of Richard Cœur de Lion;" "Ballads of Scotland," &c.

AZARA, Don Felix de, a-tha'-ra, a Spanish soldier, who, being sent to Paraguay to define the limits of the Spanish possessions there, undertook to make a map of the country, on which he laboured for thirteen years. In accomplishing this object he had to encounter many difficulties; but succeeded in executing his task with credit. In 1801 he was recalled to Spain. He subsequently became a member of the Council for Indian Affairs under Charles IV. of Spain. B. at Barbunales, in Aragon, 1746; D. at Aragon, 1811.

AZARA, Don José Nicolas de, agent for the ecclesiastical affairs of Spain at the court of Rome, in 1760. He was acquainted with all the distinguished men in art, science, or literature at Rome, and was the especial friend and patron of Mengs. When Napoleon I. threatened to advance on Rome, in 1796, Azara repaired to his head-quarters and prevented him; not, however, without having made immense sacrifices. After this his influence declined at the papal court. D. at Barbunales, 1731; D. 1803.—He wrote the life of Mengs, and translated Middleton's life of Cicero.

AZARIAH, or UZZIAH, az-a-ri'-a, king of Judah, succeeded Amaziah about 810 B.C. He began his reign with great reputation, but at the close of it turned idolater, and died a leper.—There are a considerable number of persons of this name in the Scripture, but the most celebrated was the above king.

AZAUGHAL, a-zaw'-gal, a town of Spanish Estremadura, 24 miles from Badajoz. It is inclosed in a valley by three hills. Pop. about 3,000, employed in the manufacture of brandy, weaving, and the pursuits of agriculture.

AZAY, a-zai, the name of several small parishes and towns in France.

AZCOITIA, ath-koi'-te-a, a town of Biscay, in Spain, at the foot of the mountain Itzarriz, 20 miles from Tolosa. Manf. Hardware and iron nails. There are some flour-mills in the neighbourhood, which is rich in the production of grain, fruits, chestnuts, and vegetables. Pop. 3,795.

AZERBIJAN, a'-zer-bi-jan', a fertile province of Persia, part of ancient Media. Area, 30,000 square miles. Desc. Mountainous, some of its ranges varying between 7,000 and 9,000 feet high; and one of its peaks, Mount Savalany, attaining an elevation of between 12,000 and 13,000 ft. Rivers. The Aras, or Araxes, and its affluent the Karasu, on the N.; the Kizil-Ozein, with its numerous tributaries, on the S.; and several others which fall in Lake Urmiah. Lakes. Urmiah, which, being salt, is one of the most remarkable features of the province. Pro. Maize, rye, barley, flax, hemp, madder, cotton, honey, wax, fruits, and grapes. A great number of horses, camels, cattle, and sheep are reared. Minerals. Iron, lead, copper, salt, saltpetre, and sulphur. Manf. Velvets, carpets, woollens, silk stuffs, arms, copper utensils, and some cutlery. There are several large tanneries, and dressing skins and furs is a general employment. Climate. Generally healthy, though intensely cold in the winter and hot in the summer and autumn months. Towns. The principal are Tabreez or Taurus, the capital, Meanna, Shebuster, Shar, Shelmust, Khoi, and Urmiah. This last is the birthplace of Zoroaster and Maragha. Pop. about 200,000. Lat. between 36° and 40° N. Lon. between 44° and 48° 44′ E.—On account of the grinding system of taxation pursued by the government, in 1832 a colony of 40,000 Armenians left this province and settled in the Russian territories. (AZERBIJAN is the same with ADERBEITZAN, which see.)

AZERGUE, BAHR-EL, or the BLUE RIVER, a'-zer-goo, the principal stream of Abyssinia, which, after a winding course through Abyssinia and Sennaar, falls into the Nile above Gerri.

AZIMGHUR, a'-zim-gur', a town and district in the province of Allahabad, 60 miles from Benares, in Hindostan. Area, 2,520 square miles. Pop. 1,313,950. Lat. 26° 3′ N. Lon. 83° 4′ E.—The sepoys revolted in the town of Azimghur in June, 1857, and on the 18th July a battle was fought between them and the British residents, in which nearly 200 mutineers were slain, and 18 English killed and wounded. The victory on the side of the British, with very inferior numbers, was complete, the deputy magistrate, Mr. Venables, having commanded, and not a house in the town was plundered.

AZINCOURT. (See AGINCOURT.)

AZIMERIGUNGE, az'-imer-i-goonj, a town of further India, in the presidency of Bengal, 76 miles from Dacca. It has a considerable inland trade, and a place for the construction of native boats.

AZOPH, AZOF, or AZOV, az'-of, the ancient Palus Mœotis, an inland sea of Asiatic Russia, on the confines of Tartary, communicating with the Black Sea by a narrow channel, called the Straits of Yenikale. Ext. About 235 miles from N.E. to S.W., with a breadth of 110 at its greatest part. The soundings in general give from 35 to 40 feet in depth; therefore it is not very deep; but a great portion of the produce of Siberia is transported by it from the Don, which debouches into it at its N.E. extremity. The whole surface, except a portion towards the centre, freezes during about a month in winter. Lat. 45° 20′ to 47° 20′ N. Lon. 35° to 39° 30′ E.—On the shores of this sea are the towns of Taganrog, Marinpol, Yenikale, and Azov, with the names of which the enterprises of the last Russian war carried on in the Crimea have made us familiar.

AZOPH, AZOF, or AZOV, a fortified town of Asiatic Russia, on the eastern extremity of the above sea, at the mouth of the river Don. It is situate on a high ridge, on the same site where it is supposed that the ancient Tanais stood. Pop. about 1,500. Lat. 47° N. Lon. 39° 14′ E.

AZORES, or WESTERN ISLANDS, a-zores', a group of nine islands in the Atlantic Ocean, belonging to Portugal, from which they are distant 800 miles. They are divided into three, of which the most eastern consists of the island of St. Michael, with the small adjacent one of St. Mary; the middle and largest is composed of the five islands of Tercera, Graciosa, St. George, Pico, and Fayal. The small islands of Corvo and Flores lie considerably further west, and appear almost detached from the others. Area of the whole, 700 square miles. Desc. Volcanic, with rugged perpendicular coasts, subject to earthquakes, of which the most remarkable is that of 1591, which continued twelve days without intermission, and destroyed entirely the flourishing town of Villa Franca. Besides these occasional and dreadful explosions, the existence of subterraneous fire is constantly indicated by numerrous hot springs throughout the islands. Notwithstanding these drawbacks, however, the soil throughout the islands may be considered as exceedingly fertile. Pro. Wheat, barley, and Indian corn, besides fruits of all kinds, sugar-cane, coffee, tobacco, and rocella. The best vines are raised on the lofty sides of the Pico, which attains an elevation of 1,869 feet. Exp. Wine, brandy, oranges, pulse, beef, and salt pork to Portugal. Imp. Woollen and cotton goods, and hardware from England; iron, pitch, cordage, and glass from the north of Europe; rum, coffee, and sugar from Brazil; oil and timber from the United States, and tea from Portugal. Pop. upwards of 215,000, being a mixed race of negroes and Portuguese. Lat. between 45° 15′ and 47° 18′ N., and between the meridians of 35° and 39° E.—The Azores were first colonized by the Portuguese in the 15th century. Their name is derived from Açor, the Portuguese word for hawk, many of that species of bird having been seen in them at the time.

AZPEYTIA, ath-pi′-te-a, a town of Spain, in the province of Guipuscoa, 15 miles from San Sebastian. Manf. Nails, iron utensils, and shoes. Pop. 5,300.—About a mile from this place, on the banks of the Urola, in a house which is still preserved within the marble walls of a convent that bears his name, Ignatius Loyola, the founder of the order of the Jesuits, was born.

AZTECS, az′-teks, the name of a tribe of Indians who last settled in that part of America now called Mexico. In the 15th century it is conjectured by Humboldt that by success in war they had extended their conquests over 60,000 square miles of country. They were extremely superstitious, and worshipped a number of deities, although they had made some progress in the arts, as may be seen by representations of their paintings, and their architectural and sculptural monuments. They also cultivated the arts of oratory and poetry, but had no acquaintance with alphabetic writing, but represented past events by means of hieroglyphics. Montezuma II., who may be considered the last of their kings, and whose government degenerated into a complete despotism, reigned from 1502 to 1520.

AZUN, VAL D', a′-zu(r)n, a lovely valley in the south of France, called the "Eden of the Pyrenees," reaching the base of the Pic du Midi, and crossed by an important road into Spain.

AZZANA, CASTEL D', ath-a′-na, a village of Northern Italy, 5 miles from Verona, where, in May 1799, the Austrians were defeated by the French.

B.

BAADSTED, or BATSTED, bad′-sted, a seaport-town of Sweden, in the province of Schonen. Lat. 56° 28′ N. Lon. 12° 45′ E.

BAAGOE, ba′-go, two small islands in the Baltic. Lat. 54° 56′ N. Lon. 12° 3′ E.

BAAL, or BEL, bal′-al, 'lord,' the title of the principal idol among the Chaldeans.

BAALBEC. (See BALBEC.)

BAAL-PEOR, bal-al-pe′-or, 'lord of the opening,' an idol of the Moabites.

BAAL-ZEBUB, ze-bub, 'lord of the fly,' an idol worshipped as a protector against swarms of flies.

BAARLE, barl, a village of the Netherlands, in Brabant, 12 miles from Breda. Pop. about 2,000.

BABA, ba′-ba, a seaport-town and cape near the W. extremity of Anatolia, in Asia Minor. Pop. 4,000. Lat. of cape, 39° 29′ N. Lon. 26° 4′ E.—Another town of European Turkey, near Larissa. Pop. 2,000.—Another in S. America, in the province of Ecuador. Pop. 3,000.

BABA-DAGH, ba′-ba-da, a town of European Turkey, 90 miles from Silistria. It has several mosques, and a considerable trade through the port of Kara Kerman, an outlet of Lake Rassein, on the Black Sea. Pop. 10,000.

BABAHOYO, ba′-ba-ho′-yo, the capital of a district of the same name in South America, situate on the river of the same name. Lat. 1° 47′ S.

BAAN, John d', baun, a Dutch portrait-painter, who came to England and enjoyed for a time the patronage of Charles II. Returning to Holland, he painted the De Witts; and when the populace murdered those statesmen, they sought to destroy their portraits likewise, but Baan saved them. D. at the Hague, 1702.—His son James was a good artist, and accompanied William prince of Orange to England. D. at Rome, 1700, at the age of 27.

BABBAGE, Charles, bab′-aje, an eminent mathematician, the inventor of the calculating machine, the originator of the Statistical Society, and one of the founders of the Astronomical Society. The writings of this mathematician embrace a wide field of scientific knowledge. B. 1790.

BABEC, ba′-bek, a town of Persia, on the confines of the province of Kirman, formerly a fine city, but now falling into decay. Lat. 30° 3′ N. Lon. 54° 18′ E.

BABELMANDEB, STRAITS OF, bab′-bel-man′-deb, 'the gate of tears,' a channel uniting the Red Sea and the Indian Ocean, 21 miles broad. (See ASIA.)—Also a small barren island in the straits.

BABELMANDEB, SEA or GULF OF, a part of the Arabian Sea, extending 550 miles from E. to W., with a breadth of from 100 to 200. Lat. between 10° and 15° N. Lon. between 43° and 51° E.

BABELTHUAP, bab′-bel-thu′-ap, the largest of the Pelew Islands, in the Pacific, having a circumference of about 50 miles. Lat. 7° 30′ N. Lon. 134° 40′ E.

BABEUF, Francis Noel, ba′-buf, a French writer, who, at the commencement of the French revolution, ardently supported its principles in a journal of Amiens; and, on account of the violence of his writing, was twice tried, but acquitted. He afterwards assumed the revolutionary name of Gracchus, and conducted an incendiary journal called the "Tribune of the People;" and, joining a secret society whose plans were divulged by one of the members, he was condemned for conspiracy to be guillotined. On hearing his sentence he stabbed himself, but was nevertheless borne bleeding and dying to the scaffold, May, 1797.

BABILUS, bab′-i-lus, an astrologer in Nero's age, who told the emperor that he would avert the danger which seemed to hang over his head from the appearance of a hairy comet, by putting all the leading men of Rome to death. His advice was faithfully followed.

BABINGTON, William, bab′-ing-ton, an eminent mineralogist, physician, and chemical lecturer at Guy's Hospital, London. He was one of the founders, if not the founder, of the Geological Society, and was the personal friend of most of the scientific men of his day. B. at Ban, near Coleraine, in Ireland, 1756; D. in London, 1833.

BABINGTON, Anthony, a gentleman of Derbyshire, who associated with other zealous Roman Catholics to assassinate Queen Elizabeth, and to liberate Mary queen of Scots. Babington, some say, was stimulated to this enterprise in the hopes that Mary, out of gratitude, would take him for her husband. The plot was discovered by Walsingham, and he, with thirteen other conspirators, was executed in 1586.

BABINOVITCHI, ba′-bi-no-vit-chi, a small town of European Russia, on the Loutchessa, in the government of Mohilev, 60 miles from Mohilev. Lat. 54° 52′ N. Lon. 30° 14′ E.

BABUYANES, or MADJICOSIMA ISLANDS, ba-boo′-ya-nes, a number of islands lying about 30 miles N. of the island of Luzon, and generally considered the most northern of the Philippines. Pop., united, about 12,000. Lat. 18° 58′ to 19° 42′ N. Lon. 121° 15′ to 122° 5′ E. Subject to the Loo-Choo Islands.

BABYLON, bab′-i-lon, a son of Belus, who, as some suppose, founded the city which bears his name.

BABYLON, a celebrated city, the capital of the Assyrian empire, on the banks of the Euphrates, and about 60 miles from Bagdad. The modern town of Hillah is supposed to occupy a part of its site. It had 100 brazen gates, and its walls, which were cemented with bitumen, measured 60 miles in circumference, 87 feet in thickness, and 350 in height. It was taken by Cyrus, B.C. 538, after he had drained the waters of the Euphrates into a new channel, and marched his troops by night into the town through the dried bed. It was subsequently taken by Alexander the Great, and became famous on account of its being the place of his death. From it arose the new empire, which was afterwards established under the Seleucidæ.

BABYLONIA, bab-i-lo′-ne-a, a large province of Assyria, of which Babylon was the capital. The inhabitants shook off the Assyrian yoke, and became very powerful.

BABYLONII, băb-i-lo'-ni-i, the inhabitants of Babylon, famous for their knowledge of astrology, and for first dividing the year into twelve months, and the zodiac into twelve signs.

BACALAR, ba'-ka-lar', a town of Yucatan, in Central America, 80 miles from Belize. Pop. about 5,000, consisting principally of Indians.

BACCALARY SANNA, Vincent, bak-a-lar'-e, marquis of St. Philip, in Sardinia, and an eminent commander under Charles II. and Philip V. of Spain. D. 1726.—He wrote the "Monarchy of the Hebrews," and "Memoirs of Philip V."

BACCARAT, ba'-ka-ra, a parish and town of France, 15 miles from Luneville, on the Meurthe. Manf. Principally crystal. Pop. 4,000.

BACCHÆ, băk'-e, the priestesses of Bacchus.

BACCHANALIA, băk-a-nai'-le-a, Roman festivals in honour of Bacchus; the same as the Dionysia of the Greeks.

BACCHANTES, băk-ăn'-tes, priestesses of Bacchus, represented at the celebration of the orgies almost naked, with garlands of ivy, a thyrsus, and dishevelled hair. Their looks are wild, and they utter dreadful sounds, and clash various musical instruments together. They are also called Thyades and Menades.

BACCHIGLIONE, ba'-keel-ye'-o-nai, a navigable river of Upper Italy, rising in Vicenza, and, after a course of 55 miles, falling into the lagunes of Venice.

BACCHIS, or BALUS, băk'-is, bai'-lus, king of Corinth, who succeeded his father Prumnides. His successors were always called Bacchidæ, in remembrance of the wisdom of his reign. The Bacchidæ increased so much that they chose one of their number to preside among them with regal authority. Cypselus overthrew this institution by making himself absolute.

BACCHIUS and BITHUS, băk'-i-us, bi'-thus, two celebrated gladiators of equal age and strength; whence the proverb to express equality, Bithus contra Bacchium.

BACCHUS, băk'-us, the son of Jupiter and Semele, the daughter of Cadmus. There are different traditions concerning the manner of his education, which has led some to infer that there were several of the same name. Diodorus speaks of three, and Cicero of a greater number; but among them all, the son of Jupiter and Semele seems to have obtained the merit of the rest. Bacchus is the Osiris of the Egyptians, and his history is drawn from the Egyptian traditions concerning that ancient king. In his youth he was taken asleep in the island of Naxos, and carried away by mariners, whom he changed into dolphins, except the pilot, who had expressed some concern at his misfortune. One of his first exploits was to recover his mother from the infernal regions, into which she had been cast, and by the piety of her son and the consent of Jupiter, she was raised to immortal honours under the name of Thyone. Of all his achievements, his expedition into the East is the most celebrated. He marched at the head of an army composed of men and women, all inspired with divine fury, and armed with thyrsuses, cymbals, and other musical instruments. On this occasion he was drawn in a chariot by a lion and a tiger, and Pan and Silenus, and all the satyrs, accompanied him. His conquests were easy and bloodless; the people readily submitted, and gratefully elevated to the rank of a god the hero who taught them the use of the vine, the cultivation of the earth, and the manner of gathering honey. With all his benevolence to mankind, he was, however, relentless in punishing disrespect to his divinity. As he was the god of vintage, of wine, and of drinkers, he is generally represented crowned with vine and ivy leaves, with a thyrsus in his hand. His figure is that of an effeminate young man, to denote the joys which commonly prevail at feasts; and sometimes that of an old man, to teach us that wine taken immoderately will enervate us, render us loquacious and childish, like old men, and unable to keep secrets. The panther is sacred to him, because he went on his expedition covered with its skin. The magpie is his favourite bird, because in triumphs people were permitted to speak with boldness and liberty. He is sometimes represented as an infant, holding a thyrsus and clusters of grapes with a horn; and often appears naked, riding upon the shoulders of Pan, or in the arms of his foster-father, Silenus. He also sits upon a globe bespangled with stars, and is then the same as the Sun, or Osiris, of Egypt. The festivals of Bacchus, generally called Orgies, Canephoria, Phallica, Bacchanalia, or Dionysia, were introduced into Greece from Egypt by Danaus and his daughters. The infamous debaucheries at these festivals are well known to the classical student. (See DIONYSIA, &c.) His priestesses were called by the several names of Menades, Thyades, Bacchantes, Mimallonides, and Bassarides, according to the peculiarity of either their dress or their gestures. The Egyptians sacrificed pigs to him, before the doors of their houses. The fir-tree, the yew-tree, the fig-tree, the ivy, and the vine, were sacred to him; and the goat was generally sacrificed to him, on account of its propensity to destroy the vine. According to Pliny, he was the first who ever wore a crown. His beauty is compared to that of Apollo; and, like him, he is shown with fine hair loosely flowing down his shoulders, and is said to possess eternal youth. Sometimes he has horns, either because he taught the cultivation of the earth by oxen, or because Jupiter, his father, appeared to him in the deserts of Libya under the shape of a ram, and supplied his thirsty army with water. The three persons of the name of Bacchus, whom Diodorus mentions, are, the one who conquered the Indies, called the bearded Bacchus; a son of Jupiter and Proserpine, represented with horns; and the son of Jupiter and Semele, called the Bacchus of Thebes. Those mentioned by Cicero, are, a son of Proserpine; a son of Nysus, who built Nysa; a son of Caprius, who reigned in the Indies; a son of Jupiter and the moon; and a son of Thyone and Nisus.

BACCHYLIDES, băk-il'-i-des, a Greek lyric poet, nephew of the elder Simonides. His compositions were hymns, dithyrambic poems, odes in celebration of the Pythian victors, amatory poems, &c., all of which are now lost, except about twenty pieces. B. in the island of Cos; flourished 452 B.C. This was the last of the nine lyric poets, and Horace is said to have imitated him in several of his poems, particularly in the fifteenth ode of the first book.

BACCIO, Della Porta, bach'-e-o, better known as Fra Bartolomeo, a name he assumed, was an eminent Italian painter, who distinguished himself chiefly by the strength of his colouring and the excellence of his representations of the human figure. B. in the district of Savignano, 1469; D. at Florence, 1517.—The works of this painter are numerous, and are held in high estimation, and may be seen in the public galleries of Florence, Rome, the Louvre of Paris, Munich, &c.

BACH, John Sebastian, bak, an eminent German composer, who, in 1708, became musician to the duke of Saxe-Weimar, and obtained, in 1717, a victory at Dresden, over Marchand, a famous French organist, who fled, rather than endure the certainty of a defeat. He is said to have been equal to Handel on the organ, and his compositions are works of the highest excellence; and his strains may be recognized in all the religious edifices of the world. B. at Eisenach, 1685; D. at Leipsic, 1750. His sons Charles and John were also celebrated as performers and composers; and so fertile in musical talent were the Bach family, that fifty-nine members of it have been mentioned as celebrated musicians.

BACHARACH, or BACARATH, ba'-ka-rak, a town of Prussia, 22 miles from Coblentz. Pop. about 2,000. Here, on the 1st January, 1814, Blucher, with his army, crossed the Rhine.

BACHELIER, Nicholas, ba-shel'-e-ai, a French sculptor and architect, a pupil of Michael Angelo. He ornamented the churches of his native city with his productions. B. at Toulouse; D. 1554.—There are others of this name.

BACHIAN, or BATSHIAN, bat'-she-an, the largest of the Molucca islands, in the Ternate group, to the south of Gilolo. Ext. 54 miles long by 20 broad. Area, estimated at 900 square miles. Desc. Fertile and mountainous. Lat. 1° S. Lon. 127° 33' E.—It was, in 1610, taken from the Spaniards by the Dutch.

BACHMAN, John, băk'-man, a distinguished American naturalist, and the assistant of Audubon in the preparation of his great work on ornithology. B. at Dutchess, New York, 1790.

Baciccio, John Baptist Gauli, ba-chitch'-e-o, a celebrated Italian painter, who excelled in portraits and scriptural subjects. B. at Genoa, 1639; D. 1709.

Baciocchi, Marie Anne Elisa Bonaparte, bach'-e-ok'-e, the eldest of the sisters of Napoleon I., who, in 1797, at Marseilles, married a retired officer of a Corsican regiment. She subsequently rose with the fortunes of her great brother, and, with her husband, became prince and princess of Piombino, and shortly afterwards of Lucca. In 1809 she became grand duchess of Tuscany, and held her court at Florence, until the fall of the first Napoleonic empire. She subsequently lived at Bologna as countess of Campagnano. B. in Corsica, 1777; D. at Bologna, 1820.—Her husband was the purchaser of the magnificent palace of Ranuzzi, in Bologna, where, with the title of a Roman prince, he died in 1841.

Bacis, bai-sis, a famous bull consecrated to the sun, and worshipped with divine honours in Egypt. It was said that he had a symbolical resemblance to the sun, as his colour changed regularly each day, and his hair grew unlike that of other animals.

Back, Sir George, bak, a distinguished voyager and explorer in the Arctic regions. In 1818 he accompanied Sir John Franklin in his northern voyage, and in 1819 and 1823 he was with the same navigator in the Arctic seas. In 1833 he undertook an overland journey in search of Captain Ross. On this occasion he descended Back River till he reached the Polar Sea, and then traced the coasts as far as Bathurst Inlet. In 1835 he was made a captain, and in 1836 examined the coasts between Cape Turnagain and Regent Inlet. In 1838 he received the honour of knighthood, and was presented, for his exertions in the paths of geographical science, with a medal from the Geographical Society. B. at Stockport, 1796.—He has written two interesting works on the subject of his explorations.

Back's River, baks, formerly the Great Fish River, but now named Back's River, in honour of the above commander. It takes its rise in Sussex Lake, and falls into a bay in the Gulf of Boothia, in lat. 67° 7′ 31″ N.; lon. 94° 39′ 45″ W.

Back Land, the territory through which the above river flows, and so named from its having been explored by Captain Back in 1831.

Backer, James, ba'-ker, a Dutch historical painter of great merit. B. at Antwerp, in 1530; D. 1560.—Of this family there were others who were painters.

Backer, Jacob, a Dutch portrait and historical painter, whose works are held in great esteem. B. at Harlingen, 1609; D. 1641.

Backergunge, ba'-ker-goonj', a district of Bengal, consisting of a part of the Sunderbund and the mouths of the Ganges and Brahmapootra. Area, 3,794 square miles. Desc. A thick impenetrable jungle, here and there relieved by some patches of fertile rice-ground. Pop. 733,800.—It has a town of the same name at about 120 miles from Calcutta.

Backhouse, William, bak'-hous, an astrologer and alchemist, who was educated at Christ Church, Oxford, but left it without a degree, and settled on his estate in Berkshire, where he devoted himself to his favourite studies. B. in Berkshire; D. 1662.—He published "The Pleasant Fountain of Knowledge," a translation from the French; "The Complaint of Nature;" "The Golden Fleece." He was also the inventor of an instrument called the waywiser. Elias Ashmole was his disciple, and used to call him father.

Backhuysen, or Bakhuysen, Ludolph, bak-hoi'-sen, an eminent Dutch painter, whose favourite subjects were shipping and sea-pieces. B. at Embden, 1631; D. at Amsterdam, 1709.—He was accustomed, when a storm arose, to embark in a small boat, and, going out to sea, would watch, with the greatest interest, the play of the waves and breakers as they lashed the sides of the rolling vessels. This study of nature enabled him to give to his productions the admirable truthfulness which distinguishes them.

Backnang, bak'-nang, a town of Wurtemberg, district of the Lower Neckar, 16 miles from Stuttgart. Manf. Woollen cloths and leather. Pop. about 5,000.

Bacon, Anne, bai'-kon, the second daughter of Sir Anthony Cooke, the wife of Sir Nicholas Bacon and the mother of the great Sir Francis Bacon, Baron Verulam. She had considerable literary talents and was well skilled in both the Latin and Italian languages, from both of which she translated some works. She also corresponded in Greek, and Beza dedicated his Meditations to her; but it is on account of her having been the mother of the illustrious chancellor of England, rather than on account of any distinguished talents of her own, that she is here noticed. D. 1528; D. 1600.

Bacon, Roger, an eminent English monk, scholar, and philosopher, educated at Oxford, under the auspices of Robert Grosseteste, bishop of Lincoln, who, throughout his life, continued his greatest patron. Bacon was also encouraged and instructed in learning by Edmund Rich, archbishop of Canterbury, William Shirwood, chancellor of Lincoln and an excellent mathematician, and Richard Fishacre, an able professor at Oxford and Paris. The last-mentioned university being at that time greatly frequented by students, Bacon went thither, and studied with so much diligence and success as to obtain the degree of D.D. On quitting France he retired to Oxford, and about the same time entered into the order of St. Francis. He now devoted himself principally to chemistry, natural philosophy, and mathematics; and so ardent was he in their pursuit, that he spent in the course of twenty years £2,000 entirely upon them; which, taking into consideration the time in which he lived, was no contemptible sum. The discoveries he made, and the fame he obtained, excited the envy and malice of the monks. It was reported, and believed, that he had recourse to the agency of evil spirits, and that all his knowledge consisted in his profound skill as a magician. In consequence of this, he was forbidden to read lectures in the university, and was even confined to his cell, without being allowed to see his friends, or to have a proper supply of food. The bigoted conduct of the monks seems only to have extended his reputation; for, while he was suffering from their persecution, he received a letter from the cardinal bishop of Sabina, the pope's legate in England, requesting a copy of his works, which Bacon at first declined; but when that prelate was raised to the papal chair by the name of Clement IV., he collected his writings into a volume, entitled "Opus Majus," or the Greater Work, and sent it to his holiness, who promised him his protection. On the death, however, of that pope he was exposed to new and more severe persecutions. His works were prohibited, and he was sentenced to close imprisonment, in which he remained above ten years. On being released, he retired to Oxford, where he died. B. at Ilchester, 1214. D. 1292. —Hallam says that the mind of Roger Bacon was strangely compounded of almost prophetic gleams of the future course of science, and the best principles of the inductive philosophy, with a more than usual credulity in the superstition of his own times. However this may be, he was certainly possessed of one of the most comprehensive minds of any man of his time. Bishop Bale mentions above eighty treatises written by him, of which he had himself seen near forty; and Dr. Jebb, the learned editor of his "Opus Majus," classes his writings under the heads of grammar, mathematics, physics, optics, geography, astronomy, chronology, chemistry, magic, medicine, logic, metaphysics, ethics, theology, philology, and miscellanies. His chemical tracts are in the "Thesaurus Chemicus," printed at Frankfort, in 8vo, 1620. His treatise on the "Means of avoiding the Infirmities of old Age" was first printed at Oxford in 1590; and an English translation of it, by Dr. Browne, appeared in 1683. Several pieces of his yet remain in MS. Bacon was a deep mathematician, and from some of his MSS. it appears that he had a knowledge of the nature of convex and concave glasses; and some consider him as the inventor of the telescope. He has, besides, the credit of having been the inventor of the air-pump, the diving-bell, the camera obscura, and of gunpowder, the composition of which is expressly mentioned in his treatise "De Nullitate Magiæ." Dr. Friend thinks that since the days of Archimedes, the world has not seen a greater genius. His acquaintance with astronomy and geography was very extensive and accurate. He detected the errors in the calendar, and suggested the reformation in it which was, long afterwards, adopted by Gregory XIII., and was, on the whole, according to Gerard Joannes, a man of such vast learning, that England, nay the world beside, had not, in this respect, his equal or his second; yet, either through the envy or the ignorance of the age in which he lived, he was stigmatized as a magician.

Bacon, Sir Nicholas, lord keeper of the great seal, studied at Bene't (now Corpus Christi) College, Cambridge, whence he removed to Gray's Inn, where he became so eminent in the law, that he was appointed attorney in the Court of Wards. After this, on the dissolution of the monastery of St. Edmund's Bury, he obtained from Henry VIII. possession of various manors in Suffolk. Having become a Protestant, he was on that account excluded from all employment during the reign of Mary; but, on the accession of Elizabeth, he was made a privy councillor and keeper of the great seal. In every political change his prudence seems to have preserved him from danger, whilst he made it his study never to entangle himself with any party. When the queen came to visit him at his new house at Redgrave, she observed, alluding to his corpulence, that he had built his house top little for him. "Not so, madam," answered he; "but your majesty has made me too big for my house." B. at Chislehurst, 1510; D. 1579.—He was twice married: by his first wife he had three sons and three daughters; and by his second he had two sons, Anthony and Francis, the future lord chancellor of England. He was a learned and wise rather than a great man. "I have come to the lord keeper," says Puttenham, "and found him sitting in his gallery alone, with the works of Quintilian before him. Indeed, he was a most eloquent man, of rare learning and wisdom, as ever I knew England to breed." His great son has, as it seems to us, thus correctly drawn his character:—"He was a plain man, direct and constant, without all finesse and doubleness, and one that was of a mind that a man in his private proceedings and estate, and in the proceedings of state, should rest upon the soundness and strength of his own courses, and not upon practice to circumvent others."

Bacon, Francis, Lord, an illustrious philosopher and eminent statesman, was the son of Sir Nicholas Bacon by his second wife; and, whilst yet a mere boy, gave such indications of future eminence, that Queen Elizabeth used to call him her "young lord keeper." He was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he discovered the futility of the Peripatetic or Aristotelian philosophy, which then prevailed. At the age of sixteen he went to France in the suite of Sir Amias Pawlet, ambassador to that court. During his residence there he wrote his work on the state of Europe, which displayed great observation, though he was then but nineteen years of age. On his return to England he entered Gray's Inn; and at the age of twenty-eight was appointed one of the queen's counsellors; but, from his attachment to the earl of Essex, who was at enmity with Cecil, Bacon lost those advantages at court which he might otherwise have reaped. That generous but unfortunate earl, however, feeling the value of his attachment, presented him with an estate, and showed him many acts of kindness, all of which, we grieve to say, were repaid with ingratitude, which, however, has been endeavoured to be palliated from the position in which he was placed. It is his conduct towards the fallen earl, however, considered in connection with his wisdom and other great qualities, which evoked his portrait by a great poet in the following line:—

"The wisest, brightest, meanest of mankind."

In 1593 he was chosen member of parliament for Middlesex, and had the courage to oppose several arbitrary measures of the court; for which he incurred the Queen's displeasure. At this period he was, as through life, in possession of the friendship of rare Ben Jonson, who has bequeathed to us a graphic sketch of his oratorical powers. "No man ever spoke more neatly, more pressly, more weightily, or suffered less emptiness, less idleness, in what he uttered. No member of his speech but consisted of his own graces. His hearers could not cough or look aside from him without loss. * * * The fear of every man that heard him was lest he should make an end." Ben, however, had a noble admiration of the intellectual qualities of the chancellor. On the accession of James I. he obtained the honour of knighthood, and in 1604 was appointed one of the king's counsel, with a pension. The next year he published a great work, entitled "The Advancement and Proficiency of Learning," for which he was made solicitor-general. About this time he married a daughter of Mr. Barnham, a rich alderman of London. In 1611 he was appointed judge of the Marshalsea court, and obtained the place of register of the Star Chamber, the reversion of which had been granted him twenty years before. In 1613 he was made attorney-general, and in 1616 sworn a privy councillor. At this time he contracted a close intimacy with the king's favourite, George Villiers, duke of Buckingham, to whom he wrote an admirable letter of advice. In 1617 he was made lord keeper of the great seal; and, in January, 1618, was invested with the high chancellorship of Great Britain, and created a peer by the title of Baron Verulam. He was next made viscount of St. Albans. In 1620 he gave to the world the greatest of all his works, entitled the "Novum Organum," which was immediately hailed with the warmest expressions of admiration by the greatest minds of Europe, and which is "the central pile of that edifice of philosophy on which the world has bestowed his name." He had now reached the zenith of his glory, when he was accused in parliament of bribery and corruption in his high office. This heavy charge was admitted by himself. "I do plainly and ingenuously confess that I am guilty of corruption, and do renounce all defence." There is something humiliating, but, at the same time, extremely touching, in the fall of this great man. The confession, which was made by himself, could hardly be believed to have been so done. A committee, therefore, was sent by the Lords to inquire if such had been the case, and if it had been signed by him. "My lords, it is my act, my hand, my heart: I beseech your lordships to be merciful to a broken reed." He was sentenced to pay a fine of £40,000, to be imprisoned during the king's pleasure, and for ever rendered incapable of holding any public office. In a short time, however, he was restored to liberty, had his fine remitted, and was summoned to the first parliament of King Charles. It must not be omitted that the greatest part of the blame attaches to his servants; and of this he was sensible; for, during his trial, as he passed through the room where his domestics were sitting, they all rose up at his entrance; on which he said—

LORD BACON.

"Sit down, my masters; your rise hath been my fall." After this disgrace he went into retirement, where he devoted himself to his studies. B. in London, 1561; D. 1626.—His remains were interred in St. Michael's church, at St. Albans, where his secretary erected a monument to his memory. His writings are an inestimable treasure of sound wisdom, and he has justly been called the father of experimental philosophy. In closing this sketch, we cannot help quoting the few pathetic lines written of him by rare Ben Jonson, his faithful friend in adversity as well as in prosperity. "My conceit of his person was never increased towards him by his place or honours; but I have and do reverence him for the greatness that was only proper to himself, in that he seemed to me ever by his worth one of the greatest men and most worthy of admiration that had been in many ages. In his adversity I ever prayed that God would give him strength, for greatness he could not want."

BACON, Nathaniel, half-brother to the chancellor, had a taste for landscape-painting, in which he attained considerable excellence. D. 1615.

BACON, John, an English sculptor, at first was bound apprentice to a manufacturer of china at Lambeth, where he was employed in painting on porcelain. Here he became so expert in modelling shepherds, shepherdesses, and other ornamental figures, that in less than two years he formed all the models for the manufactory. While here, he had an opportunity of observing the models of different sculptors, which were sent to the pottery to be burnt; and by them he was inspired with a strong inclination for his future profession. He immediately began to apply himself with unremitting diligence, and his progress was so rapid that he obtained nine of the first premiums from the Society for the Encouragement of the Arts. The earliest of these was in 1758, for a figure of Peace, when he was only eighteen years of age. During his apprenticeship he formed a design of making statues in artificial stone or cement, which has since been brought to great perfection. About 1763 he began to work in marble; and having invented an instrument for transferring the form of the model to the marble, he saved a great deal of his time, and brought his instrument to be adopted by other sculptors. In 1769 he obtained from the Royal Academy the first gold medal given by that society, and the year following he was chosen an associate. The reputation acquired by the exhibition of his statue of Mars induced Dr. Markham, archbishop of York, to employ him in making a bust of George III. for the hall of Christ Church, Oxford. While modelling this bust, the king asked him "if he had ever been out of the kingdom;" and on being answered in the negative, "I am glad of it," said his majesty; "you will be the greater honour to it." His execution of this bust gained him the royal patronage, and he was employed in forming another for the university of Göttingen. In 1777 he was engaged to prepare a model of a monument to be erected in Guy's Hospital to the memory of the founder, which occasioned him to be employed in the execution of Lord Chatham's monument in Guildhall. The year following he became a Royal Academician, and completed a beautiful monument to the memory of Mrs. Draper, in Bristol cathedral. His other works are too numerous to be specified; suffice it to mention the monument of Lord Chatham in Westminster Abbey, and Howard's and Dr. Johnson's in St. Paul's Cathedral. B. in Southwark, 1740; D. 1799. He was an estimable private character, and he ordered the following inscription, which he wrote himself, to be placed on his tombstone:—"What I was as an artist seemed to me of some importance while I lived; but what I really was as a believer in Christ Jesus, is the only thing of importance to me now." He wrote the article Sculpture in Rees's Cyclopædia.

BACS, baks, a town of Hungary, 27 miles from Zomber. It has a considerable transit trade. Pop. 2,770. Lat. 45° 24′ N. Lon. 19° 20′ E.

BACS-BADROGHER, ba-dro'-ger, a district of S. Hungary, in the circle beyond the Danube. Area, 3,625 square miles. Desc. At some seasons almost a morass; but fertile, and producing abundance of tobacco, wheat, and wine. Pop. 500,000.

BACTON, bak-ton, three English parishes, with small populations, one in Hereford, another in Norfolk, and the other in Suffolk.

BACUP, bāk'-up, a village and chapelry of Lancashire, 12 miles from Blackburn. Manf. Cotton-spinning and power-loom weaving. There are some considerable dye-works, also some brass and iron foundries. Pop. above 7,000.

BADAGRY, bă-dăg-ry, a town on the Bight of Benin, in Africa, 315 miles from Cape-Coast Castle. Pop. 10,000. Lat. 6° 24′ 12″ N. Lon. 2° 53′ 15″ W.

BADAJOS, or BADAJOZ, bădʹ-a-jos (Sp. ba-da-hos), a strongly fortified frontier city of Spain, the capital of a province of the same name, 130 miles from Lisbon. It is a town of great antiquity, with narrow and frequently crooked streets, standing on the Guadiana, which is here crossed by a bridge of twenty-eight arches. It has several parish churches, monasteries, nunneries, and hospitals. The cathedral church is the only edifice deserving notice. Manf. Coarse woollens, soap, and leather. Pop. 12,000.—Badajoz was a town of some note under the Romans, who called it Pax Augusta. It was taken by the French under Soult in 1811, and stormed by the British under Lord Wellington, April 6th, 1812, after a most determined resistance and terrible conflict, the loss of the British in killed and wounded being nearly 5,000; and then for two nights and days the city was sacked by the soldiery, Wellington in vain endeavouring to check them. It is the birthplace of the painter Morales, called El Divino.

BADAKSHAN, ba-dak'-shan, a district of Central Asia, comprising a portion of the Koondooz dominions. It contains cliffs of lapis lazuli, which are peculiar to this region, and ruby-mines. Rivers. The Oxus, the Badakshan, and several other streams. The inhabitants are Tadjiks and Mahometans, and speak the Persian language. Lat. between 36° and 38° N. Lon. between 69° and 73° E.

BADALOCCHIO, Sisto-Rosa, ba'-da-lok'-e-o, an Italian painter and engraver, held in considerable estimation, especially as a draughtsman. His works are to be found in Bologna, Modena, and Parma. B. 1581; D. 1647.

BADCOCK, Samuel, bădʹ-kŏk, an English divine, best known by his critiques in the "Monthly Review," on Madan's "Thelypthora," Dr. Priestley's "History of the Corruptions of Christianity, &c.;" and by the considerable share which he had in Dr. White's Bampton Lectures. He was a man of great liveliness, taste, and learning. B. at South Moulton, 1747; D. 1788.

BADDESLEY, bădzʹ-le, a name common to several English parishes with small populations.

BADEN, or BADENS, Francis, ba'-den, a Dutch historical and portrait painter. B. at Antwerp, 1571; D. 1603.—His warm colouring procured him the surname of "the Italian."

BADEN, GRAND DUCHY OF, a state of the German confederation, bounded S. by Switzerland and the Lake of Constance, E. by Wurtemburg, N. by Bavaria and Hesse-Darmstadt, and W. by the Bavarian circle of the Rhine and the French departments of the Upper and Lower Rhine. Divisions. These are four;—Lake Constance, Upper Rhine, Middle Rhine, and Lower Rhine. Area, 5,904 square miles. Desc. Extremely mountainous, except in the west, where there is a continuous valley extending from Mannheim to Basle. Rivers. The Rhine, Kenzig, Murg, Weisen-Mayn, Danube, and Neckar. Climate. Severe in the mountain regions, but mild in the valley. Pro. As the chief wealth of the state springs from agriculture; barley, maize, wheat, potatoes, flax, hemp, and tobacco are cultivated to a considerable extent, and vast numbers of sheep and cattle are reared. Minerals. Alum, sulphur, vitriol, silver, iron, copper, lead, and coal. Manf. Ribbon-weaving, straw-plait, wooden ornaments, paper, clocks, watches, organs, and musical boxes. Pop. 1,370,000. Lat. between 47° and 49° N. Lon. between 7° and 9° E.

BADEN, usually called Baden-Baden, a town of Germany, in the grand duchy of Baden, 22 miles from Strasburg. It is noted for its mineral baths, and is most picturesquely situate in the midst of a valley rich in vineyards and orchards, the adjacent heights being crowned with grand old ruins. In the autumn the influx of visitors from England and all parts of the continent is very great; and the public gaming-tables attract a host of ardent players and curious lookers-on. Pop. 6,400—A treaty, known by the name of the treaty of Radstadt, was signed here in 1714.

BADEN, a town of Lower Austria, 15 miles from Vienna, noted for its baths. Pop. 3,160. There are many places of this name on the Continent, it being the German word for 'bath.'

BADENOCH, bäd-e-nok, an extensive Highland district in the north of Scotland, forming part of Inverness-shire, and traversed by the Spey.

BADENWEILLER, ba'-den-vai-ler, a town of Germany, 2 miles from Mullheim. Manf. Woollen and cotton goods, nails, and earthenware. Pop. 2,500.

BADEW, Richard de, bäd'-u, the founder of Clare Hall, Cambridge, who, in 1326, was chancellor of Cambridge. In the same year he laid the foundation of a building, to which he gave the name of University Hall; which, being burnt down, was rebuilt by the daughter of Sir Gilbert de Clare, earl of Gloucester, who named it Clare Hall. Lived in the 14th century.

BADIA, LA, ba-de-a, two small towns of Italy, the one on the Adige, 11 miles from Rovigo, and the other 14 miles from Verona.

BADILE, ba'-de-lai, Antony, an Italian painter, whose portraits bore a great resemblance to real life, but who has a higher merit in being the master of Paul Veronese and Zelotti. B. at Verona, 1480; D. 1560.

BADONG, ba'-dong, a state in the island of Bali, in the Asiatic Archipelago. Area, 100 square miles. Desc. Fertile, cultivating and exporting maize, rice, coffee, tobacco, cattle, and pigs to the Mauritius, Singapore, and Australia.

BADULATO, ba'-doo-la'-to, a thriving town of Naples, in Calabria Ultra, 14 miles from Squillace. Pop. 3,000.

BAENA, or VAENA, ba-aï'-na, a town of Spain, 26 miles from Cordova. Manf. Woollen, linen, and cotton fabrics; and there are several oil-mills and tanneries. Pop. 13,000.

BAEPENDI, ba'-ai-pain'-de, a town and district of Brazil, 180 miles from Rio de Janeiro. Pop. of district, 9,000.

BAERSTRAT, bar'-strat, a Dutch painter, who excelled in sea-pieces and fish. His works are highly estimated. Lived in the 17th century.

BAEZA, or BAEÇA, ba-aï'-tha, a town of Spain, in the Andalusian province of Jaen. Its streets and squares are handsome and spacious: one of the latter is adorned with a beautiful fountain. Manf. Principally leather. Pop. about 12,000.—This was formerly a considerable place, having been the residence of several Moorish kings.

BAFFA, bäf-a, a seaport-town on the west coast of the island of Cyprus, 56 miles from Nicosia. It is situate on a rocky eminence close to the sea; and its harbour, once good, is now choked up with sand. Lat. 34° 48′ N. Lon. 33° 18′ E.

BAFFIN, William, bäf'-in, an English navigator, of whose early life little or nothing is known. In 1612 he made a voyage to the north-west, of which he wrote an account, and which was the first in which a method was adopted by Baffin of determining the longitude at sea, by observations made upon the heavenly bodies. In 1613 he made a voyage to Greenland, and in 1615 made another with Bylot, and in the following year acted as pilot to the same commander, and discovered the large sea which bears his name. In 1621 he joined the British expedition, which, acting in concert with the Persians, was to eject the Portuguese from the Persian Gulf, where, at the siege of Kismis, a small fort near Ormuz, he was killed. B. 1584; D. 1622.

BAFFIN'S SEA, erroneously called a bay, is situate between Greenland and the lands or islands on the north of Hudson's Bay. On the N. it is entered by Smith Sound from the Polar Sea; on the S. by Davis Strait from the Atlantic Ocean; and on the W. by Jones Sound and Lancaster Sound from the Arctic Ocean. Lat. extending from 68° to 78° N. Lon. from 55° to 80° E.

BAGDAD, PASHALIC OF, bäg'-däd, a Turkish pashalic or government of Asia, sometimes called the Afahian Irak; bounded on the N. by the pashalics of Van and Diarbekir, on the S. by Syria and Arabia, on the E. by Persia, and on the S.E. by the Persian Gulf. Ext. 550 miles long, with a breadth of 350. Area, 100,000 square miles. Desc. A great portion of the country consists of deserts destitute of vegetation of any kind, except along the banks of the streams and rivers. The plains east of the Tigris are fertile, and produce grain and fruit, and in the drier parts it is productive of fine dates. Rivers. The Euphrates and the Tigris. Zoology. The wild animals are lions, jackals, gazelles, hogs, and hares; and the domestic are horses, asses, mules, buffaloes, dromedaries, and single-humped camels. The horses are especially beautiful, and as beef is not eaten, oxen are raised, not for slaughter, but for agricultural purposes. The principal wild birds are blackcock, partridges, wild doves, and snipes; ducks, geese, widgeons, and pelicans haunt the lakes and marshes; whilst the only domestic birds are the pigeon and common fowl. Pro. Wheat, barley, dates, apples, pears, oranges, melons, cucumbers, and onions are all grown; but the heat of the climate in June, July, and August burns up almost everything that is green, whilst the winter is similar to a northern summer. Pop. 1,200,000. Lat. between 30° and 37° N. Lon. between 38° 40′ and 47° 30′ E.

BAGDAD, a city of Asiatic Turkey, the capital of the Turkish province of Bagdad, intersected by the Tigris, but principally situate on the east side of the river, 200 miles above its junction with the Euphrates. The city stands in the midst of a forest of date-trees; its domes and minarets ascending above them, and sufficiently striking and picturesque at a distance. On a nearer approach, however, the meanness of the houses of which the city is mostly composed, greatly detracts from any impression of the beauty with which it may have affected the traveller; as they are mostly of brick, and generally one story high. The streets are dirty and unpaved, and so narrow that two horsemen can scarcely pass each other abreast. The houses of the rich, however, are handsome, having windows of Venetian glass, ornamented ceilings, and a courtyard in the front, with a small plantation of orange-trees. There are said to be about 100 mosques in the town. The governor's palace is a spacious edifice. The baths and coffee-houses, though not kept in good repair, are well frequented; and the markets are well supplied with provisions, and the expense of subsistence is moderate. The bazaars consist of a magnificent display of shops, wherein every description of eastern merchandise may be found. Manf. The principal are red and yellow leather, which is much esteemed; silk, cotton, and woollen stuffs. Pop. about 60,000, consisting mostly of Turks and Arabs. Lat. 33° 19′ 10″ N. Lon. 44° 22′ 45″ E.—Bagdad was founded in 766. In the 9th century the famous Haroun-al-Raschid reigned here. In a large burial-ground outside the walls of the town there is a tomb erected to the memory of Zobeide, the wife of this caliph, and the famous lady of the "Thousand and One Nights." Amongst other tombs, it is said that that of the Jewish prophet Ezekiel is here. Bagdad has undergone many revolutions, and was nearly destroyed in 1638, by Amurath IV., to whom it surrendered. Since then it has been nominally subject to the Porte.

BAGNA CAVALLO, ban'-ya ka-val'-o, a neat town of Italy, States of the Church, 24 miles from Ferrara. Pop. 4,000.

BAGNARA, ban-yar'-a, a town of Naples, in Calabria Ultra, 16 miles from Reggio. In its neighbourhood excellent wine is produced. Pop. 5,000.—In 1783 this town was almost wholly destroyed by an earthquake.

BAGNERES EN BIGORRE, ban'-yair ang be-gor', a town of France, on the Adour, department of the Upper Pyrenees, 13 miles from Tarbes. This town is well built, containing several squares and numerous handsome streets. Manf. Woollens, linens, and crape called barège. It is celebrated for its bathing establishments, of which there are about twenty. Pop. between 8,000 and 9,000.

BAGNERES DE LUÇON, loo-zong, a town of France, department of the Upper Garonne, 60 miles from Toulouse. It has sulphurous thermal springs, and a bath establishment, frequented from May to October.

BAGNES-LE-CHABLE, ban le(r) shabl, a parish and village of Switzerland, 7 miles from Martigny. They are situate in the valley of Bagne, which has an elevation of 2,716 feet. Pop. of parish, 9,000.—In 1818, the river Dranse being blocked up with ice, a lake was formed; and, when it burst, the torrent swept away 400 cottages, and 34 lives were lost.

BAGNI, ban'-ye, a name common to several Italian villages, on account of their being bathing-places.

BAGNOLES, ban'-yole, a village of France, department of the Orne, 13 miles from Domfront. Here are some sulphurous springs.

BAGNOLO, ban-yo'-lo, the name of two towns of small populations, and of many villages in Italy.

BAGNOLS, ban'-yols, a town of France, department of the Gard, 12 miles from Uzès. Manf. Various kinds of silk and serges. Pop. about 5,000.

BAGOLINO, ba'-go-le'-no, a town of Italy, in the territory of Venice, 24 miles from Brescia. In its vicinity are the sulphurous thermal springs of St. Giacomo. Pop. about 4,000.

BAGRATION, Peter Ivanovitch, Prince, bă-grai-she-on, a celebrated Russian general, who commenced his military career under Potemkin, and in 1794 served under Suwarov in Poland, where he greatly distinguished himself. In 1799, in Italy, under the same leader, he proved himself so able a soldier, that Suwarov called him his "right arm." He took Brescia and Tortona, and defeated the French under Moreau near Marengo. At the taking of Turin, in the actions of Trebbia and the Adda, at the taking of Alessandria and of Serebasso, and at the battle of Novi, he added to his former reputation. In 1805 he commanded the vanguard of the allied Austrian and Russian army, under Kutusoff, and in that capacity displayed great abilities. He was present at the battles of Austerlitz, Eylau, and Friedland, and at all showed his skill and courage. In 1807 he served in the campaign in Finland; and, gaining considerable successes, he was mainly instrumental in detaching from Sweden a large portion of Finland. He afterwards had the command of the Russian army in Turkey; and in 1812, when Napoleon invaded Russia, was appointed to the western army, and made a masterly retreat on Smolensko, where he joined his forces with those of Barclay de Tolly. After the battle there, he commanded the left wing at Borodino, where he was struck by a shell, of which wound he shortly after died at Semœ. B. 1765; D. 1812.

BAGSHOT, băg'-shot, formerly Holy Hall, a village of Surrey, 10 miles from Windsor. Pop. 1,000.—It gives its name to an extensive heath in its neighbourhood, once notorious as the haunt of highwaymen.

BAGULCOT, ba-gul-kot, a subdivision of the district of Darwar, in the presidency of Bombay, Hindostan. Ext. 54 miles long and 44 broad. Area, 1,230 square miles. It is deficient in a general supply of water, on which account the villages are mostly built on the banks of rivers. Pop. about 100,000.

BAHADURPOOR, ba-ha'-dur-poor', the name of two towns in India. 1. In the province of Goojerat, 81 miles from Surat. 2. In the district of Chendaree, Malwa.

BAHAMA, or LUCAYO ISLANDS, ba-ha'-ma, in the Atlantic Ocean, situate opposite the coast of Florida, and belonging to Great Britain. They comprise all that chain of West-India islands lying to the north of Cuba and St. Domingo, and they have never been regularly surveyed; and though their numbers have been estimated at 500, a great proportion of them are nothing more than cliffs and rocks. Area of the whole, from 4,400 to 5,500 square miles. The following are the principal:—Abaco, Andros, Atwood's Key, Great Bahama, Crooked Island, Eleuthera, Exumas, French Keys, Hog Island, Hog Key, Harbour Island, Great Island, Long Key, Mayaguana, Ragged Island, Rose Island, Royal Island, San Salvador, Turk's Island, and Watling's Island. Desc. Mostly flat, barren, and rocky, chiefly producing cotton, maize, Guinea-corn, pineapples, and vegetables. The soil is mostly light or sandy, but is here and there spotted with patches of good land. In general, the islands are ill supplied with fresh water; but this is found by digging wells in the rocks to the depth of the sea-level. Climate. Salubrious. The more northern islands, during the winter months, are rendered cool and agreeable by the north-west breeze from the continent of America; the more southern are hotter throughout the year, being low, flat, barren, and rocky. Pop. about 26,000, a great proportion of whom are blacks and people of colour. Lat. between 21° and 28′ N. Lon. between 71° and 81° W.

The Bahama Islands were first settled by the English in 1629, possessed by Spain in 1781, but, in 1783, restored to Britain, when the seat of government was fixed at New Providence, upon which island Fort Nassau was built. From this period a regular colonial administration has been maintained.—The Great Bahama Island is near the N. extremity of the group; and San Salvador was the first land discovered by Columbus in his voyage of 1492. (See AMERICA, SOUTH.)

BAHAMA BANK, GREAT, a sand-bank extending from near the island of Cuba to the Bahama Islands. Lat. extending from 22° 20′ to 26° 15′ N.—There is also a smaller bank of the same name, which lies to the north of the island of Bahama.

BAHAMA CHANNEL, or GULF OF FLORIDA, ba-ha'-ma, the narrow sea between the coast of America and the Bahama Islands, 135 miles long and 46 broad.

BAHAR, or BEHAR, be'-har, an old, extensive, and populous province of Hindostan, formerly called Magadha, and once an independent kingdom. It is bounded on the N. by the territories of Nepaul, on the S. by those of Berar, on the W. by Oude and the Mahratta dominions, and on the E. by Bengal. Area, 52,000 square miles. Desc. One of the richest and most productive provinces of India. Its opium is the best cultivated in that country. Tobacco, indigo, and sugar are grown to a large extent. Climate. Temperate, and more salubrious than that of Bengal. Pop. 9,000,000. Lat. between 22° and 27° N. Lon. between 84° and 88° E.

BAHAR, a district of the above province, situate in its centre. Area, 5,694 square miles. Pop. 2,500,000.

BAHAR (Vihar, 'a monastery of Buddhists'), the capital of the above district, 35 miles from Patna. It has now fallen much to decay, but is still resorted to by pilgrims. Pop. 30,000. Lat. 25° 13′ N. Lon. 85° 37′ E.

BAHAWULPOOR, Hindostan. (See BHAWLPOOR.)

BAHIA, ba-he'-a, a name, which, with various affixes, designates a number of bays in different parts of the world.

BAHIA HONDA, a large and well-sheltered port of the island of Cuba. Lat. 22° 58′ N. Lon. 83° 6′ W. This port is the resort of privateers for landing their slaves.

BAHIA DE TODOS SANTOS, a province and captainship of Brazil, so named from the capacious bay on which its capital, San Salvador, stands.

BAHIA, or SAN SALVADOR, city of, capital of the above province. It has a cathedral, the palaces of the governor and the archbishop, a town-hall, an hospital, a theatre, and several religious houses. Exp. Sugar, rice, rum, dye and fancy woods, tobacco, cigars, cocoa-nuts, horns, hides, and bullion. Imp. Manufactured goods, flour, salt, provisions, iron, glass, and wines. Pop. 125,000, of whom two thirds are mulattoes and blacks. Lat. 13° S. Lon. 38° 31′ W.—This city was founded by Thomas de Souza, in 1549.

BAHR, bar, the Arabic name for a sea, lake, or river.

BAHR-EL-ABIAD, bar-el-a'-be-ăd (White River); BAHR-EL-ASREK (Blue River), rivers of Africa.

BAHREIN, bah'-rein, a cluster of islands on the south-west side of the Persian Gulf, near the coast of Arabia, the principal of which are named Bahrein or Awal, Arad, Maharay, and Tamahoy. The first, which is considered the chief, lies about 15 miles from the coast, and 90 from Bushire. Ext. 27 miles long and 10 broad. It produces wheat, barley, dates, and other fruits. Its pearl-fishery is the most productive in the world, amounting annually from £100,000 to £200,000. Exp. Pearls, sharks' fins, tortoise-shell, dried dates, canvas, and coloured cloths. Imp. Rice, spices, pepper, coffee, timber, iron, and corn. Pop. uncertain; perhaps 70,000. Lat. of its capital, Memama, 26° 12′ N. Lon. 50° 39′ 30″ E.

BAIÆ, bai'-i-e, a city of Campania, near the sea, founded by Baius, one of the companions of Ulysses. It is famous for its delightful situation and baths, and here many of the Roman senators had country houses.—J. M. W. Turner, the distinguished landscape painter, has a picture of the Bay of Baiæ.

BAIBOUT, bai'-bout, a town of Turkish Armenia, on the Black Sea, 65 miles from Erzeroum. Pop. 3,000. —The snow which falls here in winter is so great as to interrupt all communication even with the neighbouring villages. Baked cow-dung is the only fuel of the poorer classes, who are described as an active, hardy race.

BAIKAL, bī'-kal, a lake of Siberia, in the government of Irkutsk, sometimes called the Sea of Baikal, or the Holy Sea. Lat. 52° to 55° 41′ N. Lon. 104° to 110° E. (See ASIA.)

BAILDEN, or BAILDON, bail'-den, a town and chapelry in the West Riding of Yorkshire, 7 miles from Bradford. Pop. 3,000.

BAILEY, Philip James, bai'-le, is a member of the bar, and the son of the proprietor of the Nottingham Mercury. He is known in the literary world as the author of "Festus," the "Angel World," the "Mystic," the "Age," &c. "Festus" is his greatest work; and although it was finished when the author was little more than twenty years of age, it contains some beautiful passages, notwithstanding the peculiarity of many of the sentiments with which it is disfigured. B. 1816.

BAILIEBOROUGH, bai'-le-bur'-o, a market-town and parish of Ireland, standing on a head of the Blackwater river, county of Cavan, 14 miles from Cavan. Area of parish, 12,416 acres. Pop. 5,827.

BAILLEUL, or BELLE, bai'-yu(r)l, a dismantled town of France, on the river Lys, 13 miles from Lille. Manf. Woollens, cottons, hats, lace, beetroot-sugar, and oil. The district in which it stands is famed for its cheese. Pop 10,000. This is the name of several other small towns of France.

BAILLI, Roche, bai'-ye, better known as La Rivière, was first physician to Henry IV., and pretended to great skill in astrology. He was a great admirer of Paracelsus, and wrote a summary of his doctrine. D. 1605.

BAILLIE, Robert, bai'-le, a Scotch divine, who, after taking his degree of M.A. in the Glasgow University, received episcopal orders, and became regent of philosophy. During the civil war he joined the Covenanters, and went to London to exhibit charges against Archbishop Laud. He was one of the commissioners sent by the General Assembly of Scotland to Charles II. at the Hague. At the Restoration he was made principal of his college, and might have had a bishopric if he would have conformed. B. at Glasgow; D. 1662. His letters, and journal of his transactions in England, were published at Edinburgh, in 2 vols. 8vo, 1775.

BAILLIE, Joanna, a distinguished writer in an age when good authors were not scarce. Her father was a Scotch clergyman and her mother the sister of the celebrated Dr. William Hunter. The greater part of her life was passed at Hampstead, where she always lived in retirement, and for some years before her death, in strict seclusion. Though not in the habit of receiving company, nearly all the great authors of her age had, at one time or another, been her guests. Sir Walter Scott passed many delightful hours with her, and in 1806 she spent some weeks in his house at Edinburgh. She is best known by her plays, which were written with a view of delineating the strongest passions of the mind, and to each of which she devoted a whole tragedy or comedy. The canon by which she was regulated in the production of these effusions is thus set forth in the preparatory discourse to her dramas in 1798. "Let one single trait of the human heart, one expression of passion, genuine and true to nature, be introduced, and it will stand forth alone, in the boldness of reality; whilst the false and unnatural around it fades away on every side, like the rising exhalation of the morning." B. at Bothwell, 1762; D. at Hampstead, 1851, in her 89th year.—Joanna Baillie was esteemed "the Lady Bountiful" among the poor of the neighbourhood in which she lived, and up to the last retained the full possession of her faculties.

BAILLIE, Matthew, M.D., the brother of Joanna, who became eminent in the pursuits of medical science. He enjoyed the advantage of studying under his uncle, William Hunter, and became one of the most distinguished anatomists and pathologists of his day. In 1810 he was made physician to George III., and was offered a baronetcy, which he declined. He wrote several works in connection with his profession. B. at Bothwell, 1761; D. on his estate in Gloucestershire, 1823.—A monument has been erected to Dr. Baillie in Westminster Abbey. When Sir W. Scott heard of his death, he wrote to his sister Joanna, "We have, indeed, to mourn such a man as, since medicine was first esteemed a useful and honoured science, has rarely occurred to grace its annals, and who will be lamented as long as any one lives who has experienced the advantage of his professional skill and the affectionate kindness by which it was accompanied."

BAILLY, John Sylvain, bai'-ye, an eminent French astronomer, who at an early age evinced a strong inclination for scientific pursuits, which was encouraged by his friends. When young, he communicated some valuable papers to the Royal Academy, and in 1766 published a work on the satellites of Jupiter. In 1768 he published the elogy of Leibnitz, for which he received a gold medal from the Academy of Berlin. This was followed by the elogies of Charles V., La Caillo, and Corneille, which, with the former, were printed together. In 1775 appeared the first volume of his "History of Astronomy," the third and last volume of which was published in 1779. Besides these works, he published several historical disquisitions and astronomical observations. In 1764 he was elected a member of the French Academy, and entering eagerly into the political discussions of his native country, was chosen president of the first National Assembly. In June, 1789, he presided at that meeting of the deputies at the Tennis-court when all took oath not to dissolve until they had prepared a new constitution for France. In the following month he was made mayor of Paris, but soon lost his popularity, owing to the liberal sentiments which he expressed towards the royal family, and his enforcing obedience to the laws. In consequence of this, he resigned his office in 1791, and sought that philosophical retirement for which he was so much more suited. In the sanguinary period which followed, he was apprehended, and after a summary process, condemned to be guillotined. B. at Paris, 1736; suffered, 1793.—When on the scaffold, the demeanour of this philosopher is said to have been perfectly tranquil. "You tremble, Bailly," said one of his enemies to him. "My friend, it is with cold," was the calm reply. Although there is much eloquent writing in Bailly's astronomical works, yet they are not always to be received as essentially correct, as he appears oftentimes to deal in surmises and speculations, rather than in ascertained and calculated facts.

BAILLY, David, a Dutch painter, studied in Holland and Italy, and attained considerable eminence in portraits. In 1613 he settled at Leyden, where he died. B. at Leyden; D. 1630.

BAILY, Edward Hodges, R.A., bai'-le, an eminent sculptor, who began his career as an artist by producing small portrait busts in wax. Obtaining an introduction to Flaxman, he was admitted into the studio of that distinguished man. At the same time he entered as a student at the Royal Academy, where, in 1809, he obtained a silver medal, and in 1811 a gold medal, with an income of £50. The first work which fixed his popularity and placed him amongst the best sculptors of England, was his "Eve at the Fountain," which is now in the Bristol Library Institution. Many of the statues of late years erected in London and the provinces are by him; and there is scarcely an exhibition of the Royal Academy that is not adorned by some of his embodied poetical conceptions. Some of his happiest efforts have appeared in these; amongst which may be named his "Hercules casting Hylas into the Sea," "the Sleeping Nymph," "Eve listening to the Voice," "Helena," "Psyche," "Maternal Love," and "the Girl preparing for the Bath." Amongst his latest productions is "the Graces seated," which is considered one of his best performances. B. at Bristol, 1778.—Although he made large sums of money during the earlier portion of his life, yet, in 1859, the public discovered with astonishment that he was but indifferently provided for.

BAILY, Francis, the son of a banker, and himself a stockbroker up to his 51st year, when he began with ardour to cultivate the science of astronomy, which he unremittingly pursued throughout the rest of his life. He was one of the founders of the Astronomical Society, and not only distinguished himself by his industry, but by the method with which he was enabled to produce a great many works upon his favourite science. B. at Newberry, 1774; D. 1844. "Baily's beads," a peculiar appearance sometimes visible during the period of an eclipse, take their name from this astronomer.

BAIN, bäng, a town of France, in the department of the Ille and Vilaine, 18 miles from Rennes. Manf. Woollen stuffs, and it has a trade in cattle. Pop. about 4,000.

BAINBRIDGE, bain'-bridj, a township in the North Riding of Yorkshire, 2 miles from Askrigg. Pop. 1,000.

BAINBRIDGE, John, a physician and astronomer, who, after taking his degrees at Cambridge and keeping a school at Ashby-de-la-Zouch, settled in London, where he gained so great a reputation for his mathematical knowledge, that Sir Henry Saville appointed him his first astronomical professor at Oxford. B. at Ashby-de-la-Zouch, 1582; D. at Oxford, 1643.—He published several astronomical works, and also left some mathematical MSS.

BAINS, bäng, three towns of France with small populations. One in the department of the Eastern Pyrenees, 15 miles from Perpignan; the other in the department of the Vosges, 13 miles from Epinal; the third in the department Aude, 10 miles from Limoux.

BAIRD, Sir David, baird, an intrepid general, who, in 1799, led the storming party which took Seringapatam. For his bravery on this occasion he received the thanks of the Parliament and the East-India Company. This was the great exploit of his life, although he shared in the glory of Corunna, under Sir John Moore. On the death of that distinguished officer he became commander-in-chief, but could not take advantage of this success, from his arm being so dreadfully shattered that it had to be amputated at the shoulder. For his gallant conduct, however, he again received the thanks of Parliament, and was created a baronet. His military career was both long and active, having served in various parts of the globe. B. at Newbyth, in Scotland, 1757; D. 1829.

BAIRDSTOWN, bairds'-town, a post township of the United States, and capital of Nelson county, Kentucky. It is 55 miles from Lexington, on a branch of Salt River. Pop. 1,492.

BAIRENTH, bi'-rent, a city of Bavaria, the capital of Upper Franconia, 126 miles from Munich. Manf. Cottons and woollens, leather, parchment, porcelain, and tobacco. Pop. 17,000.—Here Jean Paul Richter died in 1825. A monument to his memory was erected in this place by the king of Bavaria.

BAIROUT, BEYEOUT, or BEIROUT, bi-root', anciently Berytus, a seaport-town of Syria, in the pashalic of Saide, or Acre, situate on a plain, about 60 miles from Damascus, of which city it is the port. The streets are narrow and irregular, and the suburbs are nearly as large as the town, consisting of houses interspersed with gardens planted with fruit-trees, and having a beautiful appearance. Its walls are three miles in circumference. Its harbour is protected by a mole, and is not deep enough for ships; but in a bay beyond it these may anchor in a depth of from six to ten fathoms. Manf. Gold and silver thread and silk stuffs. Exp. Silk, wine, oil, galls, and madder. Imp. The manufactured goods of the west of Europe, cloths, muslins, and hardware. Pop. estimated at 12,000. Lat. 33° 50′ N. Lon. 35° 32′ E.—This place is well supplied with springs, and is said to have derived its name from the Phœnician deity Baal Beerith, signifying 'lord of wells.' In 1840 it was bombarded and taken by the British.

BAITHOSUS, bai-thō'-sus, a Jew, who, with his fellow-disciple Sadoc, founded a sect which denied a future state and resurrection. At first this sect was called both Baithosæi and Sadducees; but in process of time it was only distinguished by the latter term.

BAITOOL, bai'-tool, a fortified town and district of British India, in the presidency of Bengal, 50 miles from Ellichpoor. Area of district, 990 square miles. Pop. 93,441.

BAIUS, Michael, bai'-us, a divine, who became professor of divinity in the university of Louvain, which appointed him its deputy at the council of Trent. His partiality to Augustine, however, brought upon him the charge of siding too much with Calvin; and several of his opinions were condemned by his college and the pope. B. at Melun, 1513; D. 1589.

BAIX, bai, a town of France, in the province of Maine, 8 miles from Mayenne. Pop. 1,314.

BAJA, ba-zha, a considerable market-town of Hungary, in the county of Bodrog, 83 miles from Buda. It has a castle, a county-court, and is a market for hogs. Pop. 14,500.

BAJADA-DE-SANTA-FE', ba-ha'-da dai san'-ta fai, a town of the Plata confederation, on the E. bank of the Parana, opposite Santa Fé. Pop. about 7,000.

BAJAZET I., bā'-jā-zet, sultan of the Turks, succeeded his father, Amurath I., in 1389, and soon after put his younger brother to death. He pushed his conquests far into Asia and Europe, and in 1396 gained a great victory over the Christian army under Sigismund, king of Hungary. In 1402, however, he experienced a terrible defeat from the famous Timur, or Tamerlane, on the plains of Angora. Bajazet was taken prisoner. Different accounts are given of his treatment, by the Persian and Turkish historians. The former assert that he was entertained in a liberal manner; while the latter maintain that Timur shut him in an iron cage, and exposed him to the derision of the populace. D. 1403.

BAJAZET II., sultan of the Turks, succeeded his father, Mahomet II., in 1481. He was opposed by his brother Zizim, whom he defeated. Zizim escaped to Rhodes, whence the grand master (see AUBUSSON) sent him to Italy, where Bajazet caused him to be assassinated. He obtained several advantages over the Venetians and other Christian powers. His son Selim rebelled against him; but Bajazet, instead of punishing him, abdicated in his favour, an act which, it is said, Selim repaid by causing him to be poisoned in 1512.

BAJOUR, ba-joor, a territory of N. Afghanistan. Area, estimated at 370 square miles. Desc. Fertile, surrounded by mountains, clothed with forests of cedar and oak. Its chief town is called Bajour, and is supposed to be the Bazira of the historian of Alexander the Great. Pop. 120,000.

BAKER, Sir Richard, bai'-ker, an historical writer, who, in 1603, was knighted by James I., and, in 1620, was high-sheriff of Oxfordshire. An unfortunate marriage reduced him to poverty, and he was thrown into the Fleet prison, where he wrote several books, the chief of which is a "Chronicle of the Kings of England," which went through several editions, and was long popular with the people. B. at Sissinghurst, Kent, 1568; D. 1645.—This is the chronicle from which Addison, in his "Spectator," makes Sir Roger de Coverley say he drew "many observations." It brings the history of England down to the death of James I.; but it is, notwithstanding the praise of the simple knight of Addison, a dry and jejune performance.

BAKER, Thomas, a mathematician and divine, who published the "Geometrical Key; or, the Gate of Equations unlocked," 1684. The Royal Society sent him some questions, which he solved so satisfactorily that they presented him with a medal. B. at Ilton, in Somersetshire, 1625; D. 1690.

BAKER, Henry, an eminent naturalist, who was brought up a bookseller, but which pursuit he relinquished, and undertook the tuition of deaf and dumb persons, by which he acquired a handsome fortune. He married a daughter of Daniel de Foe, by whom he had two sons. He was chosen fellow of the Antiquarian and Royal societies, and, in 1740, obtained from the latter the gold medal for his microscopical experiments on saline particles. B. in London, 1703; D. 1774. He published the "Microscope made Easy," 8vo, 1742; and "Employment for the Microscope," 8vo, 1764. He also wrote original poems, serious and humorous, published in 8vo, 1725. He left £100 to the Royal Society for an anatomical or chemical lecture, which is called the Bakerian lecture.

BAKER, David Erskine, eldest son of the above, was adopted by an uncle, who was a silk-throwster in Spitalfields, and whom he succeeded in the business. Being fond of theatrical entertainments, however, he squandered his property and joined some strolling companies. Little is known of his history, but he is supposed to have died about 1770. He was the author of "A Companion to the Playhouse," 1764; since considerably improved and enlarged under the title of "Biographia Dramatica."

BAKER, a county of Georgia, U.S., watered by the river Flint. Area, 1,296 square miles. Pro. Principally sugar. Pop. about 9,000, of whom nearly the half are slaves.

BAKER ISLAND, an island in the Polar Sea, discovered by Captain Parry. Lat. 74° 58′ N. Lon. 97° 54′ W.

BAKER'S ISLAND, an island in Massachusetts, U.S., off Salem Harbour, 5 miles from Salem. On its N. end is a lighthouse.

BAKER'S RIVER, a river of New Hampshire, U.S, which debouches into the Merrimac at Plymouth.

BAKEWELL, baik'-wel, a market-town and parish of Derbyshire, situate amidst beautiful scenery, near the confluence of the rivers Wye and Derwent, and 11 miles from Chesterfield. There are mines and quarries in the neighbourhood, and it has several cotton-mills. Pop. about 10,000.—About 2 miles from Bakewell stands Haddon Hall, the most perfect of England's baronial residences now in existence. Chatsworth, the beautiful seat of the duke of Devonshire, where Sir Joseph Paxton first displayed his horticultural talents, is also in this parish.

BAKEWELL, Robert, a celebrated agriculturist, who turned his attention to the improvement of the breed of cattle; for which purpose he travelled over England, and into Ireland and Holland. His endeavours were so successful that the Dishley sheep were distinguished above all others, and he let one of his rams for the sum of 400 guineas: another produced in one season 800 guineas. The race of Dishley sheep were known by the fineness of their bone and flesh, the lightness of the offal, the disposition to quietness, and consequently to mature and fatten with less food than other sheep of equal weight. He also greatly improved the breed of black cattle, which are still distinguished as the new Leicestershire breed of "long-horned." B. at Dishley, 1726; D. 1795.

BAKHSHISARAI, or BAGTCHE-SERAI, bak'-she-sa'-rai, 'the palace of the gardens,' a large town of European Russia, in the Crimea, 18 miles from Simferopol. It consists of irregular streets and houses, mostly of wood, and has 32 mosques, a Greek church, a palace, and many fountains. Manf. Turkey leather, saddles, silk stuffs, and cutlery. Pop. estimated at 14,000, mostly Tartars. Lat. 45° 10′ N. Lon. 33° 52′ E.—This is the only town in the Crimea which preserves the characteristics of its Tartar origin.

BAKTEGAN, or BAKTEGHIAN, bak'-te-gan, a salt lake of Persia, in the province of Fars, about 50 miles from Shiraz. Ext. 60 miles long, with an average breadth of 8. It yields salt in large quantities.

BAKU, or BADKU, ba-ku, a town belonging to Russia, in the province of Daghestan, occupying the peninsula of Apsheron, in the Caspian Sea. It stands on a declivity near to the sea, and is defended by a double wall and deep ditch. A great quantity of cotton is cultivated in the neighbourhood, which is particularly prized. Exp. Cotton, fruit, opium, rice, silk, wine, rock-salt, and naphtha. Imp. Wine, silks, cloths, dyestuffs, iron, and linen. Petroleum is obtained in vast abundance from wells in the principality, particularly about eight miles from the town. Pop. of town, 6,000; of district, 30,000. Lat. 42° 22′ N. Lon. 51° 7′ E.—The district was taken possession of by Russia in 1801. (For a description of the Apsheron peninsula see APSHERON.)

BALA, ba'-la, a township of North Wales, and a borough by prescription, in the county of Merioneth, situate on Bala Pool, 17 miles from Dolgelly. Manf. Knitted woollen gloves and stockings. Pop. 1,257.

BALAAM, bai'-lăm, the son of Beor, or Bosor, a soothsayer of Pethor, a town of Mesopotamia. He was sent for by Balak, king of Moab, to curse the Israelites; but, moved by a superior power, he pronounced a blessing instead of a curse. He was slain with Balak in battle, about 1450 B.C.

BALACHNA, or BALAKHNA, ba-lak'-na, a town of European Russia, in the government of Nijnii Novgorod, on the Volga, 120 miles from St. Petersburg. It has upwards of 12 churches, and has a good trade in grain. Pop. about 4,000. Lat. 56° 30′ N. Lon. 43° 29′ E.

BALADAN, bă-lai'-dan, 'ripeness of judgment,' a famous king of Babylon.

BALAGANSKOI, ba'-la-gans'-koi, a town of Russia, in the government of Irkutsk, 30 miles from Irkutsk. Lat. 53° 45′ N.

BALAGHAUT, ba'-la-gaut, 'above the ghauts or hills," a district of British India. (See BELLARY, CUDDAPAH, KURNOOL.)

BALAGUER, ba'-la-goo'-air, a town of Spain, in Catalonia, 16 miles from Lerida, on the Segre. Pop. nearly 5,000.—There is a strong castle here, which commands the town.

BALAK, bai'-lak, 'who lays waste,' an idolatrous king of Moab, an enemy of Israel.

BALAKLAVA, bă-lăk-la'-va, a small seaport-town of European Russia, in the Crimea, 30 miles from Simferopol. In its vicinity is the monastery of St. George. The harbour, which has a remarkably narrow entrance, resembles a deep Highland loch, and is surrounded by high rugged hills, and overhanging it are the ruins of an old Genoese fort.—It was to this place that the French and English allied army, after the battle of the Alma, made the celebrated flank march from the north of Sebastopol, reaching the valley on the 26th September, 1854; and in the port they were met by a portion of the fleet, carrying the siege train and provisions. Balaklava harbour, being too small for both the English and French fleets, was retained by the English, whilst the French occupied Kamiesch Bay. On October 25th, 1854, was fought the battle of Balaklava, in which the "thin red line" of Highland infantry under Lord Clyde, then Sir Colin Campbell, repelled the attack of the Russian cavalry. But this day is more especially memorable for the splendid charge of the light brigade of British cavalry; of which exploit Alfred Tennyson, the poet-laureate, has sung,—

"Into the jaws of death rode the six hundred."

Of 600 horsemen, nearly two thirds were killed, wounded, or made prisoners. The frightful state of Balaklava harbour during the winter of 1854-55, the miseries endured by the English army through the failure of the commissariat and other departments, and from want of transport from the port to the front, are matters of history, and belong to the narrative of the Crimean war. (See CRIMEA.)

BALAMBANGAN, ba'-lam-ban'-gan, a fruitful island of the Asiatic Archipelago, between Borneo and Magindano. Lat. 7° 15 N. Lon. 117° 5′ E.

BALAS, or BALÆ, ba'-las, a town of Syria, situate at the north-west corner of the Bay of Alexandretta or Iscanderoon, supposed to be the ancient Issus, in Cilicia. Not far from it was fought the second battle in which Alexander the Great defeated Darius.

BALASORE, ba'-la-sor, a maritime district of Hindostan, in Orissa, watered by the Booree Bellaun river. Area, 258 square miles. Salt and rice are the principal articles of produce. Pop. 19,000.—BALASORE, the capital of this district, is situate in the Boorabullung, 123 miles from Calcutta. It is a seaport much frequented by Maldive and coasting vessels. Pop. 11,500. Lat. 21° 31′ N. Lon. 87° 13′ E.

BALASSI, Mario, ba-las'-se, an Italian historical and portrait painter, whose best works are his picture of "St. Francis," and "The Miracle of St. Nicholas of Tolentino." B. at Florence, 1604; D. 1667.

BALATON, ba'-la-ton, a lake in Hungary, 55 miles from Pesth. Ext. 48 miles long, and from 3 to 10 broad. Area, estimated at 420 square miles. It abounds with fish, and its waters are slightly saline.

BALBASTRO, or BARBASTRO, bal-bas'-tro, a town of Spain, in Aragon, 30 miles from Saragossa. Pop. 5,000.

BALBEC, bäl'-bek, the Baalath of Scripture, and the ancient Heliopolis, a town of Syria, situate in a fertile valley, at the foot of Antilibanus. It is about 40 miles from Damascus, and is small and meanly built, surrounded by ruinous walls, flanked by square towers, and four miles in circuit. Pop. about 2,000. Lat. 34° 1′ N. Lon. 36° 11′ E.—Here are to be found some splendid remains of antiquity, particularly a magnificent temple, dedicated to the sun, said to have been built by the emperor Antoninus Pius. Until the time of the Moslem invasion, it was a place of considerable importance. In 1401 it was taken by Tamerlane, and in 1759 it was visited by an earthquake, which nearly reduced it to ruins.

BALBI, Gaspar, bal'-be, who, as a dealer in precious stones, left Aleppo in 1579, on a journey to the Indies, and did not return till 1588. On his return he published an account of his journey. He visited Ormuz, Goa, Cochin, and Pegu, and describes what he saw with considerable spirit and, it is believed, with accuracy. Lived in the 16th century.

Balbi, Adrien, a Venetian, who at an early period of his life was appointed professor of geography and natural philosophy in his native town, but in 1820 went to Portugal. Here in 1822 he published his "Statistical Essay on the Kingdom of Portugal." This publication procured him considerable fame, when he settled in Paris, and in 1826 published his celebrated "Geographical Atlas, &c." which was the first work to make the French acquainted with the researches of Adelung and other German philologists. This work placed him high in the estimation of the learned and the public generally, and under the administration of Martignac he was placed in easy circumstances by the French government. He subsequently gave to the world an "Abridgment of Geography," on a new plan, which has been translated into most of the European languages. In 1832 he quitted Paris for Padua, where he resided until his death. B. at Venice, 1782; D. at Padua, 1848.

Balbinus, băl-bī'-nus, a Roman, who, after governing provinces with credit and honour, assassinated the Gordians, and seized the purple. He was some time after murdered by his soldiers, A.D. 238.

Balboa, Vasco Nuñez de, vas'-ko noon'-yais bal-bo'-a, a Castilian, was one of the first who visited the West Indies, where he gained immense riches. He settled on the coast of Darien, and built a town. In 1513 he crossed the isthmus, and returned next year with a prodigious quantity of wealth. He sent an account of his discovery to Spain, and the king appointed Pedrarias D'Avila governor of Darien, who on his arrival was astonished to see Balboa in a cotton jacket, with sandals made of hemp on his feet, and dwelling in a thatched hut. The governor, notwithstanding that he had given Balboa his daughter in marriage, was jealous of his abilities, and caused him to be beheaded. Suffered, 1517.

Balbriggan, băl-brig'-ăn, a maritime town and chapelry of Ireland, 17 miles from Dublin. It is a favourite watering-place, a coastguard station, and has a harbour protected by a quay, on which there is a lighthouse. Manf. Muslin embroidery and calico and stocking weaving. "Balbriggan hosiery" is a term well known to the dealers in those articles. Pop. 2,310.

Balbus, băl'-bus, a mountain of Africa, famous for the retreat of Masinissa, after he had fought a battle against Syphax.

Balby, bal'-be, a village in the West Riding of Yorkshire, 1 mile from Doncaster. Pop. 700. Here the Society of Friends held their first meetings.

Balcanqual, Walter, băl'-kăn-qŭăl, a learned Scotch divine, who attended James I. to England, and became chaplain to the king, master of the Savoy, and representative of the Church of Scotland at the synod of Dordt. In 1624 he was made dean of Rochester; and in 1639 dean of Durham. He suffered severely in the rebellion. D. at Chirk Castle, in Denbighshire, in 1645.—He wrote the declaration of King Charles I. concerning the late tumults in Scotland, folio, 1630; epistles concerning the synod of Dordt, in John Hales's "Golden Remains," and some sermons.

Balcarry, băl-kăr'-e, a seaport of Scotland, on the Solway Frith, 10 miles from Kirkcudbright.

Balchen, John, bal'-chen, an English admiral, who, entering early into the navy, rose to the command of a ship, and distinguished himself by his bravery in the Mediterranean, under Sir George Byng. In 1734 he was made an admiral; and in 1743 was appointed governor of Greenwich Hospital. He soon after went with a squadron to relieve Sir Charles Hardy, who, with a large fleet of transports, was blockaded in the Tagus. Having accomplished this service, he sailed for England; but encountering a violent storm, his ship, the Victory, was lost on the Caskets, near Jersey, and every soul on board perished, October 3, 1744. A monument commemorates this melancholy event in Westminster Abbey. B. 1669.

Balcombe, bal'-kum, a parish in the county of Sussex, 5 miles from Cuckfield. Area, 6,050 acres. Pop. about 900.—A tunnel, 3,418 feet in length, on the line of the London and Brighton Railway, passes through this parish.

Baldegg, bald'-eg, a lake of Switzerland, 9 miles from Lucerne. Ext. 4 miles long and 1 broad. It is upwards of 1,500 feet above the level of the sea.

Balderic, or Baudry, bal'-de-rik, a French historian, who became bishop of Dol, in Brittany, and was at the council of Clermont. He wrote a history of the crusade to the year 1099. D. 1130.—There was another bishop of the same age, who wrote a chronicle of the bishops of Arras and Cambray. D. 1097.

Baldi, Bernard, bal'-de, a learned Italian, who studied at Padua, and afterwards became mathematician to the duke of Guastalla. B. at Urbino, 1553; D. 1617.—He translated into Italian several works of the ancient mathematicians, and wrote some good poems in that language. He was also the author of several philological works, and commenced a "Universal Historical Geography." His lives of mathematicians were printed in 1707.

Baldi, Lazaro, an historical painter, a native of Tuscany, and the disciple of Pietro da Cortona. He was employed by Alexander VII. to paint for the palace of the Quirinal a "David killing Goliath." Many of his pictures are to be seen in the churches at Rome. B. 1623 or 1624; D. 1703.

Baldini, Baccio, bal-de'-ne, a Florentine engraver, who is said to have been taught the art by Finiguerra, who, according to the Italians, was its inventor, but whose instructions were ill carried out by his pupil. His works, therefore, have no value further than such as arises from their being representations of the first efforts of one of the earliest Italian engravers. Lived in the 15th century.

Baldini, John Anthony, a learned Italian nobleman, who was employed as ambassador at various courts in Europe, and attended the congress at Utrecht. B. at Placentia, 1654; D. 1725.

Baldinucci, Philip, bal'-de-nootch'-e, an Italian artist and biographer, who passed an industrious life both with the pencil and the pen. B. at Florence, 1624; D. 1696.—He wrote, 1. "The General History of Painters," 6 vols. 2. "A Vocabulary of Designs." 3. "An Account of the Progress of Engraving on Copper."

Baldo, Mount, bal'-do, a mountain of Lombardy, to the E. of Lago de Garda. Height, 7,100 feet.

Baldock, bal'-dok, Ralph de, bishop of London, whom, in 1307, King Edward I. appointed lord high chancellor. D. 1313. He wrote a history of British affairs, which Leland had seen, though it is now lost. —There was at the same time one Robert de Baldock, a divine, who was in great favour with Edward II., whose misfortunes he shared, and died in Newgate.

Baldock, a market-town and parish of England, in Hertford. Corn and malt are the chief articles of traffic. Pop. 1,550. 38 miles N. of London.

Baldung, Hans, bal'-doong, called also Hans Grun, a distinguished old German painter and wood-engraver, the friend of Albert Durer. As a painter, he was considered little inferior to his great friend. His heads are the best specimens of his works. B. in Suabia, about 1470; D. 1545.

Baldwin I., bald'-win, emperor of the East, was the son of Baldwin, count of Flanders, and distinguished himself so greatly in the fourth crusade, that on the conquest of Constantinople by the Latins in 1204, he was chosen emperor. The Greeks, however, assisted by the king of Bulgaria, defeated him in a battle, 1205, at the same time making him prisoner, and he died in confinement in the following year.

Baldwin II., was the son of Peter de Courtenay, count of Auxerre, and the sister of the above emperor. He succeeded his brother Robert in the empire of the East, in 1228, being only eleven years of age. In 1261 Constantinople was taken by Michael Palæologus, and Baldwin escaped by sea to Italy, where he died in 1273. —With him terminated the dynasty of the Latin emperors of Constantinople.

Baldwin, archbishop of Canterbury in the reigns of Henry II. and Richard I. On September 3rd, 1189, he crowned the latter in Westminster Abbey, and in 1190 followed his sovereign to the Holy Land. He arrived at Acre during the siege, and died in the same year. B. at Exeter.—His works were collected and published by Tissier, in 1662.

BALDWIN I., king of Jerusalem, was the son of Eustace, count of Bouillon, and accompanied his brother Godfrey of Bouillon into Palestine, where he gained the sovereignty of the state of Edessa. He succeeded his brother on the throne of Jerusalem in 1100, and for eighteen years waged war against the Turks, the Arabs, the Persians, and the Saracens. He took many towns, and secured for the Christians the coast of Syria, from the Gulf of Issus to the confines of Egypt. D. at Laris, in the desert, 1118, and was buried on Mount Calvary.—In the first canto of the "Gerusalemme" of Tasso, the poet has depicted the character of this monarch as well as that of his brother Godfrey.

BALDWIN II., king of Jerusalem, the son of Hugh, count of Rethel, was crowned in 1118, after Eustace, brother of Baldwin I., had renounced all claim to the vacant throne. In 1120 he gained a great victory over the Saracens, but in 1124 he was taken prisoner by them, and was ransomed only by giving up the city of Tyre. In 1131 he abdicated in favour of his son-in-law, Foulques of Anjou, and retired to a monastery, where he died in the same year.—The military and religious order of the Templars, for the defence of the Holy Land, was instituted in the reign of this monarch.

BALDWIN III. was the son of Foulques of Anjou, whom he succeeded in 1143, under the guardianship of his mother. He took Ascalon and other places; but under his reign the Christians lost Edessa. B. 1130; D. at Antioch, 1162. He was succeeded by his brother, Amauri I. (See AMAURI.)

BALDWIN IV., the son of Amauri, succeeded to the throne of Jerusalem on the death of his father, in 1174; but being leprous, Raymond, count of Tripoli, governed the kingdom for him. He afterwards resigned the crown to his nephew, Baldwin V. D. 1186. The year following, his successor died of poison, supposed to have been administered by his mother, that her second husband, Guy de Lusignan, might enjoy the throne.—Soon after this event the Christians lost Jerusalem, which, in 1187, was taken by Saladin.

BALDWIN, the name of eight counts of Flanders, who lived between the beginning of the 9th and the end of the 12th century. Their reigns present nothing beyond the record of warfare with neighbouring principalities and powers. Baldwin II. married Alfrith, the daughter of Alfred of England; and Matilda, the wife of William of Normandy, afterwards king of England, was the daughter of Baldwin IV. Her father assisted William in the conquest of England, for which he received a pension of 300 marks of silver out of the English treasury.

BALDWIN, the name of two counties in the United States. 1. In the centre of Georgia. Area, 329 square miles, producing sugar and tobacco. Pop. upwards of 8,000, of whom the half are slaves. 2. In the south of Alabama. Area, 2,000 square miles, of a fertile soil. Pop. 4,414, of whom the half are slaves.

BALDWIN, or BALDWYN, William, a schoolmaster and divine, who pursued the occupation of printing in order to promote the Reformation. He is said to have written some comedies; at all events, he was "engaged in the reigns of Edward VI. and Philip and Mary, if not earlier, in preparing theatrical entertainments for the court." His name, however, is most endeared to the lovers of literature for his having been one of the authors and editors of "The Mirrour for Magistrates," which "occupies the annals of English poetry from Surrey to Spenser." Flourished in the 16th century.

BALE, BASLE, or BASEL, bal, one of the cantons of Switzerland, bounded N. by the Brisgau, W. by the Sundgau, E. by the Frickthal, and S. by Solothurn. Area, about 180 square miles. Desc. Mountainous in the S., being intersected by branches of the Jura range; and flat in the N., where it is watered by the Rhine. Rivers. The Rhine, and its tributaries the Ergolz and Birz. Other affluents of the Rhine plentifully water the whole of the canton, which altogether belongs to the basin of that river. Forests. Considerable, and chiefly consisting of ash, pine, fir, and oak. Pro. Wine, corn, and fruit. Cattle are depastured in the mountain regions, and excellent butter and cheese are made. Manf. The greater part of the population is employed in manufactures, of which ribbon-making is the most important. Woollens, linens, leather, and steel-wares are made, however, and command an extensive sale. Pop. about 78,000. Lat. between 47° 21′ and 47° 37′ N. Lon. between 7° 29′ and 7° 48′ E.—In 1832 this canton was divided into two parts, each made entirely independent of the other, respectively called Basel-county and Basel-city. The former comprises the whole territory of the old canton, with the exception of the town of Basel, its suburbs, and three parishes on the right bank of the Rhine, which together form the canton of Basel-town.

BALE, or BASEL, the capital of the above canton, and the largest town in Switzerland. It lies on the Rhine, which divides it into two unequal parts, connected by a bridge of 600 feet in length. It has a cathedral church, occupying the site of the ancient Roman fort Basilia, a town-house, an arsenal, a university, founded in 1459, an excellent library, a cabinet of medals, and botanic garden. The cathedral was built in 1019, by Henry II., and contains the tombs of Erasmus, Œclampadius, Bernouilli, and Anne, the wife of Rudolph of Hapsburg, female parent of the line of Austrian princes. The arsenal contains the armour worn by Charles the Bold at the battle of Nancy. Erasmus, Bernouilli, and Euler were professors in the university; and the library connected with the botanic garden is said to be the richest of its kind in Europe. Manf. Ribbons, silk and cotton stuffs, paper, linen, and gloves. There are also a number of dyeing-works and bleaching-fields. Pop. 22,000. Lat. 47° 33′ 31″ N. Lon. 7° 35′ E.—In the 11th century this city was the greatest of Helvetia; and there is a cross a little way from its walls, commemorating the battle of St. Jacob, fought in 1444; where, out of 1,600 Swiss, only 10 were left alive by a French army which they attacked, and which was twenty times their number. The valour displayed by the Swiss on this occasion led to their enrolment as a body-guard of the monarchs of France. The field of this severe conflict produces a red wine, called Schweizerblut (Swiss blood), which is esteemed the best in the canton. Treaties of peace between France and Spain and France and Prussia were signed here July 22, 1795; until which year the clocks of the city were kept an hour in advance of those in all other places of Europe,—a curious circumstance, for the origin of which we have no account. It is the birthplace of Bernouilli, Euler, and the two Holbeins, and was the chosen residence of Erasmus, who, in 1536, died here. It is connected by railway with France and Germany.

BALE, John, bail, an English divine, who from a Carmelite monk became a zealous Protestant and writer against popery. On the death of his patron, Lord Cromwell, he went to Holland, but returned to England on the accession of Edward VI. and obtained a living in Hampshire. In 1552 he was appointed to the bishopric of Ossory, in Ireland, where he laboured in reforming his diocese with such zeal that his life was threatened by the priests. On the accession of Mary, he retired to Bâle, in Switzerland, where he remained till Elizabeth ascended the throne, when he returned to England, and obtained a prebend of Canterbury. B. at Cove, in Suffolk, 1495; D. 1563, and was buried in Canterbury Cathedral.—He wrote several works, the best of which is entitled "An Account of the Lives of Eminent Writers of Britain."

BALEARIC ISLANDS, bāl-e-ar'-ik, a group of islands in the Mediterranean, lying off the east coast of Spain, to whom they belong, and formerly constituting the kingdom of Majorca. They are five in number,—Majorca, Minorca, Cabrera, Iviza, and Formentara. Area of the whole, 1,753 square miles. Pop. perhaps 255,000. Lat. between 38° 40′ and 40° 5′ N. Lon. between 1° and 5° E. The name of these islands is derived from ballein, 'to throw,' because the inhabitants were expert archers and slingers, besides great pirates.—Florus relates that in these isles mothers never gave children their breakfast before they had struck with an arrow a certain mark in a tree.

BALECHOU, Nicholas, bal'-shoo, a French engraver, who was expelled from the Academy of Painters for surreptitiously selling first-proof impressions of his print of Frederick Augustus, elector of Saxony and king of Poland, contrary to the orders of the dauphiness.

B. at Arles, 1710; D. 1765. His engravings are held in high estimation.

BALEN, Henry Van, ba'-len, an historical and portrait painter, whose best works are "St. John preaching in the Desert," and the "Judgment of Paris." B. at Antwerp, 1560; D. 1632. His son John Van Balen distinguished himself as a painter of history and landscapes.

BALES, Peter, bails, a celebrated penman, who excelled not only in elegant writing, but in miniature penmanship; and was employed by Walsingham in imitating the handwriting of conspirators, whose letters he had intercepted. B. 1547; D. 1610. He published in 1590 the "Writing Master," in three parts; the first teaching swift writing; the second, true writing; the third, fair writing; and as a proof of his attainments in penmanship, we are told that he wrote out the Bible in shorthand so small that it could be inclosed in the shell of an English walnut.

BALESTRA, Antony, ba-lais'-tra, an eminent historical painter, who, in 1694, gained the prize of merit given by the Academy of St. Luke. B. at Verona, 1666; D. 1740. His productions were numerous, and many of his works are to be seen in the Venetian states.

BALFOUR, Sir James, bal'-for, lord president of the Court of Session in Scotland, and the reputed author of "Practicks of the Law," rose to eminence as a privy councillor and judge, and was with Mary queen of Scots at Holyrood on the night of the assassination of Rizzio. He was, shortly afterwards, knighted by the queen, and subsequently attached himself to the fortunes of Bothwell, uniting in the conspiracy against Darnley. He prepared the house in the Kirk of Field for the atrocious murder of that unfortunate nobleman, and was, in the despatch of the earl of Lennox, charged with being an accomplice in that crime. He seems to have changed sides with every party in power. After being concerned in nearly all the stormy intrigues of the times, now fleeing from his country to save his head, and now returning, to become an accuser, a prosecutor, and condemner of others, he died 1583.

BALFOUR, James, an advocate of the Scottish bar, who wrote two philosophical dissertations against the speculations of David Hume. These performances exhibited so much candour and good-feeling, that the philosopher whose opinions he had attacked, wrote to him sentiments expressive of his esteem, and, at the same time, requested the pleasure of his friendship. In 1754 he became professor of moral philosophy in Edinburgh; and in 1761 was appointed to the chair of public law. B. 1703; D. at Pilrig, 1795.—His life was a comment on the amiable philosophy which he laboured to teach.

BALFOUR, John Hutton, M.D., F.R.S.E., professor of botany in the university of Glasgow, in which he succeeded Sir William Jackson Hooker. He has written much on botanical science, and deservedly stands high in public estimation. B. at Edinburgh.

BALFRON, bal'-fron, a village and parish of Stirlingshire, 22 miles from Glasgow. Area, 24 square miles. Pop. 2,000.

BALFROSH, or BALFUROSH, bal'-fu-rosh', an open town of Persia, in the province of Mazanderan, 20 miles from Sari. It is of an irregular form, and about a mile and a half in circuit. The inhabitants are chiefly moolahs, or learned men, merchants, and mechanics. It has a good trade in silk and cotton goods, and imports iron and naphtha. Pop. estimated at about 150,000. Lat. 35° 55′ N. Lon. 52° 40′ E.—On an artificial island on the south side of the town are the ruins of a palace built by Shah Abbas.

BALGOUNIE, BRIG OF, bal-gow'-ne, crosses the river Don in the neighbourhood of Aberdeen.

BALGUY, Thomas, bal'-gi, an eminent divine, who became prebendary of Winchester, and archdeacon of that diocese, and refused the bishopric of Gloucester. B. 1716; D. 1795.—A collection of his sermons and charges has been printed in one volume 8vo.

BALHARY, bal-ha-re, a fortified village of Hindostan, in Mysore, 187 miles from Seringapatam.

BALI, BALLY, or LITTLE JAVA, bal'-i, one of the Sunda islands, separated from Java by the Straits of Bally, 18 miles wide. Ext. about 75 miles long, by 40 broad. The mountain-ranges run from east to west, and have for their culminating point an extinct volcano, called Agoeng, the height of which is estimated at 11,326 feet. The island is well watered, and produces cotton, coffee, rice, tobacco, oil, and edible birds-nests. It imports gold, silver, ivory, opium, and betel. Pop. 700,000. Lat. 8° to 9° S. Lon. 115° E.—In 1843 a Dutch settlement was founded upon it, at a place called Port Badong.

BALINGEN, bal'-ling-en, a town of Wurtemberg, 36 miles from Stutgard. Pop. 3,000.

BALINTREE, bā-lin-tre, a village of Ireland, county of Roscommon, 80 miles from Dublin.

BALIOL, or BALLIOL, Sir John de, bal'-le-ol, founder of a college called by his name at Oxford, and governor of Carlisle, in 1248. On the marriage of Margaret, daughter of Henry III., to Alexander III., king of Scotland, the guardianship of the royal pair, as well as of the kingdom, was committed to him and Ros of Werke; but in about three years they were charged with abusing their trust, and Henry III. marched towards Scotland to punish them. However, by paying a large sum into the royal treasury, Baliol made his peace. In 1263 he laid the foundation of Baliol College, which was completed by his widow. In the contest between Henry III. and the barons, under Simon de Montfort, he sided with the king; for which the barons seized his lands. B. at Barnard Castle, Durham; D. 1269.

BALIOL, John de, son of the above, who, being at the head of the English interest in Scotland, laid claim, on the death of Queen Margaret (known as the Maiden of Norway), to the vacant throne, by virtue of his descent from David, earl of Huntingdon, brother to William the Lion, king of Scotland. His principal competitor for the crown was Robert Bruce, who was also descended from that nobleman, being the son of Isabella, his second daughter, Baliol being the grandson of Margaret, his eldest daughter. Edward I. being appointed arbitrator, declared in favour of Baliol, who did homage to him for the kingdom, November 12, 1292. But he did not hold the sceptre long; for, remonstrating against the power assumed by Edward over Scotland, he was summoned to his tribunal as a vassal. Baliol, provoked at this, concluded a treaty with France, the consequence of which was a war with England. The battle of Dunbar decided the fate of Baliol, who surrendered his crown into the hands of Edward, who sent him and his son to England, where they were committed to the Tower. At the intercession of the pope they were released, and delivered to his legate in 1299, when Baliol retired to his estates in Normandy, where he lived in retirement throughout the remainder of his life. D. 1314.—His son Edward afterwards set up a claim to the kingdom of Scotland, invaded and recovered it; but he did not keep it long, and dying afterwards without issue, the family became extinct.

BALIZE, be-leez' (Mex. ba-le'-sa), a river of Central America, which falls into the Bay of Honduras. Lat. 14° 50′ N. Lon. 91° 15′ W.

BALIZE, or BELIZE, a British colony, established at the mouth of the above river, and the only regular settlement which the English have formed in this country. Ext. 170 miles long and 100 broad. Desc. The general description of this country may be considered as embraced under the article SOUTH AMERICA; but we may say that although at the back of the settlement there is an immense swamp, it is not considered unhealthy. Rivers. The Balize, the Siboon, and Rio Hondo. Pro. Sugar, coffee, cotton, and indigo; but the country is as yet in a state of only partial development. Mahogany, cedar, logwood, and other dyewoods form articles of export. Pop. about 10,000. Lat. between 15° 54′ and 18° 30′ N. Lon. between 88° and 90° W.—This colony finally came into possession of the British in 1783.

BALIZE, a seaport, the capital of the above colony, stands at the mouth of the river Balize, and is encompassed by plantations of cocoanut-trees. It is the depôt of British goods for Central America.

BALKAN, bal-kan, 'barrier,' a mountain-chain of European Turkey, extending from Cape Emineh, on the Black Sea, to the twenty-third degree of E. longitude. (See TURKEY IN EUROPE.)

BALKASH, or TENGIZ, bal-kash, a lake of Central Asia, on the borders of Chinese Turkestan. Ext. 150 miles long and 75 broad. It has no known outlet, although it is fed by several streams.

BALKEE, bal'-ke, a town of Hindostan, fallen greatly into decay. Lat. 17° 49′ N. Lon. 77° 29′ E.

BALKH, balk, a province of Central Asia. Ext. 250 miles long and 120 broad. Lat. between 35° and 37° N. Lon. between 64° and 69° E.—This is the Bactria of the ancient Greeks. Its capital city is of the same name, and has a population of from 1,000 to 2,000.

BALL, John, ball, a Kentish preacher, who, in 1381, took part in the insurrection of Wat Tyler. To 100,000 of the insurgents on Blackheath he preached a sermon from these lines, which he took for his text:—

> When Adam delved and Eve span,
> Where was then the gentleman?

He, with Jack Straw and 1,500 others, was hanged, July 2, 1381.

BALL, a village of Ireland, in the county of Mayo, intersected by a stream; 107 miles from Dublin.

BALL, Sir Alexander John, a British naval officer, who served with great distinction in the first American war, and afterwards in the Mediterranean under Nelson. At the battle of the Nile he commanded the Alexander, and it is said that from a peculiar combustible thrown from this ship, the explosion of the French man-of-war L'Orient is to be attributed. He subsequently was engaged in besieging the French garrison at Malta, but with the most inadequate means, both in men and supplies. The French, however, were at last compelled to surrender, and in 1800 Malta was occupied by the British, who have ever since retained it. Sir Alexander was made governor of the island, where he died in 1809, on the very day he was appointed rear-admiral of the red. He was buried close to the remains of Sir Ralph Abercrombie, and a splendid monument was erected.—He early entered the naval service, choosing a sailor's life, it is said, from the reading of "Robinson Crusoe."

BALLAGHY, bäl'-a-gi, a village of Ireland, county of Londonderry, 18 miles from Coleraine.

BALLANTRAE, bal'-an-trai, a town and parish of Ayrshire, Scotland, communicating with Glasgow thrice a week by steam-packets. Pop. about 2,000.

BALLANTYNE, James, bäl'-an-tine, a printer of Edinburgh, at whose press the novels of Sir Walter Scott were printed. He at one time edited a paper called the "Kelso Mail," and for many years conducted the "Edinburgh Weekly Journal." B. at Kelso; D. 1833.

BALLAS, bal'-as, a trading village on the Nile, in Upper Egypt, 10 miles from Dendera.

BALLENSTEDT, bal'-en-stet, a town of Germany, 27 miles from Nordhausen. Pop. 4,200.

BALLENY ISLANDS, bal'-e-ni, a group of five, in the Antarctic Ocean, discovered in 1839. They are volcanic, and of small size. Lat. 66° 4′ S. Lon. 163° 11′ E.

BALLESTEROS, Don Francisco, ba-lais-tair-os, a Spanish commander during the Peninsular war. On the invasion of the French, he, with his regiment and the troops of Castaños and Blake, had frequent sanguinary encounters with the enemy in the south of Spain. The regency of Cadiz afterwards made him lieutenant-general, and gave him the command of the army of Andalusia, where he was opposed to the most famous of Napoleon's marshals, Soult, Mortier, &c.; and when defeated, always adroitly made his escape. On the landing of the British, the chief command of the combined armies was given to the duke of Wellington. This measure Ballesteros resolutely opposed, and was, in consequence, banished to Ceuta, but was afterwards permitted to return to the army. When Ferdinand was restored, he was made minister of war, but soon after lost his office, and was sent to Valladolid. In 1820 we find him again commander of the Spanish forces, and compelled to yield to the superior strength of the French, when a convention was signed at Grenada. Subsequently Ferdinand annulled the constitution, and dismissed all the civil and military functionaries, when Ballesteros retired to Paris, where he died, 1832. B. at Saragossa, 1770.

BALLEXERD, James, bal'-ex-erd, a citizen of Geneva, who wrote a book on the physical education of children, which obtained the prize given by a society in Holland. He was also the author of a dissertation on this question, What are the principal causes of the deaths of so many children? B. 1726; D. 1774.

BALLIN, Claude, bal-ä, a French artist, who, at the age of nineteen, made four silver basins, on which were represented the four ages of the world, which were purchased by Cardinal Richelieu, who employed him to make four vases after the antique, to match them. He also executed several handsome pieces for Louis XIV. On the death of Varin, he was made director of the mint for casts and medals. B. 1615; D. 1678.

BALLINA, bäl'-e-na', a town of Ireland, in the county of Mayo, on the Moy, 6 miles from Killala. This place was formerly called Belleek, signifying 'the ford of flags.' Pop., with Arduaree, which is in Sligo, 6,500.

BALLINAHINCH, bal'-e-na-hinch', a barony in the province of Connaught, Ireland, 37 miles from Galway. Pop. 24,000.—In this barony is the mountain group called the "Twelve Pins." There is a small town of the same name in Ulster.

BALLINAKIL, bäl-i-nä-kil', a market-town of Ireland, in Queen's county, 14 miles from Carlow. Pop. about 1,200, mostly engaged in woollen-weaving.

BALLINAMUCK, bäl'-i-na-muk', a village of Ireland, 12 miles from Longford. Here a part of the French army, commanded by General Humbert, was, in 1798, captured by Lord Cornwallis.

BALLINASEREEN, bäl-i-näs'-e-ren, a parish in Londonderry, Ireland. Area, 32,492 acres. Pop. 8,384.

BALLINASLOE, bäl'-i-nä-slo', a thriving and populous town of Ireland, standing on both sides of the Suck, in the counties of Roscommon and Galway, and 30 miles from Galway. The town is neatly built, and is the head-quarters of the Galway constabulary force. It is chiefly noted for its great wool fair and cattle-market. On an average, 12,000 head of black cattle and 90,000 sheep are annually disposed of in this market, which is the largest in Ireland. Pop. about 5,000.

BALLINDERRY, bäl'-in-der-e, a village and parish of Ireland, in the county of Antrim, 73 miles from Dublin. Pop. 5,679. There are two other parishes of this name in Ireland.

BALLINGARRY, bal'-in-gär-e, the name of several parishes with small populations in Ireland.

BALLINROBE, bal-in-robe, a town and parish of Ireland, in the county of Mayo, 15 miles from Castlebar. The town stands on the river Robe, about 3 miles from where it debouches into Lough Mask. Pop. of parish, 11,150; of town, about 3,000.

BALLINTEMPLE, bäl-in-temp'-el, the name of several parishes with small populations in Ireland.

BALLINTOBBER, bäl-in-tob'-er, the name of two parishes with small populations in Ireland.

BALLINURE, bäl'-in-ure, the name of two parishes with small populations in Ireland.

BALLON, bal-ong', a town of France, 15 miles from Le Mans, on the Orne, in the department of the Sarthe. Pop. upwards of 1,000.—It has the remains of an old castle, which, in the wars between the French and English, in the early part of the 15th century, was of some consequence.

BALLY, bäl'-e, a considerable town on the east coast of the island of Lombock, one of the East-India isles. Lat. 8° 31′ S. Lon. 116° 28′ E.

BALLY, signifying a town, is a frequent prefix in the names of Irish villages and parishes, the populations of which, except in a very few instances, do not reach beyond 5,000.

BALLYCOTTON, bäl-e-kot'-on, an island in St. George's Channel, on the south-west coast of Ireland. Lat. 51° 50′ N. Lon. 7° 59′ W.

BALLYDONEGAN, BALLYDOVELIN BAYS, bäl-i-don'-e-gan, two bays on the south-west coast of Ireland.

BALLYHLA BAY, bäl-i-e'-la, a bay on the west coast of Ireland. Lat. 52° 53′ N. Lon. 9° 20′ W.

BALLYMENA, bäl'-i-me'-na, a town of Ireland, county of Antrim, on the Braid, 22 miles from Carrickfergus. Manf. Principally linen goods, and there is a weekly market for horses and cattle. Pop., with Henryville, 6,493.—It is by railway connected with Carrickfergus.

BALLYMONEY, bäl-i-mon'-e, a town and parish of Ireland, in the county of Antrim, where there is a monthly market for linens. Pop. of parish, 10,322; of town, 2,578.

BALLYSHANNON, bäl-i-shän'-on, a seaport-town of Ireland, county of Donegal, situate on a bay at the mouth of a river flowing from Lough Erne, which is crossed by a bridge of fourteen arches. It is 40 miles from Londonderry, is the head-quarters of the county militia, and has a good harbour, and two fisheries of eels and salmon. Pop. 3,697.

BALME, COL DE, bam, a pass of the Alps, forming the limit between Savoy and the Valais, and leading from the valley of Trient into that of Chamouni. Height, 7,218 feet above the level of the sea.

BALMERINO, bäl-me-re'-no, a village and parish of Scotland, in Fife, on the Tay, 8 miles from St. Andrews. Pop. about 1,000.—The ruins of the abbey of Balmerino, founded in 1229 by Alexander II., are here to be seen.

BALMORAL, bäl-mo-räl', the Highland residence of her Majesty Queen Victoria, in the parish of Crathie, Aberdeenshire, Scotland, 52 miles from Aberdeen, and 175 from Edinburgh.

BALNEÆ, 'baths,' bäl'-ne-e, were very numerous at Rome, private as well as public. In the ancient times simplicity was observed, but in the age of the emperors they became expensive. They were used after walking, exercise, or labour, and were deemed more necessary than luxurious. The Roman emperors generally built baths, and all endeavoured to eclipse each other in the magnificence of the structures. It is said that Diocletian employed 40,000 of his soldiers in building his baths; and when they were finished, he destroyed all the workmen. Alexander Severus first permitted the people to use them in the night. They generally read in bathing, and we find many compositions written while using the bath.

BALSHAM, Hugh de, bal-sham, bishop of Ely, who founded Peter-house, Cambridge. Lived in the 13th century.

BALSHAM, a parish in Cambridgeshire, 9 miles from Cambridge, in which are situate the Gogmagog Hills. Area, 4,402 acres. Pop. 1,352.

BALTA, bäl-ta, one of the Shetland islands, where, in 1817, experiments were made on the variations of the seconds pendulum. Lat. 60° 44′ 24″ N. Lon. 47′ 42″ W.

BALTHAZAR, Christopher, bal-ta'-zar, alearned French writer, who renounced his profession as an advocate, and embraced the Protestant religion. In 1659 the national synod at Loudun settled upon him a pension for his services as the champion of the Reformed. He combated Baronius, the librarian of the Vatican, in the time of Clement VIII., with great ability. Lived in the 17th century.

BALTHAZARINI, bal-ta'-za-re'-ne, an Italian musician, who was much admired at the court of Henry III. of France. In 1581 he composed a ballet for the nuptials of the duke de Joyeuse with Mademoiselle de Vaudemont, sister to the queen. This performance was called "Ceres and her Nymphs," and is supposed to be the origin of the ballet héroique in France.

BALTIC PORT, bal'-tik, a seaport of European Russia, in Esthonia, 150 miles from Riga.

BALTIC PROVINCES is the name employed to distinguish the Russian governments of Courland, Esthonia, Livonia, and St. Petersburg, with a part of Finland on the Baltic Sea.

BALTIC SEA, an inland sea in the north-west of Europe, which is, perhaps, more properly, a great gulf of the German Ocean. It begins at the Danish islands of Zealand and Funen, and is formed by the coasts of Denmark, Germany, Prussia, Russia, and Sweden. Ext. 900 miles, from Swinemunde in the S. to Tornea in the N., with a varying breadth of from 40 to 200. Area, including the three gulfs of Bothnia, Finland, and Riga, estimated at 160,000 square miles. As it receives the drainage of more than a fifth of Europe, its basin has been estimated at 900,000 square miles. Desc. As no sea has a greater influx of fresh water, it contains comparatively little salt; whilst the great quantities of sand and mud carried into it by the rivers have considerably raised its bottom, and gradually lessened its depth. It is frozen for about three months every year, so as to prevent navigation altogether. There are three passages from the Cattegat into the Baltic: the Sound, the Great Belt, and the Little Belt: of these the most frequented is the Sound. In 1323 it was frozen so hard that for six weeks travelling on the ice was carried on between Germany and Denmark. During the Russian war of 1854-55, the Baltic Sea was traversed by the allied French and English fleets. For the various incidents of the war of that period, see SWEABORG, &c.

BALTIMORE, bal'-ti-more, a decayed town of Ireland, in the county of Cork, situate on a headland projecting into the sea, with a good harbour, 13 miles from Bantry. Pop. 200.—In the beginning of the 17th century the Algerine pirates plundered the town, and carried away 200 prisoners to their country.

BALTIMORE, a county of the United States, in Maryland, on the west side of Chesapeake Bay, N. of Patapsco river. Area, 700 square miles. In a commercial point of view, this county ranks fifth in the Union. Pro. Wheat, oats, Indian corn, butter, beef, and pork. Minerals. Iron, copper, granite, gneiss, hornblende, and limestone. Manf. Woollens and cottons, iron and brass articles, earthenware, and chemicals. Pop. upwards of 210,000. In this county, the Baltimore and Ohio, Baltimore and Susquehanna, and the Philadelphia and Baltimore railways terminate.

BALTIMORE, a city and port of entry of the United States, in the above county, Maryland. It stands on the north side of Patapsco river, 14 miles from its entrance into Chesapeake Bay, and is generally well built. The houses are chiefly of brick; many of them handsome, and some splendid. Its principal street runs nearly east and west, parallel with the harbour, and is intersected by others at right angles. North and east of the city the land rises to a considerable elevation, from which there is a noble view of the city and harbour. It has several literary institutions, and a medical college, which was founded in 1807. The city is built round a bay, which sets up from the north side of the Patapsco, and affords a spacious and convenient harbour. A small river, called Jones' Falls, empties into the north side of the harbour, and divides the city into two parts, connected by bridges. Baltimore contains the state penitentiary, the city and county almshouse, a court-house, a museum, a theatre, a custom-house, an hospital (in which there is a fine collection of anatomical preparations in wax), an exchange (an immense edifice), market-houses, banks, and churches for Roman Catholics, Episcopalians, Methodists, Baptists, and Presbyterians; besides two monuments, called the Washington and the Battle monuments. Pop. 169,054. Lat. 39° 17′ N. Lon. 76° 36′ W. By the extensive railway system now permeating the United States, Baltimore has easy communication with the most important places in the Union.—On September 12th, 1814, the British made an attack on Baltimore, but were repulsed.

BALTIMORE, George Calvert, Lord, founded the colony of Maryland, in N. America, Charles I. having granted him the whole of that tract of country which now constitutes the state of Maryland; he died, however, before the grant was legalized; but his son Cecil, the second Lord Baltimore, received the patent or charter confirming him in its possession. The instrument is dated the 20th June, 1632, and invests him and his heirs with full powers over the colony, to hold it "as of our castle of Windsor, and in fee and common soccage, by fealty only for all services, and not in capite or by knight's service; yielding and paying therefor to us, two Indian arrows of those parts every year, on Easter-Tuesday, and also the fifth part of all gold and silver mines which shall hereafter be discovered." In 1634 the colony was founded, and called Maryland, after Henrietta Maria, the wife of Charles I. Notwithstanding some difficulties thrown in the way of the colonists on account of their religious tenets, being all Catholics, the colony flourished; and although Lord Baltimore was the proprietor of Maryland, it is believed that he never saw it. D. 1676.

BALTINGLASS, bäl-tin-glass, a town and parish of Ireland, county of Wicklow, on the Slaney, 29 miles from Dublin. Area, 5,273 acres. Manf. Linen and woollen cloths. Pop. of parish, 4,163; of town, 1,572.

BALTONSBURY, bal-tons-bur'-e, a hamlet and parish of England, county of Somerset. Area, 2,700 acres. Pop. 760.

BALTSCHIK, or BALDJIK, balt'-jik, a town of European Turkey, 18 miles from Varna. In its neighbourhood are the ruins of Tomi, to which the poet Ovid was banished.

Balue, John, ba'-loo, a Frenchman, who, by his servility and art, obtained the see of Angers, after he had procured the deposition of his patron and benefactor, the bishop of that diocese. By his intrigues, he induced Paul II. to give him a cardinal's hat. He engaged in a secret correspondence with the dukes of Burgundy and Berri, disclosing all the secrets of the state, which, being discovered by Louis XI., he was imprisoned eleven years in an iron cage, which he himself, it is said, had invented. On regaining his liberty, he went to Rome, and, working on the weakness of the pope, was sent to France as legate by Sixtus IV. B. about 1420; D. 1491.

Balzac, bal'-zak, a village and parish of France, 3 miles from Angoulême, in the department of Charente. Pop. 1,000.

Balzac, Honoré de, a French novelist, who on quitting school, was placed with a notary in Paris, and commenced his literary career by writing for the journals. Under the name of Horace de St. Aubin, between the years 1821 and 1827, he published many tales; but they attracted little attention. The first work which brought him prominently into notice was his "Peau de Chagrin," after which he continued to supply the public appetite for his productions with indefatigable industry. For twenty years he laboured at a series of compositions, which, under the title of "Comédie Humaine," were to embrace every phase of human society: some of these were very successful. B. at Tours, 1799; D. at Paris, 1850.

Balzac, John Lewis Guez de, a noble French writer, to whom Cardinal Richelieu granted a pension, and gave him the places of counsellor of state and historiographer royal. He gained great popularity by his "Letters," which were first published in 1624. At the close of life, Balzac, who had indulged in all the elegancies of a dissipated court, became very devout, had apartments fitted up for him in a convent, and bestowed considerable sums on the poor. B. at Angoulême, 1594; D. 1655. Besides his "Letters," he wrote—1. Le Prince; 2. Le Socrate Chrétien; 3. L'Aristippe; 4. Entretiens; 5. Christ Victorieux.

Bamba, bam'-ba, a province of the kingdom of Congo, extending upwards of 200 miles into the interior. It is considered one of the richest districts in Congo, having mines of silver, lead, iron, copper, and salt. Lat. 7° 2′ S. Lon. 13° 52′ E.

Bambara, bam-bar'-a, an ancient city in the province of Sinde, in Hindostan, now in ruins. Lat. 24° 46′ N. Lon. 67° 50′ E.

Bambarra, bam-bar'-ra, a large and powerful kingdom of Central Africa, bounded on the N. by Ludamar and Beroo, on the W. by Kaarta and Manding, on the E. by Timbuctoo and Baedoo, and on the S. by Kong and Mamana. Desc. The country is in general fertile, and is traversed by the Niger (here called the Joliba), which, from west to east, is navigable by canoes through the whole of its extent. The butter and cotton trees, the baobob, tamarind, date, and oil-palm, are indigenous; and maize, millet, rice, and cassava yield two crops a year. The inhabitants have made considerable progress in agricultural arts as well as in those of civil life. Manf. Leather, iron and gold ornaments, and various kinds of dyed fabrics. A considerable trade is carried on from Timbuctoo to Guinea. Exp. Iron, grain, ivory, slaves, and cloths. Imp. Arms, hardwares, cotton goods, and salt. Pop. estimated at 2,000,000, chiefly pagans. Lat. between 12° and 15° 22′ N. Lon. between 15° E. and 5° 20′ W.

Bamberg, bam'-bairg, a city of Bavaria, in the circle of Upper Franconia, is situate on the Regnitz, which enters into the Maine a little below the town. It contains a cathedral, in which is the tomb of the emperor Henry II. and his empress Cunegunda, besides various churches and monasteries; but perhaps the most interesting of the public institutions is the university, originally founded in 1147. The principal charitable establishments are Ludwig's hospital, the lazaretto, the house of correction, and the workhouse. Manf. Principally gloves, porcelain, jewellery, tobacco, wax, starch, musical instruments, and marble wares. Large quantities of liquorice and garden seeds are raised in the neighbourhood, and the beer of Bamberg is so much in favour as to require upwards of 60 breweries to meet the demand for it. Pop. about 24,000. It is connected by railway with Nurnberg. Lat 49° 36′ N. Lon. 10° 35′ E.

Bamboccio, bam-boch'-e-o, an eminent painter, whose real name was Peter Van Laer; but he is better known by the nickname of Bamboccio, on account of his deformity. He lived at Rome several years, and improved himself by a close application to his profession. He painted inns, farriers' shops, and cattle, with great effect. His style is soft, and his touch delicate, with great transparency of colouring. B. at Laerden, near Narden, 1613; D. 1673.

Bamborough, or Bamburgh, bam'-bur-o, a village and parish in the county of Northumberland, 16 miles from Berwick. It stands on the sea-coast, and has a castle close to the shore, which, according to ancient historians, was built in 548, by Ina, king of the Northumbrians. This fortress is now converted to the charitable purpose of giving shelter to shipwrecked seamen. Pop. 4,545.

Bambouk, bam-book, a kingdom of Central Africa, lying between the Senegal and Gambia, and inclosed by the upper courses of the rivers Faleme and Senegal. Ext. Unascertained, but supposed to be about 100 miles from north to south, and 80 from east to west. Desc. Mountainous, but on the whole well watered and fertile. Pro. Maize, millet, cotton, and immense water-melons. It abounds with leguminous plants, and the lower lands, which are exposed to the inundations of the rivers, yield large crops of rice of the finest quality. Climate. The most unhealthy on the face of the globe, and uninhabitable by Europeans. Minerals. Gold in abundance, which is given to the Moors in exchange for salt. Pop. Unascertained. The inhabitants are a fierce Mandingo race, and are backward in the arts of civilization. In the 15th century this country was occupied by the Portuguese.

Bambridge, Christopher, bām'-bridj, archbishop of York, a native of Westmoreland, who was sent by Henry VIII. as an ambassador to Pope Julius II., who gave him a cardinal's hat. In 1514 he was poisoned by his servant, in revenge for some blows which he had inflicted upon him.

Bamian, or Baumeean, ba-me'-an, a valley and pass of Afghanistan, about a mile broad, and bounded on each side by perpendicular rocks. The elevation of the pass is 8,496 feet. Lat. 34° 17′ N. Lon. 68° 8′ E. —There is a town of the same name, which may be considered to occupy the whole extent of the valley, in which there are many relics of antiquity, in the shape of colossal idols and vast caves cut out of the face of the rock. These caves are so numerous as to extend in a continuous series for eight miles, and two of the idols are upwards of 130 feet in height. Besides these extraordinary remains of a past age and people, the valley is strewed with the ruins of the city of Ghulghuleh, which was destroyed, about the year 1221, by Zinghis Khan.

Bammakoo, bam'-a-koo, a town of Bambarra, in Africa, on the Niger, here called the Joliba. Lat. 12° 50′ N. Lon. 5° 48′ W.

Bampfield, or Bampfylde, Francis, bām'-feeld, a nonconformist divine, who, in 1641, obtained a prebend in Exeter cathedral, and was also minister of Sherborne, in Dorsetshire, but was deprived of both situations at the Restoration, for nonconformity. He was imprisoned in Newgate, for holding conventicles, where he died in 1684.—He wrote a book in vindication of the observation of the seventh-day sabbath, and another called the "House of Wisdom." The object of this book was to make the Hebrew "the universal language over all the inhabited earth, to be taught in all schools, and children to be taught it as their mother tongue." All books, too, that were in the world, were to be translated into that language; and the only philosophy that was to be tolerated, was to proceed from Scripture. The Utopian character of such notions will, we fear, in the reader's estimation, scarcely coincide with the title of his book—as containing much "wisdom."

Bampoora, bam-poor'-a, a town in Hindostan, in Rajpootana, about 50 miles from Kotah. Pop. estimated at 20,000.

Bampton, or Bathampton, bāmp'-ton, a market-town and parish of Devonshire, 6 miles from Tiverton.

Area, 8,130 acres. Pop. about 2,500.—There are several other English parishes with small populations of this name.

BAMPTON, Rev. John, the founder of the celebrated series of lectures at Oxford which bear his name. He was educated at Trinity College, and to the university bequeathed, upon trust, his lands and estates, for the endowment of eight divinity-lecture sermons, to be delivered annually. These lectures form a valuable body of divinity, and a complete set of them is worth about £50. B. 1689; D. 1751.

BANAGANPILLY, ba'-na-gan-pil'-e, a village of Hindostan, in the Balaghaut ceded territories, 70 miles from Cuddapah. It is celebrated for its diamond-mines. Lat. 14° 28′ N. Lon. 79° E.

BANAGHAR, bān'-a-ghar, a town of Ireland, in King's county, on the Shannon, 15 miles from Athlone. Pop. 1,846.—The Grand Canal locks down into the Shannon near this place.

BANAGHAR, a parish of Ireland, in Ulster, 16 miles from Londonderry. Area, 32,475 acres. Pop. 5,036.

BANALBUFAR, ba'-nal-boo'-far, a town in the island of Majorca, 14 miles from Palmas. Pop. 5,000. In its neighbourhood are marble-quarries.

BANAT, ba'-nat, a province of S. Hungary, lying between Transylvania and Wallachia on the E., and the Theiss on the W. Area, about 7,600 square miles. Desc. Mountainous in the E. and swampy in the W. Rivers. The Temes, Alt-bega, and the Karusch. Pro. Maize, wheat, other grains, and cotton. Silkworms are reared, and the cattle and horses are in high estimation. Minerals. Iron and copper in the mountain regions, and some gold has been discovered. Pop. in 1837, 243,923.—Banat is one of the military frontiers of Austria, formed in 1807 to repel the incursions of the Turks, and as a cordon against the plague.

BANAWARAM, ba'-na-war-am, a town of Hindostan, in Mysore, 76 miles from Seringapatam. Lat. 13° 24′ N. Lon. 76° 13′ E.—This place is situate in a fine open country, by the side of a large tank, which, when visited by the traveller Buchanan, was dry.

BANBRIDGE, bān'-bridj, a town of Ireland, in Ulster, 7 miles from Dromore. It stands on the river Baun, and is a neat, thriving place, being the centre of the linen trade of the county. Pop. 3,300.

BANBURY, bān'-bur-e, a market-town and parish of Oxfordshire, standing on the Charwell, 21 miles from Oxford. It is noted for its cheese, ale, and cakes; has markets for agricultural produce, and a considerable carrying trade by the Oxford and Birmingham Canal. Pop. upwards of 8,000.—Here the battle of Edgecott, or Banbury, was fought, in 1469, between the royalists and the rebels, who were encouraged to rise against the authority of Edward IV. by the earl of Warwick.

BANCA, BANKA, or BANGKA, ban-ka, one of the islands of the Indian Archipelago, belonging to Holland, and lying between Borneo and Sumatra. Ext. 108 miles long, and its broadest part about 64. Area, estimated at 4,300 square miles. Desc. Hilly, but none of its elevations are above 2,000 feet. Climate. Unhealthy, especially along the coast, where are numerous swamps, which render fever so prevalent, that the Dutch soldier conceives the being ordered to Banca as the preliminary step to his immediate death. Pro. The climate not being favourable to cultivation, agriculture is not followed to a great extent; among the vegetable products may be named dragon's blood, benzoin, nutmegs, sago, cassia, and sassafras. Minerals. Tin is the great mineral of this island; the first deposits of it were discovered by chance in 1710, and the yield has reached, in one year, 4,189 tons, of a quality nearly equal to that of Britain. The other minerals are iron, lead, copper, silver, and arsenic, rock-crystal, amethyst, and in the west part there are beds of lignite. Pop. 35,000, chiefly Malays and Chinese, the latter being the only laborious race on the island. Lat. between 1° 27′ and 3° 4′ S. Lon. between 105° 15′ and 106° 40′ E. Banca was ceded to Holland for Cochin in 1814.

BANCA, STRAITS OF, separate the above island from Sumatra, and are from 8 to 20 miles in width.

BANCALLAN, ban'-kal-an, a large and populous town near the western extremity of the island Madura, in the Malay Archipelago, 20 miles from Surabaya.

Lat. 7° 2′ S. Lon. 112° 43′ E.—Here the sultan of the island has a palace, in which he resides, and the Dutch have a residency.

BANCAPOOR, ban'-ka-poor, a large town and district of Hindostan, in the presidency of Bombay, 38 miles from Dharwar.

BANCE ISLAND, bānce, a small fortified island at the mouth of the Sierra Leone river, West Africa.

BANCHORY, bān'-shor-e, two parishes of small population in Aberdeenshire and Kincardine, in the north of Scotland.

BANCHI, Seraphin, ban'-ke, a Dominican of Florence, to whom Peter Barrière, a fanatic, revealed his intention of murdering King Henry IV. The priest communicated the secret to a nobleman, whereby the horrid design was prevented. The king gave him as a reward the archbishopric of Angoulême, which he afterwards resigned, and retired to a monastery at Paris, where he died, 1622.

BANCOCK (see BANGKOK). Lat. 13° 40′ N. Lon. 101° 10′ E.

BANCOORAH, or WEST BURDWAN, ban-koo'-ra, formerly called the Jungle Mehals, in the presidency of Bengal. Area, 1,476 square miles. Desc. Generally level, but it has gentle undulations, and inclines gradually to the south-east. It is watered by several streams, which are only navigable during the rainy season. The hills are covered with forest and jungle, and cultivation only exists in the valleys. Pop. estimated at 480,000. Lat between 22° 53′ and 23° 43′ N. Lon. between 87° and 87° 39′ E.

BANCOORAH, the chief town of the above district, 327 miles from Calcutta.

BANCOOT, or FORT VICTORIA, ban-coot, a fortified town of Hindostan, on the coast of Concan. Lat. 17° 56′ N. Lon. 72° 55′ E. It has a small trade in salt.

BANCROFT, George, bān'-kroft, is an American, and the son of the Rev. Aaron Bancroft, D.D., author of a "Life of Washington." He was originally designed for the pulpit, but a love of literature turned the course of his studies into different channels from such as are necessary to form the deep theologian and sound divine. His first publication was a volume of poems, in his twenty-third year; and shortly afterwards he produced a translation of Heeren's "Reflections on the Politics of Ancient Greece." In 1838 he was made collector of the port of Boston, and in 1845 was appointed secretary of the navy of the United States. In the following year he was despatched as minister plenipotentiary to Great Britain, where he resided till 1849, and where he was much esteemed and respected. On his return to his native country, he adopted New York as the place of his residence, and entered eagerly into literary pursuits. He published some of his orations, and contributed articles to the North American and Boston Quarterly Reviews; but it is by his "History of the United States" that he is most widely and likely to be most permanently known. Of this work seven volumes have appeared: the last was published in 1858, and embraces the first period of the American revolution, leading us, in a lucid and well-sustained narrative, through all those stirring events and conflict of opinion which characterized the first features of the revolution immediately after the blockade of Boston. As an historian, his position ranks with Prescott and the best American writers. B. in Worcester, Massachussetts, 1800.

BANCROFT, Richard, archbishop of Canterbury, who evinced so much learning in combating the tenets of the Puritans, that in 1597 he was made bishop of London. He bore a principal part in the famous conference at Hampton-court, about the beginning of the reign of King James I.; and, on the death of Archbishop Whitgift, was translated to Canterbury, where he exerted himself with great vigilance in behalf of the Anglican church. B. at Farnworth, Lancashire, 1544; D. in his palace at Lambeth, 1610.—Fuller says that, when Bancroft was out of passion, "he spake most politely;" but his severity was very great against the Puritans. He was the principal supervisor of the authorized translation of the Bible.

BANCROFT, John, a nephew of the above, was in 1609 elected master of University College, Oxford, where he continued above twenty years. He was at great pains and expense to recover the ancient lands belonging to that foundation. In 1622 he was made bishop of Oxford, for which see he built the palace of Cuddesden. D. 1640.

Banda Islands, ban'-da, a group of islands in the Moluccа Archipelago, belonging to the Dutch. They are twelve in number, but only six of them are inhabited. Desc. Lofty, with precipitous mountains, distinctly marked with volcanic features. Pro. The four largest are appropriated to the cultivation of nutmegs, of which about 500,000 lbs. are annually produced. About 150,000 lbs. of mace are also produced, and these form the principal articles of export. Imp. Provisions, manufactured goods, cutlery, iron, birds-nests, pearls, sago, and tortoise-shell. Pop. upwards of 5,000; of whom two thirds are slaves and convicts. Lat. between 3° 50′ and 4° 40′ S. Lon. between 129° 38′ and 130° 2′ E. Of the six inhabited islands of this group, Great Banda is the largest, although Banda Neira is the most important, and that upon which the governor resides. On one of the islands, Goenong Api, there is one of the most active volcanoes in the Indian Archipelago: it forms an immense cone, rising to 7,880 feet above the level of the sea. The presence of this volcano subjects the group to frequent earthquakes, some of which have proved exceedingly destructive. They were discovered in 1512 by Antonio Abreu, a Portuguese, and settled by his countrymen in 1524; but they were driven out in 1599 by the Dutch. These islands, which had been taken by the British, were restored at the peace of Amiens, in 1801, but were again captured in 1810, and once more restored at the general peace of 1814.

Banda Oriental, South America. (See Uruguay.)

Banda, or Bandah, a flourishing town and district of Hindostan, tributary to the British, 95 miles from Allahabad. Area, 2,878 square miles. Pop. 552,526.

Bandarra, Gonzales, ban-dar'-ra, a Portuguese poet, whose verses aspired to be prophetic of the fate of Portugal. He fell under the suspicion of the Inquisition, and figured in an auto-da-fé in 1541, narrowly escaping being burnt as a heretic. D. 1556.—Although he could neither read nor write, his songs were in the mouths of all; and there appear to have been both talent and spirit in them.

Bandello, Matthew, ban-dail'-o, an Italian Dominican monk, who wrote some lively novels after the manner of Boccacio. On the invasion by the Spaniards of the Milanese territory, in 1525, he went to France, where he obtained the bishopric of Agen, but resigned it in 1555. D. 1561.—This author, besides his novels, wrote a vast number of Italian verses on different subjects.

Bandinelli, Baccio, ban'-de-nel'-e, a distinguished Florentine sculptor and painter, greatly patronized by Cosmo de Medici, Francis I., and other eminent personages. His works do not place him in the first rank of Italian sculptors, but he is among the foremost in the second. Among his best performances is his "Hercules and Cacus," which was executed with a view to rival the "David" of Michael Angelo, but which does not nearly approach the excellence of that composition. B. at Florence, 1487; D. 1560. Many of the works of this artist are to be seen in the churches and palaces of Florence. He was made a cavalier by Clement VII., and also by Charles V.

Bandon, ban'-don, a river of Ireland, in the county of Cork, which rises in the Carbery mountains, and after a course of 40 miles falls into the sea at Kinsale, of which it forms the harbour.

Bandon, or Bandonbridge, a town of Ireland, 13 miles from Cork, and standing on the river Bandon, which the dreamy Spenser has celebrated as—

"The pleasant Bandon, crowned by many a wood."

The houses are built of stone, and there are several good streets, but no structures of remarkable interest. Manf. Linens, camlets, and coarse woollen stuffs; and there are works for tanning, brewing, and dyeing, particularly blue colours. Pop. about 9,000.

Banff, banf, a maritime shire of Scotland, bounded N. by the Murray Frith, S. and E. by the county of Aberdeen, and W. by the counties of Elgin and Inverness. Ext. 67 miles long, with an average breadth of about 12. Area, 647 square miles. Desc. This shire contains some of the highest mountains in Scotland; among which is Cairngorm, noted for its beautiful topazes, and attaining an elevation of 4,060 feet; Corryhabbie, Knockhill, and Cabrach, which respectively are 2,558, 2,500, and 2,377 feet above the level of the sea. The north side of Benmuedui, the loftiest of all the Scottish mountains, is also in this county. The valleys are fertile, and there is a level strip of country along the coast which is pretty well cultivated. Cattle-rearing, however, is the chief branch of rural industry. Rivers. The Spey, Avon, and Deveron. Minerals. Marble, limestone, granite, marl, slate, topazes, and rock-crystal. Manf. Inconsiderable; yarn and linen cloths. Pop. 54,171.

Banff, a handsome seaport-town and royal borough of Scotland, and capital of the above county. It is situate at the mouth of the Deveron, over which is a fine bridge of seven arches; and its harbour is protected by a castle. The only public buildings of note are the town-house, which has an elegant spire, and an academy. Manf. Thread, linen, stockings, soap, and tanning; and it has a small trade with Russia, Sweden, and Holland. Pop. 5,309. Lat. 54° 40′ 18″ N. Lon. 2° 31′ 30″ W. Banff was constituted a royal borough by a charter of Robert II., dated 1372; which was afterwards confirmed by James VI. and Charles II. In 1645 it was plundered by the marquis of Montrose. In 1613 James Sharp, the celebrated archbishop of St. Andrews, who was murdered on Magus Moor, was born in the castle; and, in 1700, James Macpherson, the notorious Highland outlaw immortalized by Burns, was here executed.

Bangalore, ban'-ga-lor, a fortified town of Hindostan, in Mysore, formerly the capital of a kingdom, 70 miles from Seringapatam. Its houses are generally two stories high, constructed of red earth and roofed with tiles. In its neighbourhood the vine and the cypress flourish luxuriantly, and strawberries are raised in the gardens. Pop. 60,000. Lat. 13° N. Lon. 77° 40′ E. In 1791 this town was stormed and taken by the British under Lord Cornwallis.

Bangkok, or Bancock, băn'-kok, a large city, and the capital of the kingdom of Siam, standing on the banks of the Menam, 15 miles above where it falls into the Gulf of Siam. It comprises three divisions: the town itself, the floating town, and the royal palace. This arrangement is necessary, on account of the annual inundations to which the city is exposed. There are no regular streets, and each house has a small boat or canoe always ready for use. The palace is built on an island from two to three miles in length, separated from the land by a narrow arm of the river. The floating town is composed of movable bamboo rafts, each of which contains a row of eight or ten houses. The city is adorned with many Buddhist temples, conspicuous by their tall spires and the gilding with which they are ornamented. Exp. Pepper, sugar, lac, ivory, aromatic woods, tin, cotton, rice, hides, salt fish, and edible nests. Imp. Tea, porcelain, silk and silk goods, nankin, paper, fruit, mercury, and Chinese manufactured goods; Indian printed goods and British cottons, woollens and glass-ware. Manf. Tin utensils, iron wares, and leather, prepared in large quantities for exportation. Pop. 400,000, the half of whom are Chinese. Lat. 13° 58′ N. Lon. 109° 31′ E.

BANGOR, băn'-gor, 'white choir,' an ancient city and bishop's see of Wales, in the county of Carnarvon, 3 miles from Beaumaris. It consists only of one crooked street, about a mile long, and two or three smaller ones diverging from it. Pop. 6,338.—There are other two parishes of small populations in Wales of the same name.

BANGOR, a town of Ireland, in the county of Down, standing 4 miles from Donaghadee, on the south side of Belfast Lough. It consists of one principal street, with several smaller ones diverging from it. Pop. 3,500; the males chiefly employed in fishing, and the females in hand-sewing. Lat. 54° 40′ N. Lon. 5° 35′ W. Here Hamilton, the poet, and correspondent of Allan Ramsay, was born; and Moore contends that it was the birthplace of Pelagius.

BANIAK ISLANDS, ba'-ne-ak, a group in the Indian Ocean, lying off the N. coast of Sumatra. Lat. 2° 20′ N. Lon. 96° 40′ E.

BANIALUKA, ban'-e-a-loo'-ka, a fortress and town of European Turkey, in Bosnia, on the river Verbas, 91 miles from Bosna Serai. It has a great many mosques, several colleges, baths, and bazaars, and a gunpowder factory. Pop. about 8,000.

BANIER, Anthony, ba'-ne-ai, a French writer, who, after studying at Paris, became tutor to the sons of M. de Metz. He wrote an historical explanation of the fables of antiquity, which was afterwards published under the title of "Mythology; or, the Fables explained by History." B. 1673; D. 1741. He had a hand in Picart's "Religious Ceremonies," and other esteemed works. An English translation of his "Mythology" was printed in 1711, in 4 vols. 8vo.

BANIM, John, bań'-nim, an Irish author of a number of popular novels, among which may be particularly noticed the first and second series of the "Tales of the O'Hara Family," which, on their appearance, were immediately recognized as works of genius. He was also the author of the celebrated tragedy of "Damon and Pythias." The greatest defect, perhaps, in his writings is a degree of overstrained excitement, which he generally produces by calling to his aid the operations of the worst and darkest passions of human nature. B. 1800; D. near Kilkenny, 1842.

BANJERMASSIN, băn'-jer-mas-in, from banjer, 'water,' and masin, 'salt,' an extensive district of country lying on the S.E. part of the island of Borneo. Ext. 350 miles long and about 270 broad. Desc. Generally flat, though intersected by a range of mountains running from N. to S. Where cultivation exists, the soil is extremely fertile, throwing up a luxuriant vegetation of great beauty and variety. Rivers. The Banjer and its tributary the Nagara, which water the west portion; and several large streams plentifully irrigate the east. Pro. Cotton, rice, wax, benzoin, pepper, dragon's-blood, and rattans. Minerals. Gold, iron, coal; and some large and fine diamonds are found. Manf. Swords, guns, pistols, and other arms. These are finished in the most elaborate style of workmanship, the decorations consisting of gold, silver, and copper. Pop estimated at 120,000, mostly Mahometans.—This country has been gradually ceded to the Dutch; from whom a portion of it is still held by a native sultan, whose power over his own district is absolute.

BANJERMASSIN, the capital of the above territory, situate at about 15 miles from the mouth of the Banjer, where it debouches into the Sea of Java. On account of the inundations of the river, the houses are built on piles of wood, at an elevation of three feet above the ground, and communicate with each other by means of planks. Many of the houses are built upon rafts, with their fronts turned towards the river, and exposing goods to sale; whilst on market-days the water forms the "great highway," on which all the necessaries of life are purchased at these floating marts. The town is in every respect a floating aggregate of houses, where there are no streets, nor carriages or horses, its whole business being entirely carried on by water communication. Lat. 3° 32′ S. Lon. 114° 42′ E.—For upwards of a hundred years the Dutch have had a factory in this place.

BANJOEMAS, băn-jo'-e-mās, a town and district of Java, situate nearly in the centre of the island. This country is one of the most fertile of the island, producing rice, sugar, coffee, and indigo in abundance. Pop. of district, 316,063; of town, 9,000. Lat. of town, 7° 33′ S. Lon. 109° 20′ E.

BANJOEWANGI, băn-jo'-e-wăn-gi, a town in the province of Bezoeki, on the E. coast of Java. It has a fort, and only one stone house, which is the residence of the governor. In its neighbourhood are several volcanoes, Idjeng, the loftiest, being 10,170 feet high.

BANKES, Sir John, bănks, an English judge, who, in 1630, was made attorney-general to the prince of Wales, and in 1640 chief justice of the Common Pleas. He displayed his loyalty and courage at the beginning of the civil war; and his lady defended Corfe Castle, the family seat, against the parliament forces, till it was relieved by the earl of Caernarvon. Sir John continued with the king at Oxford, and died there in 1644. B. at Keswick, 1589.

BANKS' ISLANDS, a group in the S. Pacific Ocean, named after the celebrated botanist, Sir Joseph Banks. Lat. 13° 53′ S. Lon. 168° 45′ E.—There are various other islands, capes, and peninsulas of the same name in different parts of the world.

BANKS, John, an English play-writer, originally a lawyer; but, getting weary of the courts of Themis, he quitted them, and became a follower of Thespis. He produced several pieces which were once popular, particularly the "Unhappy Favourite; or, the Earl of Essex." When he died is uncertain: his remains were deposited in the church of St. James, Westminster. Lived at the end of the 17th century.

BANKS, Sir Joseph, a distinguished naturalist, who, in 1760, entered a gentleman commoner at Christ Church, Oxford. In 1764 he came into possession of his paternal fortune, and in 1766 was chosen a member of the Royal Society. In the same year he made a voyage to Newfoundland for the purpose of collecting plants, and on the following winter returned by way of Lisbon. He now made the acquaintance of Dr. Solander, a Swedish gentleman who had been a pupil of Linnæus, and who had recently been appointed assistant librarian to the British Museum. In 1768, he and Dr. Solander, as naturalists to the expedition, accompanied Captain Cook on a voyage to the South Seas, the ostensible object being to observe the transit of the planet Venus over the disc of the sun. He remained four months on the island of Otaheite, and after being absent nearly three years, returned to England with a large collection of specimens illustrative of natural history. He afterwards made a voyage to Iceland with his friend Dr. Solander, during which they examined the Hebrides, and were the first to discover the columnar stratification of the rocks surrounding the caves of Staffa, an account of which was published in the same year, 1772, by Mr. Pennant, in his "Tour in Scotland." A large addition to his various botanical collections was the result of this voyage. In 1777 he was elected president of the Royal Society, which he held till the time of his death. B. at Westminster, 1743; D. 1820.—Sir Joseph bequeathed his books and botanical collections to the British Museum.

BANKS, Thomas, one of the best sculptors of Great Britain. By his thirty-third year his style was formed, and he competed, among many rivals, for the gold prize offered by the Royal Academy in 1770, and carried it away. His designs at this period were principally illustrative of classical history, and they discovered so much fertility of invention in the different modes in which the same subjects were treated, that the members of the Royal Academy determined to send him to Rome at the expense of that institution. Accordingly, in 1772 he set out for the "eternal city," where he placed himself under Capizoldi, a distinguished professor. He was, however, though much admired, little encouraged; and after spending seven years in Rome, he returned to England, only to meet with disappointment. He was now in his 49th year, and setting out for Russia, he received from the Empress Catharine an acknowledgment of his merits. She purchased a subject of his, called "Psyche with the Butterfly," and placed it in a temple expressly built for it in her gardens. He soon again visited his native country, when his "Mourning Achilles," now in the hall of the British Institution, fixed him prominently and permanently in the eye of the public. He was now kept in constant employment throughout the remainder of his days. B. at Lambeth, 1735; D. 1805.

BANN, băn, the name of two small rivers in the N. of Ireland.

BANNALEC, ban'-a-lek, a town of France, in Brittany, 15 miles from Quimper. Pop. 4,160.

BANNATYNE, George, băn'-a-tine, the compiler of the celebrated MS. entitled "Corpus Poeticum Scotorum," or, body of Scotch poetry, now in the Advocates' library in Edinburgh. Of this work Allan Ramsay exhibited specimens in his "Evergreen;" but little or nothing is known of its compiler. In his diary, Sir Walter Scott remarks, "Thought upon an introduction to the notices which have been recovered of George Bannatyne. They are very jejune." Yet it is a satisfaction to know that this great benefactor to the literature of Scotland had a prosperous life, and enjoyed the pleasures of domestic society, and in a time peculiarly perilous, lived unmolested, and died in quiet. B. 1543; D. 1607. It was upon his name that the "Bannatyne Club" was founded in 1823, by Sir Walter Scott, over the meetings of which he presided from its nativity till 1831. Originally this association consisted only of 31 members; but as it rose in fame, many persons of rank and literary distinction were desirous of being connected with it; and, in 1828, the number was increased to 100.

BANNIER, or BANNER, John, ban'-i-er, a Swedish general, who served with great distinction under Gustavus Adolphus; on whose death he became commander-in-chief, and obtained several victories, and took many important places. Afterwards his good fortune failed, and the imperialists succeeded in driving him into Bohemia. B. 1595; D. 1641.

BANNOCKBURN, băn'-ok-burn, 'Bannock brook,' a village of Stirlingshire, on the Bannock, 2 miles from Stirling. It is memorable for a decisive battle fought near it, June 25, 1314, between the English, under Edward II., and the Scots, under Robert Bruce; wherein the former were totally defeated, and Scotland was thereby completely emancipated from the English yoke. Not far from it, at a place called SANCHIE BURN, James III. of Scotland was defeated by his son James IV.

BANQUO, or BANCHO, ban'-quo, a Scotch general of royal extraction, who obtained several victories over the Highlanders and the Danes, in the reign of Donald VII. He tarnished his glory by aiding Macbeth in a conspiracy against that monarch; but was afterwards put to death by the usurper.—Shakspere's tragedy of Macbeth is founded upon these events.

BANTAM, or BATAN, băn'-tam, a province of Java, occupying the whole of the W. portion of the island, bounded on the N. by the Java Sea, W. by the Strait of Sunda, and S. by the Indian Ocean. Ext. about 90 miles long, and the same in breadth at its widest part. Pop. about 400,000. Lat. of the fort, 6° 1′ 39″ S. Lon. 106° 10′ 41″ E.—The capital, of same name, was once a rich and flourishing place, but is now declined into a miserable village. The Bantam fowl came from here.

BANTRY, ban'-tre, a town of Ireland, on the east coast of a bay of that name, county of Cork, with a small harbour. Pop. about 3,000. Lat. 50° 40′ 48″ N. Lon. 9° 27′ 12″ W.

BANTRY BAY, a spacious bay on the south-west coast of Ireland, in the county of Cork. Ext. 25 miles long, by 6 or 8 broad. In 1796, a French fleet anchored in this bay.

BANWELL, băn'-wel, a parish of Somersetshire, 4 miles from Axbridge. Area, 4,970 acres. Pop. 1,878. —It is a station on the Great Western Railway.

BANYA, ban'-ya, two towns of Hungary, with populations of above 5,000 each, and celebrated for their productive mines in gold, silver, and lead.

BANYULS-SUR-MER and BANYULS-DES-ASPRES, băn'-yool, two towns and parishes of France, in the department Pyrénées-Orientales. Pop. of the first, 2,562; of the second, 472.—Near the first are four ancient towers, one of which indicates the limits between France and Spain; and the second is memorable for the defence which its inhabitants made in 1793, when they compelled 7,000 Spaniards, who had attacked them, to surrender.

BAOWE, ba'-o, a rajahship tributary to the British, in Bundelcund, Hindostan. Area, 127 square miles. Pop. 20,000.

BAPAUME, ba'-pome, a strong town of France, in the department of the Pas-de-Calais. Manf. Laces, fine thread, woollens, and cottons. Pop. 3,265. 90 miles from Paris.

BAPTÆ, băp-te', the priests of Cotytto, the goddess of lasciviousness and debauchery at Athens. Her festivals were celebrated in the night; and so obscene was the behaviour of the priests, that they disgusted even Cotytto herself. The name is derived from baptein, 'to wash,' because the priests bathed themselves in the most effeminate manner.

BAPTISTE, John Baptist Monnoyer, bap'-teest, a distinguished French painter in the department of fruits and flowers. He adorned the palaces of Versailles, Mendon, Marley, and Trianon. He visited England at the invitation of Lord Montague, and for nearly twenty years lived in that country, enjoying uninterrupted patronage from the great. B. at Lisle, 1635; D. 1699.

BAPTISTE, John Gaspar, bap'-tist, a Dutch painter, who came to England during the civil wars, and was much engaged by Sir Peter Lely in painting his draperies and backgrounds. B. at Antwerp; D. 1691.

BAPTISTIN, John Baptiste Struk, bap-tis-teen, an Italian musician, who first introduced the violoncello into France. He was, besides, a good composer. B. at Florence about 1677; D. 1755.

BARA, bă'-ra, one of the Hebrides, to the S. of South Uist. Ext. 12 miles in length, and about 3 to 6 in breadth. Lat. 56° 55′ N. Lon. 7° 30′ W.

BARABA STEPPE, bar'-a-ba step, N.W. of Omsk, in Asiatic Russia, about 400 miles in length and 300 in breadth, containing a few salt lakes, but in general of a good black soil, with forests of birch. It was colonized in 1767 by Russia, and there is no part of Siberia in which travelling is so rapid by means of horses as here.

BARACH, bai-răk, fourth judge of the Hebrews, after delivering them from bondage to Jabin, king of Canaan, and defeating Sisera. He ruled 33 years, and flourished about 1240 B.C.

BARACOA, or BARAZOA, ba-ra-ko'-a, a seaport on the N.E. of Cuba. Lat. 21° N. Lon. 76° 10′ W. In the vicinity of this town is a remarkable table-mountain, bearing the singular name of the "Anvil of Baracoa."

BARADÆUS, also called ZANZALUS JACOBUS, băr'-rădé'-us, a monk who revived the sect of the Monophysites, who maintained that there is but one nature in Christ. His party made him bishop of Edessa. He died in 588, and from him the sect took the name of Jacobites.

BARAGUAY D'HILLIERS, bar'-a-gai deel'-yiire, a French general, who, in his eighteenth year, lost his left hand at the battle of Leipsic. Under Louis Philippe he served in Algiers; in 1849, under Louis Napoleon, was sent on a temporary mission to the pope. In 1854, during the war with Russia, he commanded a force of 10,000 men sent to the Baltic to co-operate with the allied French and English fleets in their attack on Bomarsund. B. Sept. 6, 1795.

BARAITCH, or BURAECH, bu-raik, a town of Oude, in Hindostan, situate on a tributary of the Gogra, 62 miles from Lucknow. It is here where Lord Clyde, in January, 1859, was engaged in trampling out the last sparks of the sepoy mutiny in the province of Oude. It is a place of great antiquity, and the district in which it is situate is covered with dense jungle. Many of the old Patan race are still found in it, and one of their chiefs yet enjoys the title of Khan of Baraitch.

BARAK, ba'-rak, the principal river of Cachar, in further India. Length, 350 miles. It unites with the Brahmaputra, 43 miles from Dacca.

BARAK, bai'-răk, 'thunder,' a judge and deliverer of Israel, counselled by the prophetess Deborah.

BARANTE, Amable Guillaume Prosper, Baron de Brugière, ba-rant', the son of a French barrister. He served in several offices in the time of Napoleon I., whose fall did not affect his fortunes otherwise than successfully. He became, under Louis XVIII., counsellor of state, and secretary for the home department. In 1819 he was nominated a peer of France. After the revolution of July, 1830, he resided at the court of Sardinia, in the capacity of ambassador, and, in 1835, occupied a similar position at the court of Russia. After the revolution of 1848 he retired from public life, residing in Auvergne. B. at Riom, 1782.—Notwithstanding a strict integrity in exercising his political functions, Barante has been able to devote much of his time and talents to literature. His most important work is his "History of the Dukes of Burgundy," which has placed him amongst the first of the French historians of the day. He has besides written a "History of the National Convention," in six volumes, and various other works. Others of this family were writers.

BARANYA, ba-ran'-ya, a county of Hungary, on the Danube. Area, 1,600 square miles. Desc. Mountainous in some parts, and swampy in others; but, where cultivation is carried on, the produce is great. Pro. Wheat, wine, fruit, and tobacco. Great numbers of cattle are reared. Pop. 285,000.

BARASET, bar'-ra-set', a district of British India, in the presidency of Bengal. Area, 1,424 square miles. Pop. 522,000.

BARATARIA, bär'-rä-tair'-e-a, an island in the United States, at the entrance of a bay of the same name in the Gulf of Mexico. Lat. 29° N. Lon. 90° W.

BARATIER, John Philip, ba-ra'-te-er, an extraordinary German youth, who, at five years of age, understood Greek, Latin, German, and French. He afterwards studied Hebrew; and at nine years of age was able to translate any part of the scripture into Latin, and made a dictionary of the most difficult Hebrew and Chaldaic words. In 1731 he was entered in the university of Altdorf, and the same year wrote a letter to M. le Maître on a new edition of the Bible, Hebrew, Chaldaic, and Rabbinical, which is inserted in the "Bibliothèque Germanique." In his thirteenth year he published the "Travels of Benjamin of Tudela," translated from the Hebrew into French. In 1734 the margrave of Anspach gave him a pension of 50 florins a year and the use of his library. The year following he submitted a plan for finding the longitude, to the Royal Society, which, however, proved to be an old exploded scheme. He was the same year admitted a member of the Academy at Berlin, and created M.A. by the university of Halle. B. at Schwabach, near Nuremberg, in 1721; D. at Halle, in 1740.—Besides the above, he wrote critical dissertations upon points of ecclesiastical history, and a treatise against the Socinians, called "Anti-Artemonius," yet, at his death, he wanted four months of being twenty years of age.

BARBACENA, Fchaberto-Caldeira-Brunt, marquis of, bar'-ba-sai'-na, a Brazilian statesman and soldier, who served with distinction in the Portuguese navy and army. He was chosen by Don Pedro, the prince-regent (afterwards emperor), to negotiate with Portugal, the mother-country, the independence of Brazil; and, by the mediation of England and Austria, a treaty was signed at Rio Janeiro, on August 27, 1823, which secured the separation of the two crowns of Portugal and Brazil. He was afterwards employed to accompany the young queen of Portugal to Europe, and subsequently became finance minister of Brazil; and, by his talents, contributed greatly to the progress of his country. He was the first to introduce from Europe the steam-engine and steamboat. B. at Sabora, 1772; D. at Rio Janeiro, 1842. (See BRAZIL.)

BARBACENA, bar'-ba-sai'-na, a town of Brazil, in the province of Minas Geraes, 125 miles from Rio Janeiro. Pop. of town and district, 12,000.

BARBACOA, bar'-ba-ko'-a, an island in the Atlantic Ocean, within the Gulf of Darien.

BARBACOAS, a city of Quito, in the province of Esmeraldas, on the coast of the Pacific Ocean, 120 miles from Quito. Lat. 1° 42′ S. Lon. 78° 8′ W. 2. A town of South America, in the province of Venezuela, at the source of the Tucuyo. 3. A village in the same province, E. of Lake Maracaibo.

BARBADILLO, Alphonso Jerome de Salas, bar'-ba-deel'-yo, a Spanish dramatic writer, who, besides several comedies, also wrote the "Adventures of Don Diego de Noche," 1624, 8vo. B. at Madrid; D. 1630.

BARBADOES, bar-bai'-doze, one of the Caribbees, and the most eastern of the West-India islands of the Windward group, in the Atlantic Ocean. Ext. About 21 miles in length and 14 in breadth. Area, 166 square miles, or 106,470 acres of land, most of which is under cultivation. The houses of the planters are very numerous all along the country; and these, with the luxuriant productions of the soil, and the gently swelling hills, form a delightful scene. Desc. This island is low along the shore, except on the E.; but as it is generally free from marshy ground, it enjoys a more salubrious climate than many of the other islands to which it belongs. It has no mountains of any great elevation, the loftiest being Mount Hillaby, which is only 1,145 feet above the level of the sea. Pro. Cotton, sugar, arrow-root, aloes, and ginger. Towns. Bridgetown, the capital, Speights Town, Oistins, and St. James. Pop. 122,198. Lat. 13° 10′ N. Lon. 59° W.—This island is the residence of the governor-general of all the British Windward Islands, and is frequently visited by sudden calamities, arising from the fury of the elements. It was settled in the year 1624-5, by the English, who laid the foundation of James Town. In 1627, the island was made over by patent to the earl of Carlisle, who afterwards conveyed his rights to Lord Willoughby. After the Restoration, the legislation of the island was vested in the crown.

BARBARI, bar'-bä-ri', a name originally applied to those who spoke inelegantly, or with harshness and difficulty. The Greeks and Romans generally called all nations, except their own, by the despicable name of barbarians.

BARBARO, Francis, bar'-ba-ro, a learned Venetian, who was governor of several places, but distinguished chiefly on account of his oratorical powers and literary works, particularly his translations of some of Plutarch's Lives. He wrote "De Re Uxoriâ," "On the Choice of a Wife, and the Duties of Women," printed at Paris, in 1515, and which were afterwards translated into various languages. Besides these, a collection of his letters was printed in 1743. B. 1398; D. 1454.

BARBARO, Ermolao, grandson of the above, gave lectures on the Greek language gratuitously. The emperor Frederick, to whom he went ambassador, conferred on him the honour of knighthood, and Pope Innocent VIII. made him patriarch of Aquileia, for accepting which dignity the Venetians expelled him their republic. He then went to Rome, where he resided during the remaining years of his life. B. 1454; D. 1495. He translated the Rhetoric of Aristotle, and other works; and published critical elucidations of Pliny.

BARBAROSSA, Horush, bar'-ba-ros'-sa, a famous pirate, who from being the son of a potter rose by his skill, cunning, and bravery, to lay the foundation of the Turkish dominion in Algiers. After having acquired immense wealth by piracy, he was called in to assist the Algerines against the Spaniards, when he took possession of the throne, and had himself proclaimed Horush, sultan of Algiers. He next defeated the king of Tunis, and having taken the capital, caused himself to be proclaimed king. After this he marched to Tlemsen, the inhabitants of which put to death their own monarch, and opened their gates to Horush. The heir to the kingdom of Tlemsen, however, applied for assistance to the marquis of Gomares, governor of Oran, who besieged Barbarossa in the citadel, and reduced him to the greatest distress. He escaped thence by a subterraneous passage, but was overtaken, with a small number of Turks, on the banks of the river Maileh, where he fell with his followers, after making a desperate defence. B. at Mitylene, about 1471; slain, 1518.—It is said that the name of Barbarossa was given to this adventurer by the Christian sailors, on account of the colour of his beard, which was red.

BARBAROSSA, Khair Eddin, 'the good of the faith,' succeeded his brother in the kingdom of Algiers, and became commander of the naval forces of Selim II., emperor of the Turks. He made himself master of Tunis, but was driven from it by Charles V. in 1536. After this he ravaged several parts of Italy, and reduced Yemen, in Arabia Felix, to the Turkish government. D. at Constantinople, in 1546.—It was under this adventurer that Algiers, in 1519, became subject to the dominion of the Porte.

BARBAROSSA, the Emperor. (See FREDERICK I.)

BARBAROUX, Charles, bar'-ba-roo, a member of the French National Assembly, and the enemy of Robespierre and Marat, against whom he repeatedly brought charges. It was he who proposed the trial of Louis XVI. and family. When the Girondists were overthrown, he was arrested, but made his escape. He was afterwards taken, however, and guillotined at Bordeaux, in 1794. B. at Marseilles, 1767.—Before entering the political arena, he had devoted himself to the study of scientific subjects, and was a correspondent of Benjamin Franklin, and wrote an interesting sketch on the extinct volcanoes near Toulon.

Barbary, bar'-bi-re, a general division of Africa, between the Atlantic Ocean on the W., the Mediterranean Sea on the N., Egypt on the E., and the Sahara, or Great Desert, on the S. It comprises the countries of Barca, Tripoli, Tunis, Algiers, Fez, and Morocco. Ext. 2,600 miles long, with a varying breadth of from 140 to about 550. Area, estimated at 650,000 square miles. It was known to the ancients by the names of Mauritania, Numidia, Proper Africa, and Libya. With the exception of Egypt, it is the most fertile country in Africa, producing an abundance of corn, wine, citrons, oranges, figs, almonds, olives, dates, and melons. The chief trade consists in fruits, in the horses called barbs, Morocco leather, ostrich feathers, indigo, wax, tin, and coral. Lat. extending between 25° and 37° N. Lon. between 10° W. and 25° E. (See Algeria, &c.) The name of this country is supposed to have been derived from the word Berbers, the name given to its ancient inhabitants by the Arabs, and some of whose descendants are still to be found amongst the valleys and mountains of the Atlas.

Barbatelli, Bernardino, bar'-ba-tel'-e, surnamed Poccetti, an Italian painter, who, at Rome, studied with so much assiduity as frequently to forget the refreshments of food and sleep. He excelled in painting historical subjects, fruit, animals, and flowers. D. in 1612.

Barbauld, Anna Lætitia, bar'-bawld, an authoress of considerable celebrity, and, in her "Essays on Romance," the best imitator of the style of Dr. Johnson. She edited selections from the "Spectator," "Tatler," "Guardian," and "Freeholder;" and also a series of the "British Novelists," published in 50 vols. She also wrote several poetical effusions, and, to some extent, assisted her brother, Dr. John Aikin, in producing his "Evenings at Home." (See Aikin.) B at Kibworth, in Leicestershire, 1743; D. at Stoke Newington, 1825.

Barbeau de la Bruyere, John Lewis, bar'-bo broo'-yair, a French writer, who published an historical map of the world, which combines geography, chronology, and history in one view. He also edited, and partly compiled, several other works of geographical and topographical merit. B. at Paris, 1710; D. 1781.

Barberini, Francis, bar-be-re'-ne, a Roman cardinal, nephew of Pope Urban VIII., and legate in France and Spain. He was the father of the poor, and the patron of the learned. D. 1679.—His brother Anthony was also a cardinal; but on the election of Innocent X., who was the enemy of his family, he retired to France, where he was made archbishop of Rheims, and where he died in 1671.

Barberino di Mugello, bar-be-re'-no de moo-gail'-o, a town of Tuscany, standing on the Sieve, 16 miles from Florence. Manf. Principally straw hats. Pop. 9,000. —In the neighbourhood of this town is the royal villa called Cafuggiola, the ancient residence of the Medici.

Barberino di val d'Elsa, de val dail-sa, a village, 14 miles from Florence, whence the Barberini family, to which Pope Urban VIII. and several cardinals belonged, derived their name. Pop. 800.

Barbès, Armand, bar'-bai, a French revolutionist, whose first attempt against the then existing government of Louis Philippe was in 1834, when he was arrested. Again, in 1835, he was included in those who were suspected of being privy to Fieschi's plot, and was liberated only again to be brought before the authorities, and sentenced to a year's imprisonment for secretly manufacturing gunpowder. Again, in 1839, he was concerned in an overt act of rebellion, and was condemned to death, but was, at the last moment, pardoned by the king. The revolution of February, 1848, set him free, the 12th regiment made him their colonel, and the department of the Aude returned him as a member of the Constituent Assembly. But, with Barbès, to conspire was to live; and he was found guilty of an attempt, on the 15th May, 1848, to overturn the republican government, and was condemned to imprisonment for life in the prison of Belleisle-en-Mer. B. in the island of Guadaloupe, 1810.

Barbeyrac, John, bar'-bai-rak, an eminent French professor of law and history, first at Lausanne, and afterwards at Gröningen. He translated into French Puffendorf's "Law of Nature and Nations," his treatise on the "Duties of Man," and Grotius's book of the "Rights of War and Peace," with learned notes of his own. He also wrote a treatise on the "Morality of the Fathers," and another on "Gaming," the argument of which is to establish the proposition that games of chance of any kind are not, in themselves, unlawful. Besides these, he produced other essays upon historical and juridical subjects. B. at Beziers, 1674; D. at Gröningen, 1744.

Barbezieux, bar-bez'-e-u(r), a town in the department of Charente, 45 miles from Bordeaux, celebrated for its truffled capons. Manf. Coarse hempen cloth, and there are some tanneries. Pop. 3,574.

Barbier d'Aucour, John, bar'-be-ai do'-koor, a counsellor in the parliament of Paris, and tutor to the son of the famous Colbert. In 1683 he became a member of the French Academy. On the death of his patron he returned to the bar. B. at Langres, in 1641; D. at Paris, 1694. He wrote several pieces against the Jesuits.

Barbieri, John Francis, bar'-be-air'-e, surnamed Guercino, an eminent historical painter, who studied under Caracci, but followed the manner of Caravaggio. His taste was natural, but not always elegant. B. in 1590; D. in 1666.—His brother Paulo Antonio excelled in painting still life and animals. D. in 1640.

Barbour, John, bar'-boor, a Scotch divine, who became archdeacon of Aberdeen, and one of the earliest and best of Scottish poets and historians. King David Bruce made him his chaplain, and sent him on several embassies. He wrote in verse "The Life and Actions of King Robert Bruce," undertaken, it is supposed by Dr. Henry, at the request of David II., the son of the celebrated monarch. This, however, has been deemed doubtful, although the high character of the work has never been questioned. Warton, in his "History of English Poetry," speaking of Barbour and Henry the minstrel, says, "I cannot pass over two Scotch poets of this period" (the middle of the 14th century), "who have adorned the English language by a strain of versification, expression, and poetical imagery far superior to their age, and who, consequently, deserve to be mentioned in a general review of the progress of our national poetry." Although a Scotchman, Barbour figures as a student among the eminent names that adorn the scroll of Oxford. D. in 1396.—The metrical chronicle of "The Bruce" embraces the period between 1306 and 1329.

Barbour, the name of two counties in the United States. 1. In the state of Alabama. Area, 825 square miles. Desc. Hilly, but fertile, and producing cotton, corn, and sugar. It is drained by the river Pea. Pop. 23,632; of whom about the half are slaves. 2. In the state of Virginia. Area, 330 square miles. Desc. Hilly, and well adapted for pasture. Pro. The usual cerealia. Minerals. Abundant, especially coal, iron, and stone. Pop. 9,000; of whom a few are slaves.

Barbud, bar'-bud, a Persian musician in the service of Kosru Parviz. His name was adopted to express the master of music in all succeeding times. The Persians also gave the name of Barbud to a sort of lyre.

Barbuda, bar-boo'-da, one of the Caribbean or West-India islands, belonging to the Leeward group, in the Atlantic Ocean. Ext. 15 miles long and 8 broad. Area, about 75 square miles. Desc. Low, level, well covered with woods, and generally fertile. Pro. Cotton, corn, pepper, and tobacco; but no sugar. Pop. 1,600. Lat. 17° 33′ N. Lon. 61° 43′ W.—This island has no harbour, but a roadstead on its W. side.

Barby, bar'-be, a walled town of Prussian Saxony, situate on the Elbe, 14 miles from Magdeburg. Manf. Linen and cotton goods. There are soapworks and distilleries. Pop. about 6,000.

Barca, bar'-ka, a country of Barbary, on the S. coast of the Mediterranean, between Tripoli and Egypt; and forming the E. division of the regency of Tripoli. Ext. about 500 miles from N. to S., with a breadth of about 400 from E. to W. Desc. Formerly this country was believed to be nothing more than a barren desert inhabited only by wandering Arabs; but it is now found to contain much excellent pasturage, more especially in the N. and E. The vegetable productions are the palm, the pine, the date, the olive, and the fig. There are, properly speaking, no rivers, but only streams, which are quite dry in the hot season, and generally are lost in the sands of the Libyan desert. Pop. estimated about 1,000,000. Lat. between 26° and 33° N. Lon. between 20° and 25° E.—This country was the seat of the ancient five Greek cities, Arsinoe, Barca, Berenice, Apollonia, and Cyrene; all of which have passed into decay, save Berenice, which is now called Bengazia.

BARCELONA, bar'-se-lo'-na, a city of Spain, formerly the capital of Catalonia, on the Mediterranean, 312 miles from Madrid. It is strongly fortified, being surrounded by walls and defences, which, however, are commanded by the fort of Montjoi, occupying a height of the same name on the south. It is divided into nearly two equal parts, is lighted with gas, and has for its principal edifice a cathedral, which occupies the highest part of the old town. The harbour, though very spacious, is difficult of entrance. A private school is established for the instruction of engineer officers in mathematics, and in the principles of fortification. There are also academies for jurisprudence, practical medicine, natural philosophy, history, the fine arts, and several libraries, one of which is rich in MSS. of Catalonia and Aragon. Manf. Leather, lace, silks, woollens, cottons, and jewellery. Exp. Iron, copper, arms, cork, silks, soap, paper, ribbons, laces, hats, shell-fruit, and brandies. Imp. Timber, hides, horns, wax, stock-fish, hemp, sugar, coffee, cocoa, and other colonial goods. Pop. including its suburb of Barceloneta, 122,000. Lat. 41° 21′ 4½″ N. Lon. 2° 9′ 57″ E. Barcelona is said to have been founded by the Carthaginians under Hamilcar Barca, and hence its name. It was besieged during the War of the Succession by the duke of Berwick, to whom it surrendered in 1714, after an obstinate defence; and also in 1808 In 1843 it was bombarded by order of the regent Espartero.

BARCELONA, a city of South America, in the province of Cumana, on the river Neveri, at about 2 miles' distance from the sea. It is neither handsomely nor agreeably constructed, and the great number of hogs which are fed in the city contributes also to engender filth and disease. Its chief exports are horses and cattle. Lat. 10° 10′ S. Lon. 64° 47′ W.

BARCELORE, bar'-se-lor, a town of Hindostan, in Canara. Lat. 13° 45′ N. Lon. 74° 46′ E. This is the Barace of the ancients.

BARCHA, or BARCA, bar'-ka, the surname of a noble Carthaginian family, from which Hannibal and Hamilcar were descended. By means of their bribes and influence, they created a great faction, which is known in the annals of Carthage by the name of the Barchinian faction, and at last raised themselves to power, and to the independent disposal of all the offices of trust or emolument in the state.

BARCLAY, Alexander, bar'-klai, a writer, who, according to some, was a native of Scotland, but who others maintain was an Englishman. However this may be, we find that he travelled through most parts of Europe, and on his return became a monk at Ely; but on the dissolution of his monastery he obtained a living in Somersetshire, and afterwards in Essex. D. 1552. Barclay was one of the first refiners of our language by his productions, which are chiefly translations from foreign writers. He rendered into English that curious book entitled "Navis Stultifera; or, the Ship of Fools," and to which he added much original matter. This book was first printed by Pynson in 1509, a copy of which edition is very rare, and is worth about £100. Barclay also wrote some eclogues, which Warton says were the first that appeared in the English language, and were like Petrarch's and the Mantuan's; that is, of the moral and satirical kind, and containing few touches of rural description and bucolic imagery.

BARCLAY, John, a son of the above, who was educated in France, and on the death of his father visited London, where he lived ten years. B. at Pont-à-Mousson, 1582; D. at Rome, 1621.—He wrote several ingenious works; the chief of which are, "Euphormio," a satire in Latin, and a romance entitled "Argenis." This last has been translated into several languages, and is an evidence of the fleeting nature of literary popularity. "It absolutely distresses me," says Coleridge, "when I reflect that this work, admired as it has been by great men of all ages, and lately by the poet Cowper, should be only not unknown to the general reader." It was of this Barclay that the learned Grotius said,

> "A Scot by blood, and French by birth, this man
> At Rome speaks Latin as no Roman can."

BARCLAY, Robert, a Scotchman, who walked in his father's footsteps in so far as he embraced the tenets held by the Society of Friends. At an early age he was sent to Paris, to be under the care of his uncle, who was principal of the Scots college. He there embraced the Romish religion, on which his father sent for him home, and having himself become a convert to the opinions of the Quakers, he persuaded his son to do the same. In 1670 he published a defence of his new religion, at Aberdeen; and in 1675 printed a catechetical discourse, or system of faith, according to the opinions of his sect. But his greatest work is, "An Apology for the true Christian Divinity, as the same is held forth and preached by the people called, in scorn, Quakers," printed in Latin, at Amsterdam, in 1676, and translated into English in 1678. He not only benefited his party by his writings, but travelled through various countries, particularly Germany and Holland, to obtain converts. He spent the latter part of his life on his paternal estate of Ury, in Kincardineshire, Scotland. B. at Edinburgh, 1648; D. at Ury, 1690.

BARCLAY DE TOLLY, a Russian general, who, in the German and Polish campaigns of 1806-7, was made a field-marshal. He subsequently became commander-in-chief, headed the Russians at the battle of Leipsic, and in 1815 led them into France. Besides his military commands, he at one period held the post of minister of war, and had the title of prince conferred on him. D. 1818.

BARCOCHEBAS, or BARCOCHAB, bar'-ko-ke'-bas, 'the son of a star,' a famous impostor among the Jews, who pretended to be the star predicted by Balaam. He gained many followers, who overran Judæa, putting numbers of Romans to the sword. He was at last defeated and slain by Julius Severus, who, by way of revenge, committed a dreadful massacre on the Jewish nation, A.D. 134.

BARD, bard, a fortress and village of Piedmont, 23 miles from Aosta. It is situate on a height at the south entrance of the valley of Aosta, and in 1800 was razed by the French; but since that period it has been restored. This fort commands the passage of the Aosta valley, and here Napoleon, after crossing the Alps, in 1800, met with a formidable resistance from an Austrian garrison of 400 men.

BARDI, bar'-di, a priestly order among the ancient Gauls, who praised their heroes, and published their fame in verses, accompanied by musical instruments. They were so respected that, at their sight, two armies which were engaged in battle laid down their arms, and submitted to their orders. They censured, as well as commended, the behaviour of the people.

BARDNEY, bard'-ne, a parish of Lincolnshire, 6 miles from Wragby. Area, 5,490 acres. Pop. 1,329.—Ethelred, king of Mercia, is supposed to have been buried in this parish, where there is a barrow with a cross upon it.

BARDOLINO, bar-do-le'-no, a village of Austrian Italy, 14 miles from Verona. Pop. 2,000.—Near this place is the field of Rivoli, where, in January 1797, the French, under Napoleon I., defeated the Austrians under Alvinzi.

BARDOP, bar'-dop, a river of England, running into the Read, in Northumberland.

BARDSEY, bard'-se, an island on the coast of Wales, near the N. point of Cardigan Bay. Ext. 2 miles long and 1 broad. Pop. 100.—The name of this island is a corruption of "Bard's Island," which it was formerly called, from its having been the last retreat of the Welsh bards.

BAREBONE, Praise God, bair'-bone, a Puritan, who was by trade a leatherseller, and who became, in 1654, one of the most active members of Cromwell's parliament, which was named after him. When General Monk came to London to restore the king, this man appeared at the head of a formidable rabble, and presented a petition to parliament for the exclusion of the king and the royal family. Monk, in consequence, wrote a letter of complaint to the house for encouraging the furious zealot and his adherents. Lived in the middle of the 17th century.—It is said that there were three brothers of this family, each of whom had a sentence to his name; viz., "Praise God Barebone;" "Christ came into the world to save Barebone;" and "If Christ had not died thou hadst been damned Barebone." The parent of this hopeful family could scarcely have carried his fanaticism further in christening his children.

Barrilly, ba-ril'-le, a district of British India, in the N.W. provinces, forming a portion of Rohilcund, having the Kumaon hills on the N., the Ganges on the W., a portion of Oude on the E. and S., and on the N. and W. Furrukabad, Alighur, and Moradabad. Area, 2,937 square miles. Desc. The surface is in general level and the soil good, being well watered, and in every part producing sugar, rice, grain, and cotton. Pop 1,143,657. Lat. between 28° and 29° N.

Barrilly, the capital of the above district, stands on an affluent of the Ganges, 118 miles from Agra. It has several mosques, a strong quadrangular citadel, a great number of Persian and Hindoo schools, an English college, and is the head-quarters of a civil establishment and circuit court. Pop. 65,796.—Near this town the British obtained two victories over the Rohillas, the first in 1774, under Colonel Champion; the second in 1795, under Sir Robert Abercrombie. Here an outbreak of the Sepoys took place on the 1st of June, 1857, when Brigadier Sibbald and Ensign Tucker were killed on their way to the parade-ground, and all but three officers of the 18th regiment were also slaughtered in other places.

Barent, Dieterick, ba-rent', a Dutch painter of history and portraits, who studied in the school of Titian, with whom he continued several years. B. at Amsterdam, 1534; D. 1582.

Baretti, Joseph, ba-ret'-e, an ingenious Italian writer, and the son of an architect at Turin, of the early part of whose life little is known, except that he was a great traveller. In 1750 he visited England, and soon acquired a knowledge of the language, which he afterwards wrote with facility and correctness. About 1753 he became acquainted with Dr. Johnson, by whose means he was introduced as a teacher of Italian into the family of Mr. Thrale. In 1760 he returned to Italy, and began to publish at Venice a periodical work entitled "Frusta Literaria," but on account of the freedom of its sentiments, found it expedient to quit that country, and once more visited England. In 1769 he was tried at the Old Bailey for killing a man who had assaulted him in the Haymarket, and was acquitted. Next year he published his "Travels through France, Spain, Portugal, and Italy," 4 vols. 8vo. On the establishment of the Royal Academy, he was appointed its foreign secretary, and during Lord North's administration obtained a pension. B. 1716; D. 1789.—He was a talented, pleasant, and charitable man. Besides the above, he wrote "A Dissertation on Italian Poetry;" "An Introduction to the Italian Language;" "The Italian Library," 8vo; "A Dictionary, English and Italian," 2 vols. 4to; "A Grammar of the Italian Language," 8vo; "An Account of the Manners and Customs of Italy," 2 vols. 8vo; "An Introduction to the most Useful European Languages," 8vo; "A Dictionary, English and Spanish," 4to; by which, and his Italian Dictionary, he is best known.

Barfleur, bar'-flur, a parish and town of France, department of La Manche, 15 miles from Cherbourg. It was formerly a considerable town, and from it William the Conqueror sailed with his army to effect the conquest of England.

Barfleur, a cape on the coast of France, 18 miles E. of Cherbourg, on which there is a lighthouse 271 feet high.

Barford, bar'-ford, a name common to several English parishes with small populations.

Bargarrau, bar-gar-ro, a village in Scotland, 5 miles from Paisley, where the manufacture of fine thread was first established in that country.

Barham, Rev. Richard Harris, bar'-ham, rector of St. Augustine's and St. Faith, in London, known to the world by his literary name of Thomas Ingoldsby. His "Ingoldsby Legends" were first contributed to "Bentley's Miscellany," and afterwards collected into volumes. For many years he was a contributor to "Blackwood's Magazine," the "Literary Gazette," and other periodicals; and he is the author of the popular novel entitled "My Cousin Nicholas." B. at Canterbury, 1788; D. 1845.

Bari, bar'-e, a province of Naples, having on the N. Capitanata, on the S. Otranto, on the W. Basilicata, and on the E. the Adriatic. Ext. 80 miles long, with an average breadth of 34. Area, 1,290 square miles. Desc. A level, fertile country, producing abundance of grain, fruit, and wine. Large numbers of goats, sheep, asses, and swine are reared. Pop. 426,000.

Bari, the chief town of the above province, lying on the Gulf of Venice, and well fortified, being, towards the sea, defended by strong walls. Its principal buildings are, a citadel, a cathedral, and a college of nobles; and it has civil and criminal courts. Manf. Linen, cotton, and silk fabrics; glass, soap, and liqueurs. Pop. about 30,000. Lat. 41° 7′ 52″ N. Lon. 16° 53′ 4″ E.—On the fall of the Roman empire, this town first passed into the hands of the Saracens, and afterwards into those of the Normans, when it became the capital of Apulia. It has thrice been taken and destroyed, and as often rebuilt on the same site.

Barigazzo, bar'-e-gats'-o, a village of Italy, in the province of Lunigiana, in the neighbourhood of which fire issues from the surface of the earth, ascends for several feet, and continues for some days.

Barile, bar'-e-lai, a town of Naples, 3 miles from Melfi. Pop. about 4,000.—It suffered greatly by an earthquake in 1851.

Barjesus, bar-je'-sus, 'son of Jesus,' a Jewish magician, or false prophet, settled at Cyprus.

Barjona, bar-jo'-na, 'son of Jona,' the designation of Peter in Syriac.

Barker, Edmund Henry, bar'-ker, a contributor to the "Classical Journal" for twenty years, and a laborious Greek scholar. His magnum opus, or great work, as it might be called, is an edition of Stephens's "Thesaurus Linguæ Græcæ," which comprises no fewer than 11,752 double-columned pages. Its principal value consists in its size and the comprehensiveness of its grasp, rather than in its merit. He was the editor of numerous other classical works, and, for some time, was the amanuensis of Dr. Parr. B. at Hollym, in Yorkshire; D. in London, 1839.

Barker, Robert, was an Irishman, and the inventor and patentee of panoramas. Amongst his most popular panoramas were the battles of Aboukir and Trafalgar. He was himself originally a painter, and, in the production of his pictures was assisted by R. R. Reinagle, R.A., from whose sketches a great number of his foreign views were painted. B. at Kells, Meath; D. in London, 1806.

Barker, Thomas, a successful artist, who established himself at Bath. His principal objects of study were rustic figures and landscapes. His "Woodman" is a well-known work of art, and has been almost universally popularized by its reproduction on earthenware, tobacco-boxes, and almost every article upon which a design could be printed or painted. B. near Pontypool, in Monmouthshire, 1769; D. in Bath, 1847.

Barkham, John, bark'-ham, an English antiquary, who was made dean of Bocking, in Essex. B. at Exeter, 1572; D. at Bocking, in Essex, 1642. He bequeathed medals and coins to Archbishop Laud, who added them to the collection which he had given to the university of Oxford; and he is said to have been the sole author of the "Display of Heraldry," which goes under the name of Guillim.

Barking, bar'-king, a parish and market-town of Essex, situate on a creek of the same name, running into the Thames, 7 miles from London. Area, 10,170 acres. It has no manufactures, but has a timber and fishing trade. Pop. about 10,000.—The famous Gunpowder Plot, which was, at one fell swoop, to deprive England of its king, lords, and commons, is said to have been concocted in a house near this town.

Barlaam, bar-lam, a learned Italian monk, who was nearly the last who wrote in Greek upon his favourite study of mathematics. Lived in the 14th century.

BAR-LE-DUC, or BAR-SUR-ORNAIN, bar-le(r)-dook, a town of France, in the department of the Meuse, 125 miles from Paris. It is the capital of the arrondissement Forestier. Manf. Cottons and calicoes. It has a considerable trade in timber, wine, wool, and iron. Pop. about 15,000. It is noted for its sweetmeats.

BARLETTA, bar-let'-a, a seaport-town of Naples, in the Terra di Bari, on the Gulf of Venice. It is situate on an island connected with the mainland by a bridge, and about 30 miles from Bari. The streets are wide and well paved; the houses large, lofty, and built of beautiful hewn stone. It has a cathedral, remarkable for its antique columns of granite; and a spacious citadel. In the market-place stands a colossal bronze statue of the emperor Heraclius. Pro. and Manf. Salt, almonds, liquorice, fruit, wool, and skins. Pop. 25,000. Lat. 41° 19 18″ N. Lon. 16° 17′ E.

BARLETTA, Gabriel, a Dominican monk and an extraordinary preacher, whose sermons exhibit such a mixture of religious and comic expressions, sublime and vulgar ideas, the serious and the ridiculous, and, what is more remarkable, the whole are written in such a barbarous language, compounded of Greek, Latin, and Italian, as to have rendered them among the most extraordinary productions in literature. So great, however, was his fame with his contemporaries, that it elicited the proverb, Nescit prædicare qui nescit Barlettare. B. in Naples, about 1400.—His sermons have passed through more than twenty editions: the best is that of Venice, in 1577, 2 vols. 8vo.

BARLOW, GREAT and LITTLE, bar'-lo, two adjoining townships in Derbyshire, 3 miles from Chesterfield. Area, 3,760 acres. Pop. 700.

BARLOW, Francis, an English painter, who studied under Shepherd, the portrait-painter. B. in Lincolnshire, 1626; D. 1702.—His principal excellence lay in painting beasts, birds, and fish, which he represented with great beauty on the ceilings of the country houses of sporting noblemen and gentlemen.

BARLOW, Joel, an American author and diplomatist, who, during the War of Independence, composed many patriotic songs and addresses to stimulate his countrymen in the great cause in which they were engaged. In 1787 he published by subscription a poem entitled the "Vision of Columbus," whilst engaged as the conductor of a weekly newspaper in the town of Hartford. In the following year he visited England as the agent of a company speculating in the sale of land, and united himself to that class who were then zealous in the advocacy of republican principles. After spending seventeen years in this country and in France, he returned to America, and in 1808 reproduced his "Vision of Columbus," under the new title of "The Columbiad." This performance never obtained a high popularity. He now engaged himself in collecting materials for a "History of the United States," but was interrupted by President Madison, who admired him so much as to appoint him minister plenipotentiary to the court of France. Accordingly, in 1812, he once more arrived in France, and soon afterwards died. B. at Reading, Connecticut, 1755; D. on his way to Wilna, near Cracow, 1812.

BARLOW, Peter, an eminent mathematician, who, although possessed of no other advantages than those which arise from the commonest education, rose to be a mathematical master at the Royal Academy, Woolwich, and till 1847 filled the chair as its professor for forty years, when he retired. In 1825, the Royal Society awarded him their Copley medal for "various communications on the subject of magnetism." For his able "Essay on Magnetic Attractions," published in 1820, the Board of Longitude presented him with the parliamentary reward for useful discoveries in navigation. B. at Norwich, in 1776.

BARLOWE, William, an eminent mathematician, who, on entering into orders, was made prebendary of Winchester, and finally archdeacon of Sarum. He was the first English writer on the properties of the loadstone, and he likewise discovered the difference between iron and steel, and their tempers for magnetical uses. To him also we are indebted for the way of pointing magnetic needles, and of piecing and cementing loadstones. B. in Pembrokeshire; D. 1625.—As the first English writer on the nature and properties of the magnet, and as the inventor of the compass-box as now used at sea, the name of Barlowe deserves to stand high amongst those scientific investigators who have exerted their talents for the benefit of mankind.

BARMEN, bar'-men, a district of Rhenish Prussia, including several villages and hamlets in the circle of Elberfield, and stretching for 5 miles along the Wupper valley. Manf. Silk and cotton fabrics, steel and plated goods, and chemicals. Pop. about 30,000.

BARMOUTH, bar'-mouth, a seaport-town of Wales, in Merionethshire, 8 miles from Dolgelly. The town is built on very unequal ground, so that at the mouth of the Maw, or Avon, the houses gradually rise above each other in successive terraces. Pop. 1,000.—It is much frequented for sea-bathing, and the environs are very picturesque.

BARNABAS, St., bar'-na-bas, 'son of prophecy or of consolation,' the name given to Joses, of the tribe of Levi, who embraced the gospel, sold his estate, and gave the produce to the apostles, and became an eminent evangelist. He was sent to Antioch to confirm the new disciples; and was the companion of St. Paul. He was stoned to death by the Jews in Cyprus. B. in the island of Cyprus. Lived in the 1st century.—There is an epistle extant under his name, which was printed at Amsterdam, with notes, in 1724, by Le Clerc.

BARNARD, Sir John, bar'-nard, an eminent citizen of London, whose parents belonged to the Society of Friends. In his 19th year he quitted this body, and became a member of the established church, and was first brought into notice by being appointed by those engaged in the wine trade, and to which he himself belonged, to state before the House of Lords their objections to a bill then pending in that house, and affecting their trade. In consequence of the abilities he displayed on this occasion, he was, in 1721, nominated candidate for the city of London, and in the year following was elected. He continued to represent the city in parliament nearly forty years, and discharged that trust with a fidelity which gained for him the veneration of his fellow-citizens, who, in the Royal Exchange, erected his statue, which in the fire of 1838 was destroyed. In 1732 he received the honour of knighthood from George II. In 1737 he served the office of lord mayor, in which situation he considerably reformed the police. B. at Reading, 1685; D. at Clapham, 1764.—Sir John Barnard was a worthy magistrate, an upright senator, a good speaker, and a religious man.

BARNARD, Lady Anne, the daughter of James Lindsay, 5th earl of Balcarras, and the wife of Sir Andrew Barnard, librarian to George III. She is noticed here for being the authoress of the pathethic ballad entitled "Auld Robin Gray," the name of the writer of which was preserved a secret for upwards of fifty years. B. 1750; D. 1825.

BARNARD, Sir Andrew Francis, G.C.B. and G.C.H., a British general, who early entered the army, and saw much active service in the W. Indies, and was also in 1799 engaged in the expedition to the Helder, and subsequently was present in the peninsular war at Barrosa, where he was severely wounded, Ciudad Rodrigo, Badajoz, Salamanca, Vittoria, Nivelle, where he was again wounded, Orthes, and Toulouse. For his services he received many honours, and in 1815 fought and was slightly hurt at Waterloo. He stood so high in the duke of Wellington's opinion, that, when Paris capitulated, Sir Andrew was appointed commandant of the British troops there. B. in Donegal, 1773; D. Jan. 17, 1855.

BARNARD, Sir Henry William, a British general, who entered the army in 1814, and served in various ranks, when, in 1854, he was appointed to the command of one of the brigades in the Crimea, and was chief of the staff under General Simpson, until the appointment of General Windham. He afterwards had the command of the troops at Corfu, and finally was placed on the staff of the Bengal army. In June, 1857, he commanded the troops before Delhi at the commencement of its siege, in the place of General Reed, whose age and health unfitted him for the chief command of the Indian army, which had devolved upon him on the death of General Anson, but which he relinquished to Sir Henry Barnard. The latter, however, soon succumbed to the toils and anxieties of his position, and died of cholera, after a few hours' illness, 5th July, 1857.

BARNARD CASTLE, a town in the bishopric of Durham, situate on the river Tees, 22 miles from Durham. Manf. Carpets, thread, and hats. In its neighbourhood are some stone-quarries. Pop. nearly 6,000.—Here is a castle of great antiquity, built by Barnard Baliol, grandfather of John Baliol, who was born here, and who became king of Scotland. There is, besides, an hospital for poor persons, said to have been founded by John Baliol.

BARNAUL, bar'-nawl, a town of Siberia, situate on a river of the same name, where it joins the Oby, about 230 miles from Tomsk. It is the seat of a court of directors for the whole of the Kolyvan line, including the silver-mines on the Oby, and the mines of the Altai mountains. Manf. Glass, tiles, bricks; and here are smelted large quantities of lead, and also all auriferous silver ores. Pop. about 10,000. Lat. 53° 20′ N. Lon. 83° 26′ E.

BARNAVE, Anthony, bar'-nav, one of the actors in and the victims of the French revolution. He was a member of the National Assembly, in which he was remarkable for the vehemence with which he enunciated his principles and opinions. When the king was stopped at Varennes, he was deputed to conduct him and the royal family to Paris; in which mission he behaved with great respect to his illustrious captives. As a royalist, he was guillotined at the age of 32. Suffered, 1794.

BARNBY, barn'-be, the name of several English parishes with small populations.

BARNES, Juliana, burns, a lady whose accomplishments procured her the place of prioress of Sopewell nunnery, which belonged to St. Albans. B. at Roding, Essex. Lived in the 15th century.—She wrote on heraldry, hunting, and hawking, which treatises were printed at the monastery of St. Albans.

BARNES, Robert, an English divine, who was chaplain to Henry VIII., by whom he was sent to Germany to confer with the divines of that country on the legality of his divorce. There he became a Lutheran, and on his return propagated his new opinions with such zeal, that he was arrested and burnt in Smithfield. Suffered in 1540.—He wrote a treatise on justification, and some other books.

BARNES, Albert, an American biblical commentator, well known as the author of "Barnes's Notes," which have gone through many editions in the United States, and have been republished in England, and are so much esteemed, that a circulation of nearly half a million is said to have been reached up to 1859. B. at Rome, U.S., 1798.

BARNES, a parish in Surrey, 5 miles from London. Area, 820 acres. Pop. about 2,000.—BARN-ELMS, where Walsingham entertained Queen Elizabeth, is in this parish.

BARNET, CHIPPING BARNET, or HIGH BARNET, bar'-net, a town of Hertfordshire, 11 miles from London. It has almshouses for twelve aged women, and a royal free grammar-school. In September, a very important horse and cattle fair is here held. Pop. 2,500.—Near this town, April 14th, 1471, on Gladsmore Heath, was fought the decisive battle of Barnet between the Yorkists and Lancastrians, in which the latter were completely defeated, and their leader, the earl of Warwick, killed. In 1740, an obelisk was erected here, to commemorate the event. There are two other small places in England of this name, and one in the United States.

BARNEVELDT, John Van Olden, barn'-velt, Grand Pensionary of Holland, who rose from his position as an advocate to the first dignities in the Dutch government. During the struggle of the Netherlanders with the Spaniards, he assisted, in 1573, as a volunteer in the defence of Haarlem; and, in 1575, the year following the assassination of William, prince of Orange, was sent as ambassador to England. Here he was successful in procuring military assistance from Queen Elizabeth, and on his return from the embassy was made advocate-general. Endeavouring, however, to limit the power of Maurice, prince of Orange, the stadtholder, and also approving the doctrines of the Arminians, which Maurice, as a Gomarist, opposed, he made himself obnoxious to that prince, who was possessed of great power, and was arrested and tried for plotting to deliver up his country to the Spanish monarch. Of this he was found guilty, and beheaded in 1619. B. at Amersfoort, 1547.—His sons, William and Réné, formed a conspiracy against Maurice, to revenge their father's death, which was discovered. William escaped, but Réné was taken prisoner and executed. The wife of Barneveldt solicited for the pardon of Réné, and Prince Maurice expressed his astonishment that she should do for her son what she had refused to do for her husband. To this she nobly replied, "I would not seek pardon for my husband, because he was innocent; I ask it for my son, because he is guilty."

BARNEY, Joshua, bar'-ne, a distinguished American seaman, who early sought the sea, and, at the commencement of the War of Independence, was appointed mate of the American sloop Hornet. On board this and other vessels he soon showed his brave and seamanlike qualities, and was very active and successful in capturing British merchant-ships. He, however, was taken prisoner and sent to England; but, escaping, made his way home, and again commenced his attacks on the British. On peace being made, he was for a short time in the French navy, but resigned his command and engaged in commercial pursuits. In the second war between England and America, in 1812, he was appointed commander of the flotilla in Chesapeake Bay, and having landed his men to assist the land forces, was present at the engagement of Bladensburg, where he was wounded and again taken prisoner. B. 1759; D. 1818.

BARNHAM, barn'-ham, the name of several small parishes in England.

BARNINGHAM, bar'-ning-ham, a name common to several English parishes with small populations.

BARNSLEY, or BARNESLEY, barns'-le, a market-town and chapelry in the West Riding of Yorkshire, 8 miles from Sheffield. Manf. Damasks, drills, and linen yarns. It has coal-works and iron-foundries, needle and wire factories, and bleaching-fields. Pop. 15,000.—It is a station on the North Midland Railway.

BARNSTAPLE, barn'-stap-el, a town of Devonshire, always considered a seaport, although situate 6 miles from the sea, on the Taw, which is here crossed by a bridge of 16 arches. The town is generally well built, and placed amongst beautiful scenery. Manf. Principally porcelain, and formerly woollen goods were its staple. Pop. about 10,000.

BARNSTAPLE, a county of Massachusetts, U.S., comprising Cape Cod. Pop. about 35,000. The soil is principally sandy and barren, and the inhabitants engaged chiefly in the cod-fisheries.

BARNSTAPLE, a seaport and capital of the above county, 68 miles from Boston. Pop. 5,000.

BARNWELL, a district of South Carolina. Pop. 27,000; of whom about one half are slaves. Cotton is the chief production.

BARO, Peter, bar'-o, a French Protestant divine, who, to avoid persecution, came to England, and, in 1575, was chosen Margaret professor of divinity at Cambridge; but involving himself in disputes by opposing the Calvinistic doctrine of predestination, he, in 1596, resigned his professorship. D. about 1600.—He published some polemical books in Latin.

BAROCHE, Peter Jules, bar'-rosh, a celebrated French advocate, who, on the 23rd February, 1848, signed the bill of charges brought by Odilon Barrot against Guizot, for having prevented the reform banquet. Subsequently he became, under the government of Louis Napoleon, minister of the interior, foreign minister, and then president of the council of state. B. at Paris, 1802.

BAROCHE, or BAROCCI, Frederick, ba-rot'-se, an Italian painter, who received, at Rome, much praise and encouragement from Michael Angelo. He chiefly excelled in religious subjects, and his pictures, which are rare, are held in high esteem. B. 1528; D. 1612.

BARODA, ba-ro'-da, a city of Guzerat, Hindostan, 81 miles from Surat, and capital of the territory of the prince called the Guicowar. It has a considerable trade, and a British resident is stationed here, with a body of troops; and there is a corps, known as the Guzerat Irregulars, commanded by British officers. Pop. perhaps 120,000.

Baron, Michael, ba'-rong, a famous French actor, the son of a leather-merchant, who himself was something of a performer. For nearly thirty years he played, with the greatest success, with Molière's troupe, and then, in 1691, without any apparent reason, suddenly retired from the stage. In 1720, however, he again returned, and was received with immense enthusiasm, playing, with great success, even the most youthful parts. In 1729 he was taken ill, whilst on the boards, and died shortly after. B. 1653.—Although his merit in his profession was very great, yet his vanity was equal. This will appear from a saying of his, "that once in a century we might see a Cæsar, but that 2,000 years were not sufficient to produce a Baron;" and he was about to refuse the pension granted him by Louis XIV., because the order for it was worded, "Pay to the within-named Michael Boyrun, called Baron," &c. He wrote also some plays, three volumes of his comedies being printed after his death.

Baroni, Leonora, ba-ro'-ne, a famous Italian singer, the daughter of the fair Adriana of Mantua, on whose beauty and accomplishments numerous panegyrics were printed. Leonora possessed eminent talents, and a volume of poems in different languages was, in 1636, printed in her praise. She also wrote several poetical pieces of merit. B. at Naples, and flourished during the 17th century.

Baronius, Cæsar, bā-ro'-ne-us, a learned cardinal, who entered into the congregation of the Oratory; and, in 1583, was elected superior-general of that order, and subsequently became librarian of the Vatican and confessor to Clement VIII., whom he would have succeeded as pope, but for the Spanish party. B. 1538; D. 1607.—The fame of Baronius rests on his celebrated and laborious work, "Annales Ecclesiasticæ" (Ecclesiastical Annals), which was published in 12 volumes, and has been reproduced in many forms, and contains the history of the first twelve ages of the church.

Barotse, ba-rot'-se, the name of an African tribe visited by Dr. Livingstone.

Barozzi, James, ba-rot'-se, a famous architect, surnamed Vignola, who first studied painting, but afterwards architecture, and became a member of the Academy of Design at Rome. He built several palaces in and near Bologna; but his greatest work is the palace at Caprarola, erected for Alexander Farnese. He also constructed the famous canal to Ferrara, and was employed to build some churches at Rome, and succeeded Michael Angelo as architect of Saint Peter's. He carried off the prize, from twenty-two competitors, for the design for the Escurial at Madrid, and wrote a celebrated book, entitled "Rules for the Five Orders of Architecture," which has gone through sixteen editions; also a treatise on Practical Perspective. B. 1507; D. 1573.—It is thought by some that Vignola was the first to settle the rules of taste in architecture. No one succeeded, before him, in defining such harmonious and just proportions, and no one since has dared to depart therefrom.

Barquesimeto, bar'-kais-e-mai'-to, an ancient city of South America, in Venezuela, 120 miles from Caracccas, capital of a province of the same name, and founded by the Spaniards in 1522. The city was well built, with a handsome church; but, in 1812, it suffered fearfully from an earthquake, which almost entirely destroyed it, and buried in its ruins nearly 1,500 persons. It has been gradually recovering from the effects of this catastrophe. Pop. perhaps 12,000. Lat. 9° 51′ 35″ N. Lon. 69° 12′ 27″ W.

Barr, bar, a village and parish of Ayrshire. Here are some mountains nearly 3,000 feet high, and several lochs. Pop. 837.

Barra, bar'-ra, a town of Italy, 3 miles from Naples. Manf. Silks. Pop. 6,000.—There is another town of the same name near Reggio. Pop. 3,000.

Barra, the name of several unimportant towns in Brazil, with different affixes.

Barrackpoor, bar-ak-poor', a town of British India, on the Hooghly, 16 miles from Calcutta. The governor-general has a fine residence here, situate in a beautiful park; and there is a military cantonment, where several regiments of native infantry are usually stationed, with the bungalows or houses of their British officers.—In March, 1857, during the earlier period of the sepoy rebellion, the 19th regiment of native infantry was here disbanded, owing to its disaffection; and, in the following May, another regiment, the 34th, was also disbanded by General Hearsey.

Barras, bar-ra, Paul Francis John Nicholas, one of the five members of the French Directory, early entered into military life, and took part in the defence of Pondicherry, in India, against the English, and was present at the battle of Progua, and soon after returned to France. The revolution now discovering itself, Barras assisted at the taking of the Bastille, and afterwards of the Tuileries. In 1792 he was elected a member of the National Convention, and voted for the unconditional death of Louis XVI. He was sent, in 1793, to the south of France, and commanded the left wing of the besieging army under Dugommier, and it was here that he first met Napoleon Bonaparte, then captain of artillery. The patriotic reputation of Barras was so well established, that he and Fréron were the only representatives not denounced by the popular societies. Robespierre, however, was no friend of his, and often wished to arrest him; and Barras, knowing this, became one of the principal actors of the 9th Thermidor, and put himself at the head of the troops which surrounded Robespierre at the Hôtel de Ville. In 1794 he was named one of the "Commitee of Public Safety," and became a great enemy to the members of the Mountain; and, in February, 1795, he was elected president of the Convention, and, in that capacity, declared Paris in a state of siege, when the assembly was attacked by the populace. Afterwards, when the Convention was assailed, Bonaparte, by Barras' advice, was appointed to command the artillery; and that general, on the 13th Vendémiaire (Oct. 5, 1795), decisively repressed the royalist movement. For his services, Barras was now named one of the Directory, and took a prominent part in the changes which that body underwent until Napoleon's coup d'état of the 18th Brumaire (Nov. 9, 1799), which effectually overthrew the power of Barras and his colleagues. His life, from this date, was, generally speaking, one of retirement; and, after living at Grosbois, Marseilles, and Brussels, he went to Chaillot, near Paris, where he died, 1829. B. 1755.—Napoleon said of him, "The passion with which he spoke would make one imagine he was a resolute, determined man; but he was not so,—he had no decided opinion on any subject connected with government."

Barre, bar, a name common to several townships in the United States.

Barre, Lewis Francis Joseph de la, an ingenious writer, who assisted Anselm Banduri in his "Imperium Orientale," and the collection of medals of Roman emperors from the emperor Decius, for which he had a pension given him by the duke of Tuscany. He also published "Memoirs for the History of France and Burgundy," and several other works. B. 1688; D. 1738. —There are others of this name in French history.

Barreges, bar'-aizh, a village and watering-place of France, in the department of the Hautes Pyrénées, 12 miles from Bagnères-en-Bigorre. It stands in a valley, upwards of 3,000 feet above the level of the sea, and, in winter, is exposed to great danger from the falling of mountain avalanches.

Barrelier, bar-rel'-e-ai, a French botanist, at first a physician, but who became a Dominican, and devoted himself to the study of botany, travelling through the south of France and Spain, collecting specimens of plants. He subsequently visited Italy, and founded, at Rome, a botanical garden. Here he also had engraved some of the plants he had collected, and, after remaining at Rome 23 years, returned to Paris, where he endeavoured to perfect his labours, with a view of publishing an account of his discoveries, but died there, 1673. B. 1606.—His valuable MSS. were, after his death, nearly all destroyed by fire, and only a few of his copper-plates saved: these, however, were used by Antoine de Jussieu in a work published in 1714; and Plumier, in honour of Barrelier, established the genus Barreliera, of the order Acanthaceæ.

Barren, bär'-en, a county of Kentucky, U.S. Pop. 20,000, of whom about one fourth are slaves. The capital is Glasgow.

Barren Island, an island in the Bay of Bengal, with a volcanic mountain, which is frequently in eruption, and has a height of 1,843 feet.

Barrere de Vienzac, Bertrand, bar'-air ve'-ĕ-zak, a noted member of the "Committee of Public Safety," during the French revolution. He voted for the death of Louis XVI., whom he styled Louis the Traitor. In the troubles of this revolution, he acquired, from his flowery style when speaking or writing of the acts of the republicans, the name of the "Anacreon of the Guillotine." An intimate associate of Robespierre, he yet retained some influence after his death; and he was made, by Bonaparte, editor of a paper to declaim against the English, and became attached to the police. On the fall of Napoleon he retired to Belgium, but in 1830 returned to Paris, where he died. B. at Tarbes, 1755; D. 1841.

Barrett, George, bar'-et, a landscape-painter, who was self-taught, and obtained, when young, the premium of £50, offered by the Dublin Society for the best landscape in oil. In 1762 he came to London, and the year after his arrival he gained the premium given by the Society for the Encouragement of Arts, &c., for the best landscape. B. at Dublin, 1732; D. at Paddington, 1784.—He was one of the first who suggested the foundation of the Royal Academy, of which he became a member.

Barrett, William, an English topographical author, who spent more than twenty years in collecting materials for a history of his native city, Bristol, which he published in 1788. D. 1789.—He was the early patron of the eccentric Chatterton.

Barrhead, bar'-hed, a small town of Scotland, 6 miles from Glasgow, and very picturesquely situate. Pop. 6,069. Manf. Cotton, prints, bleach-works.

Barri, Giraldus de. (See Giraldus Cambrensis.)

Barrier Reef, the Great, an immense coral reef, from 1,000 to 1,200 miles in length, on the N.E. coast of Australia, from which it is distant from 10 to 60 or 70 miles. Inside the reef the navigation is safe but intricate; and on one of the islands which dot its surface is a beacon 40 feet high.

Barriga Negra, bar'-re-ga ne'-gra, a town in a district of the same name, in Uruguay, where are large cattle-breeding estates, some of which have as many as 200,000 head.

Barrington, John Shute, Lord Viscount, bar'-ing-ton, the first Lord Barrington, was the son of Mr Shute, a merchant; but a Mr. Barrington, who had married his cousin, having left him his estate, he, by act of parliament, assumed his arms and name. He wrote several works advocating the rights of Protestant dissenters, and, in 1720, was created an Irish peer, being then member for Berwick. In 1725 he published his "Miscellanea Sacra." He also wrote "An Essay on the Several Dispensations of God to Mankind," and other works. B. at Theobald's, Herts, 1678; D. in Berkshire, 1734.—It is remarkable that another gentleman, John Wildman, of Becket, should also have left Lord Barrington a considerable estate in Berkshire, although they were but slightly acquainted.

Barrington, the Honourable Daines, fourth son of the above, was brought up to the law, and in 1757 was made a Welsh judge, after which he was appointed second justice of Chester. He resigned these offices long before his death, and lived in retirement in the Temple, engaging himself principally in the studies of antiquity and natural history. He wrote "Observations on the Statutes," a work which has frequently been reprinted, and to which, in the later editions, new matter has been added. He also wrote tracts on the possibility of reaching the north pole. These were intended to promote a favourite project of the author and embodied a vast amount of traditionary, as well as conjectural evidence. Besides these, he contributed several papers to the Royal and Antiquarian societies, of both of which he was a member, and of the latter vice-president. B. 1727; D. in the Temple, 1800.

Barrington, Samuel, younger brother of the above, who was, in 1778, created rear-admiral of the white, and sent to the West Indies, where his valour and prudence gained him the highest reputation; and, against a far superior force, he greatly distinguished himself by the taking of St. Lucia. In 1782 he served under Lord Howe, and bore a part in the memorable relief of Gibraltar. B. 1729; D. 1800.

Barrington, the name of several parishes in England, none of which has a population exceeding 600.

Barroccio, Frederigo, bar-rotch'-e-o, an eminent Italian painter, who, under the patronage of Pope Pius X., assisted in embellishing the Belvedere palace at Rome. The Annunciation, in fresco, on one of the ceilings, and a picture of the Holy Virgin with the infant Saviour, were of his execution; but his finest performances are the Presentation in the Temple, and the Visitation of the Virgin Mary to Elizabeth, which he painted for the Chiesa Nuova during the pontificate of Gregory XIII. B. at Urbino, 1528; D. 1612.

Barros, or De Barros, John, bar'-ros, a learned Portuguese historian, who was tutor to the sons of King Emanuel; and when his pupil Don Juan ascended the throne as King John III., he had conferred upon him the governorship of St. George da Mina, on the coast of Guinea. He was subsequently recalled to Lisbon, and appointed agent-general for the Portuguese colonies, in which capacity he composed his great work entitled "Asia Portugueza," and which he divided into four decades of ten books each. B. at Viseu, 1496; D. near Pombal, 1570.—The style of this writer is considered a model of Portuguese prose.

Barrosa, or Barossa, ba-ros'-sa, a village of Spain, 16 miles from Cadiz, where the French, under Victor, were defeated by the British, March 5, 1811.

Barrot, Camille Hyacinthe Odilon, bar'-ro, a celebrated French statesman, who showed great talents at an early age, and acquired considerable reputation as an advocate. After the revolution of 1830, in the principal transactions of which he was deeply engaged, he accompanied the dethroned dynasty to Cherbourg. Under Louis Philippe, Barrot, as a member of the Chamber of Deputies, was in opposition to Guizot, and was ardent in agitating for reform, and attended several of the provincial banquets, the interdiction of which ultimately led to the revolution of 1848, at the commencement of which he pleaded in vain for the establishment of the regency of the duchess of Orleans. He subsequently became, in December, 1848, president of the council; and, in September, 1849, from ill health, resigned; and, in 1852, withdrew from public affairs. B. at Villefort, 1791.

Barrow, Isaac, bar'-o, an eminent mathematician and divine, who was first placed in the Charter-house, and afterwards removed to Felsted school, in Essex, whence he was entered at Trinity College, Cambridge. In 1647 he was chosen a scholar, and subscribed the engagement; but repenting of what he had done, he went back and struck out his name from the list. This was in strict conformity with the remarkable antagonistic and belligerent spirit which, up to the present period, he had frequently, if not usually, displayed. At school he was distinguished for his pugilistic qualities, and in the eyes of his father, who was linen-draper to Charles I., seemed such an incorrigible boy, that in his conversation he would express himself that if it pleased Providence to remove any of his offspring, that it might be Isaac, as he could best be spared. But however high might be his combative qualities, they were by no means superior to his intellectual powers. He had been a hard student, and the writings of Bacon, Descartes, Galileo, and similar philosophers, were his favourites, because they were profound. In 1649 he was chosen fellow of his college, and studied physic with a view of making it his profession; but by the advice of his uncle, afterwards bishop of St. Asaph, he forsook it, and devoted himself to theology. In 1655 he went on his travels, and at Constantinople read over all the works of St. Chrysostom. It was during this cruise up the Mediterranean, that the vessel in which he sailed was attacked by an Algerine pirate, when he assumed carnal weapons, and took his part with the rest of the crew in driving off the enemy. On his return he was episcopally ordained, and in 1660 was chosen Greek Professor at Cambridge. In 1662 he was appointed Gresham Professor of geometry; and in the year following was elected fellow of the Royal Society. In 1664 he gave up the Gresham professorship, on being appointed Lucasian Professor of mathematics at Cambridge, which chair he resigned in 1669 to his pupil, then Mr. Isaac Newton. In 1670 he was created D.D., and two years afterwards appointed master of Trinity College; on which occasion the king said that he had given it to the most learned man in England. In 1675 he served the office of vice-chancellor, at which time the life of this truly great man was drawing to a close. B. in London, 1630; D. 1677, in his 47th year, and was buried in Westminster Abbey.—Not only as a mathematician, but as a divine, Barrow merits to rank with the highest of England's worthies. In the former capacity, Dr. Pemberton remarks, "He may be esteemed as having shown a compass of invention, equal, if not superior, to any of the moderns, Sir Isaac Newton only excepted." He was the originator of the idea of what has been called the incremental triangle, and proved the error of his predecessors in affirming that a portion of a curve may be taken so small, that it may, in calculation, be considered as a straight line. He was the author of many mathematical works; amongst which we may mention his "Lectiones Mathematicæ," which are esteemed as perfect models in the hands of those who are attached to the reasoning of sound geometry. As a divine, he seems inexhaustible in argument, knowledge, and power. Bishop Heber, speaking of the three greatest religious teachers of England, Taylor, Hooker, and Barrow, thus distinguishes them:—"Of such a triumvirate, who shall settle the pre-eminence? The first awes most, the second convinces most, the third delights and persuades most . . . To Barrow the praise must be assigned of the closest and clearest views, and of a taste the most controlled and chastened." If the opinion of Charles II. is worth anything, in judging of him as a preacher, he said Barrow was the most unfair, because he exhausted every subject on which he discoursed. Bishop Warburton remarks that in reading him you are obliged to think; and the great earl of Chatham, when, in early life, he was qualifying himself for public speaking, read his sermons again and again, till he could recite many of them memoriter. Of his personal prowess and courage there are many anecdotes.—Walking about the premises of a friend in the evening, he was attacked by a fierce mastiff, which being chained all day and let loose at night, set on him with great fury. The doctor caught him by the throat, and throwing him down, lay upon him; once he had a mind to kill him, but he altered his resolution on recollecting that this would be unjust, as the dog only had done his duty. At length he was heard by some of the family, who came out and freed both from their disagreeable situation. As a proof of his wit, we are told that, being on one occasion at court, he met the witty Lord Rochester, who, by way of banter, thus accosted him:—"Doctor, I am yours to my shoe-tie." Barrow, seeing his aim, returned his salute obsequiously, with, "My lord, I am yours to the ground." Rochester replied, "Doctor, I am yours to the centre;" which was followed by Barrow, with "My lord, I am yours to the antipodes." Upon which Rochester, scorning to be foiled by a musty old piece of divinity, as he used to call him, exclaimed, "Doctor, I am yours to the lowest pit of h—l." On which Barrow, turning on his heel, answered, "There, my lord, I leave you."

Barrow, Sir John, rose from being a mathematical teacher at Greenwich to the post of second secretary to the Admiralty, which he discharged for forty years. His first step to advancement in public life, however, arose from his accompanying, as private secretary of Sir George Staunton, the expedition of Lord Macartney to China. On his return he published his "Travels in China," which, at the time, was considered one of the most valuable and interesting accounts which had appeared of the Chinese. In 1797 he accompanied Lord Macartney to the Cape of Good Hope in the capacity of his private secretary; and on his return published a volume of his "Travels in Southern Africa." In 1814 he received his appointment from Lord Melville to the second-secretaryship of the Admiralty, when his ardour in the pursuit of geographical knowledge and scientific discovery was soon evinced by the manner in which he endeavoured to serve his country in bringing before various governments the desirability of prosecuting voyages to the arctic regions. These services were honourably noticed in various ways; and in 1835 he was created a baronet. B. near Ulverstone, 1764; D. 1848.

Barrow, a considerable river of Ireland, which, rising in the Sievebloom mountains, in Leinster, flows through Queen's County, King's County, Kildare, and Carlow, and, after a course of nearly 100 miles, during which it receives the Nore, Blackwood, and Green rivers, forms, with the Suir, the estuary Waterford Haven. At Athy it is joined by a branch of the Grand Canal, leading to Dublin.

Barrow, the name of several parishes in England.

Barrow Straits, the passage leading to Baffin's Bay from the Arctic Ocean, 40 miles wide, and 200 to 300 miles long, with high and rocky coasts and deep water. Lat. 74° N. Lon. between 84° and 90° W.—They were discovered by Baffin, in 1616, and derive their name from John Barrow, secretary of the Admiralty, who held that office when they were visited by Parry, in 1819.

Barry, Spranger, bär'-e, a celebrated actor, who was bred a silversmith, which trade he abandoned for the theatre, and made his first appearance in the character of Othello in 1744. In 1747 he came to England, and was engaged at Drury Lane, which he soon quitted for Covent Garden, and proved a formidable rival to Garrick, who was the leader of the former house. In 1758 he went to Ireland; but his speculations in two theatres, one in Dublin and the other in Cork, proving unsuccessful, he returned to England, when he and his wife were engaged by Mr. Foote, at the Haymarket. In 1766 he accepted proposals made by Garrick, and removed to Drury Lane. About 1773 Barry left Drury Lane for Covent Garden; but he did not live long after, being worn out by an hereditary gout. B. in Dublin, 1719.—His great excellence was in tragedy.

Barry, James, an eminent lawyer, whose father, in the time of Charles I., was a representative of the city of Dublin. In 1629 he was made king's serjeant, and in 1634 one of the barons of the Exchequer, with the honour of knighthood. He was a great friend to the earl of Strafford, and, at the Restoration, was advanced to the office of chief justice of the King's Bench in Ireland and the peerage. B. at Dublin; D. 1673.—He wrote "The Case of Tenures upon the Commission of Defective Titles," Dublin, 1637, folio.

Barry, James, a celebrated painter, who, at the age of nineteen, painted an historical picture on the legend of the baptism of the king of Cashel, which was exhibited to the Dublin Society for the encouragement of arts. The genius exhibited in the treatment of this subject brought him under the notice of Burke, the distinguished statesman, who introduced him to Sir Joshua Reynolds, Dr. Johnson, and other eminent men. Burke enabled him to visit Italy, where he studied with ardour. On his return, in 1775, he published "An Inquiry into the Real and Imaginary Obstructions to the Acquisition of the Arts in England," 8vo, a work of considerable merit. About this time he proposed to paint gratuitously for the Society of Arts a series of pictures, illustrative of the position, that the happiness of mankind is promoted in proportion to the progress of knowledge. His offer was accepted, but his labour was ill requited, and these great works now adorn the institution in the Adelphi. He was subsequently elected royal academician, and in 1786 was appointed professor of painting to the Royal Academy, where his lectures were greatly admired. In 1799 he was removed from his office, and soon after expelled from that institution, on account of some severe allegations which he made against the Academy in outvoting him upon several of his propositions for the advancement of art. B. at Cork, 1741; D. in London, 1806.—Mr. Barry was engaged some years in painting a large picture of Pandora, eighteen feet long and ten broad; but it was not finished at his death. It is, however, on his Victors of Olympia that his fame principally rests. It forms the third of the series painted for the Society of Arts. "There is a grasp of mind in it," said Dr. Johnson when he saw it, "you will find nowhere else;" and Canova would have visited England for no other purpose but to see it, had he known of its previous existence.

Barry, Martin, a distinguished physiologist, who, having studied in the universities of Edinburgh, Paris, and Berlin, merits notice principally on account of his having devoted the greater portion of his time to the study of animal development and embryology. On these subjects he has written a number of treatises, and in 1839 was the first to announce the important discovery "that the segmentation of the yolk, which had been observed in batrachian reptiles, was also true of mammals." B. at Fratton, Hampshire, 1802; D. at Beccles, in Suffolk, 1855.

Barry, Marie Jean, Countess du, bar'-re, the favourite of Louis XV., was the daughter of an exciseman of the name of Vaubenier. After having passed some portion of her early life in a convent, we find her, at little more than the age of fifteen, engaged in a fashionable milliner's in Paris. Possessing a remarkably handsome person, which she set off by a vulgar familiarity of demeanour, she had already passed through several stages of vice, when she was presented to Louis XV. by Lebel, his own valet-de-chambre. In order that she might appear at court, that licentious monarch conferred upon her the title by which she is generally known. During the reign of Louis XV. her influence was all-powerful; but when he died, in 1774, she was shut up in a convent near Meaux. She was subsequently released by Louis XVI.; and the residence of Luciennes, which the preceding sovereign had built for her, was restored to her with a pension. After this she lived in retirement and all but forgotten, when the Revolution broke out. It is gratifying to have it sometimes to record, that there are, in life, situations which will call forth, from the most depraved, virtues the most exalted. Gratitude is one of the noblest sentiments of the human mind; and, whatever may have been the vices of the Countess du Barry, she seems to have possessed this in an eminent degree. Appreciating the kindness with which she had been treated by Louis XVI., she now took the deepest interest in the misfortunes of him and his family. She left her retirement, not only to mourn over, but to endeavour to repair, the broken fortunes of royalty. Regardless of danger, she visited England in 1793, that she might dispose of her jewels, and, with the proceeds, assist the queen of France and her children, who were then prisoners in the Temple. On her return, she was arrested; and, in the November of the same year, she was taken before the revolutionary tribunal of her country, and, on the charge of "being a conspirator, and of having worn mourning in London for the death of the tyrant," was condemned and executed in the same month. B. at Vaucouleurs, 1746; suffered, 1793.

Barry, Sir Charles, R.A., bär'-e, architect of the Houses of Parliament, whose first building which attracted attention was the 'Travellers' Club-house, Pall-Mall. Fifteen years later he built the Reform Club-house; and amongst other buildings of which he was the architect may be named King Edward's Grammar-school, Birmingham; the new buildings at University College, Oxford; and Clifden House, near Maidenhead. B. in Westminster, 1795; knighted, 1852; D. 1860.

Bars, or Barsch, barsh, a county of Hungary, described as fertile in the produce of fruit and grain, and in its mountains yielding silver and gold. Pop. 150,000.

Bars, or Barsch, a town of Hungary, 60 miles from Pesth, which formerly gave its name to the above county, of which it is the capital.

Barsabas, bar'-sa-bas, 'son of rest,' a distinguished Christian, supposed to be one of the seventy disciples, called Joseph the Just.

Barsheim, bar'-shime, the name of four small parishes of England.

Barsine, or Barsene, bar-si'-ne, a daughter of Darius, who married Alexander, by whom she had a son called Hercules. Cassander ordered her and her child to be put to death.

Barsoe, bar'-so-e, a small Danish island in the Little Belt, 10 miles from Apenrade.

Bar-sur-Aube, bar-soor-obe, a town in the department of Aube. It is seated on the river Aube, 18 miles from Joinville. Pop. 4,134.—In 1814, Napoleon I. had a sharp action in the neighbourhood of this place with the allies.

Bar-sur-Ornain. (See Bar-le-Duc.)

Bar-sur Seine, bar'-soor-sain, a town of France, in the department of the Aube, 18 miles from Troyes. Manf. Wine and brandy, and it has a trade in wool and grain. Pop. 3,000.—Here, in March, 1814, Marshal Macdonald opposed an obstinate resistance to the advance of the allied Austrian and Russian forces on Paris; but was ultimately obliged to retire before superior numbers.

Bart, John, bart, a celebrated French naval hero, whose father was a poor fisherman, and was killed in a naval action. Bart early entered the Dutch navy, and served under Admiral De Ruyter, distinguishing himself, from time to time, by his courage and strength, in which he was superior to most of his shipmates. When, in 1672, war was declared by France against the Dutch, Bart quitted that service, and entered that of the French, when, after several private enterprises, in which he greatly distinguished himself, his name became known to Louis XIV., who sent him a gold medal and chain, with the rank of lieutenant in the royal navy. He now rapidly rose, and, in 1690, commanded a 40-gun ship in the Brest fleet under Admiral de Tourville, to whom he was of signal service in the action off Dieppe, in which the French were successful over the English and Dutch fleets. In the following year he landed on the coast of Scotland, and destroyed several villages. In 1692 he had the command of a squadron of frigates and a fire-ship, with which he destroyed 86 sail of English merchant-ships, landed near Newcastle, where he burnt 200 houses, and returned to Dunkirk with prizes valued at 500,000 crowns. In 1694 he was sent with a squadron of six ships to convoy a fleet laden with corn. This fleet had been captured, when Bart fell in with it, by a Dutch squadron of eight men-of-war; but, though he was much inferior in force, he retook the prizes and their captors and carried them to France. For this he obtained a patent of nobility to him and his descendants. The peace of Ryswick, in 1697, put an end to the war, after which he retired to live with his family. B. at Dunkirk, 1655; D. 1702.—The eldest son of this brave seaman became a vice-admiral, and died in 1755.

Bartan, bar'-tan, a town of Natolia, situate on the Black Sea, 50 miles from Eregli. Pop. 10,000.—This is the ancient Parthenius.

Bartas, William Sallust de, bar'-ta, a French poet, who was the son of a treasurer of France, and who rose to be honoured so far as to be sent by Henry IV. on several embassies. He wrote a poem, entitled "The Week of the Creation," in seven books, translated into English by Sylvester. The reputation of this work was so great, that it passed through thirty editions in six years. It was translated into several languages; and yet, although so popular on its appearance, it has long ago fallen into contempt. B. at Montfort, 1544; D. of the wounds he received at the battle of Ivry, 1590.

Barth, Dr. Heinrich, bart, the celebrated African traveller, who, in early life, commenced the pursuit of travelling, with the view of advancing geographical discovery. In 1845 he left Marseilles, and followed the French and Spanish shores as far as Gibraltar, passed over to Tangier, in Africa, and proceeded to Algiers, making excursions to Tunis and other places in the interior. On his way to Cairo, he was wounded in an affray with the Arabs, and lost all his papers. He then explored Egypt, Syria, Palestine, Asia Minor, and Greece; thus nearly making the circuit of the Mediterranean. These travels he published at his own expense. He afterwards accompanied Dr. Overweg and Mr. Richardson in their travels through North and Central Africa, during which they traversed more than 12,000 miles. (See Africa.) The volume in which he gives an account of these explorations is most valuable to the geographical student. B. at Hamburg, 1821.

Barth, a seaport-town of Prussian Pomerania, situate at the mouth of the Barth, 18 miles from Stralsund. It trades principally in wool and corn, and has some shipbuilding-docks. Pop. 5,000.

Barthe, Nicholas Thomas, bart, an ingenious French writer, the author of several dramatic pieces, and a translator of Ovid's "Art of Love" into French verse. B. at Marseilles, 1737; D. at Paris, 1785.

Barthe'lemy, John James, bar-tai'-le-me, a learned French writer, who received his education first in the college of the Oratory at Marseilles, whence he removed to that of the Jesuits. In 1744 he visited Paris, and was nominated associate in the care of the cabinet of medals, and afterwards became secretary to the Academy of Inscriptions, and obtained the appointment of keeper of the cabinet of medals. In 1755 he visited Naples, then rendered interesting to an antiquary by the discovery of the treasures of Herculaneum. He wished much to have a specimen of the ancient writing in the Greek manuscripts; but he was told by those who had the care of the curiosities, that they could not grant his request. On this he only asked to see a manuscript page for a few minutes. It contained twenty-eight lines, which Barthélemy read attentively, and, going aside, transcribed the whole, and sent the facsimile to the Academy of Belles-lettres;—an act which many may applaud for its cleverness, but few for its honesty. In 1758 the duke de Choiseul gave him a pension, to which he subsequently added the treasurership of St. Martin de Tours and the place of secretary-general to the Swiss Guards. In 1788 he published his great work, entitled "The Voyage of the Younger Anacharsis in Greece," upon which he had been employed thirty years. Of the merits of this work it is now hardly necessary to speak, yet the sketches of Grecian manners which it gives are not much to be relied on. In 1789 he was chosen a member of the French Academy; and now, when he was nearly eighty years of age, he was arrested during the reign of terror, and, as an aristocrat, cast into prison. He was, however, released by Danton the next day, the Jacobins being themselves ashamed of the atrocity of such an act. B. at Cassis, in Provence, 1716; D. at Paris, 1795.—The abbé was a member of the most distinguished foreign societies, as well as of those in his own country. He united, with his profound learning, modesty, simplicity, and good-nature. Besides his Anacharsis, he wrote a number of papers, chiefly on medallic subjects, in the collection of the Academy of Inscriptions, and in the "Journal des Savans." If ever a man was weary of life, it was he; for the French revolution had not only swept away his income of 25,000 francs a year, for which he cared little; but he had seen his oldest, dearest, and best friends first cast into prison, and thence led to perish on the scaffold.

Barthe'lemy, St., a name common to several small parishes, towns, and villages of France.

Bartholine, Thomas, bar-to-leen, a celebrated physician at Copenhagen, who took his doctor's degree at Bâle, in 1645. In 1647 he was appointed professor of mathematics at Copenhagen, and in the following year obtained the anatomical chair. Whilst he held this office, he published many valuable medical and anatomical works, the most celebrated treating of the discovery of the lymphatic vessels, to which he laid claim; but this is contested in favour of Rudbeck, a Swedish anatomist. In 1661, owing to delicate health, he resigned his professorship, and retired to the country; but, in 1670, a fire destroying his house, with his library and manuscripts, he returned to Copenhagen, when the king appointed him his physician, and afterwards, in 1675, member of the Grand Council of Denmark. B. 1616; D. 1680.—He left five sons and three daughters, most of whom were distinguished for their talents and learning.

Bartholomew, bar-thol'-o-mu, 'son of Tholmai,' a name of the apostle Nathanael.

Bartholomew, St., one of the Caribbee islands, in the W. Indies, lying 30 miles W. of St. Christopher. Area, about 35 square miles. Desc. Fertile, producing sugar, cotton, cocoa, and tobacco. Pop. 10,000. Lat. 17° 53' N. Lon. 62° 52' W.—This is the only colony which Sweden has in America, having been ceded in 1784 by France to that country, who liberated the slaves there in 1847.

Bartholomew, a county of Indiana, U.S. Area, 400 square miles. Desc. In general, fertile; yielding excellent wheat and oats, and rearing cattle and horses. Pop. about 13,000.

Bartholomew, bar-thol'-o-mu, of the martyrs, archbishop of Braga. He assisted at the council of Trent, where he strenuously urged the necessity of a reform among the clergy. He was the father of his flock, and, in a time when the plague raged amongst them, remained at his post doing good. He subsequently resigned his archbishopric, and retired to a monastery, the convent of Viana, which he had founded. B. at Lisbon, 1514; D. 1590.—His works are in 2 vols. folio.

Bartholomew, commonly called Anglius, an English Franciscan monk, whose family name was Glanvil, and who studied at Oxford, Paris, and Rome. He was the author of a celebrated work entitled "De Proprietatibus Rerum," and nineteen books treating of God and the whole circle of created things.—Lived in the middle of the 14th century.

Bartholomew, St., one of the twelve apostles. He preached the gospel in the Indies, in Ethiopia, and Lycaonia, and is said to have been flayed alive in Armenia; but this assertion does not seem to be well founded.

Bartholomew, David Ewin, a native of Linlithgowshire, and captain in the British navy. He was impressed in 1795, and was promoted, for his exemplary conduct, to the petty officer's post of master's mate. In 1798 he won the patronage of Sir Home Popham, and for three years served under that officer, on the coast of India, in the Romney; and on their return, in 1803, was paid off. Failing to obtain promotion, he applied to the first lord of the Admiralty, which led to a most unwarrantable proceeding on the part of that minister, who took steps to secure his imprisonment, a second time, on his presenting himself at the Admiralty. This proceeding was brought under the notice of the House of Commons, who severely censured it as a violation of the usage of the navy. He was sent to join the Inflexible as foremastman, but was quickly replaced on the quarter-deck. In 1815 he was advanced to post-captain for gallant conduct in the river Potomac; and the same year obtained a companionship of the order of the Bath. In 1818 he fitted out the Leven for surveying service, and, after examining the whole of the Azores, part of the African coast, and some of the Cape de Verd Islands, terminated his career at the island of St. Mayo. D. 1821.

Bartimeus, bar-tim'-e-us, 'son of Timeus,' or 'of the honourable,' a blind beggar of Jericho, healed by our Saviour.

Bartisch, George, bar'-tisch, a German surgeon, born at Königsberg, author of a treatise on diseases of the eye, which was very popular. B. about the middle of the 16th century.

Bartleman, or Barthelemon, Hypolite, bar'-tel-măn, a celebrated violinist and composer. He was engaged by Garrick to set several dramatic pieces for the theatre; and was afterwards engaged for several seasons as leader at the Italian Opera. He was greatly admired for his taste and execution. B. 1741; D. 1801. —His facility at setting words to music was so great that he is reported, on his first interview with Garrick, to have written down the notes of a song to be introduced into the "Country Girl," as fast as the manager composed the verses.

Bartoli, Giovanni, bar'-to-le, a goldsmith of Siena, who made, with G. Marci, in 1369, by order of Pope Urban V., the silver busts of Peter and Paul, in which the skulls of these apostles were placed.

Bartoli, Daniele, an Italian, who, at the age of fifteen, entered the order of the Jesuits, and, in 1650, was sent for to Rome by the father-general, and commissioned to write the history of that order in the Italian language. He arranged his subject according to the several missions which the order had established; and his most interesting volumes are those treating of the first success of the Jesuits on the Malabar and Coromandel coasts, and the rapid diffusion of Christianity in Japan, from the landing of Francis Xavier, in 1549, till its total eradication in 1637, when Japan was closed against all Europeans except the Dutch, and the missions to Cochin-China and Tonquin. He also wrote various works on morality, physical phenomena, and language, and was appointed rector of the Gregorian or Roman college, in 1671. B. at Ferrara, 1608; D. 1685.

Bartoli, Pietro Santi, a painter and engraver of Bartolâ, who bore also the name of Perugino. He was a pupil of Nicolas Poussin. His original pictures are few, as he chiefly copied from others; but he is celebrated for his engravings, which are very beautiful and highly finished. He was appointed antiquary to the pope and Christina, queen of Sweden. B. 1635; D. at Rome, 1700.

Bartolomeo, Andreas de, bar'-to-lo'-me-o, an eminent Italian jurist, who studied at Bologna, and took his doctor's degree n 1439. He afterwards became professor of canon law at the university of Ferrara, which post he relinquished for the chair of civil law at Bologna, of which place he was created a citizen in 1442. He is supposed to have been present at the council of Bâle, in 1431, and distinguished himself by advocating the doctrine of the immaculate conception of the Virgin Mary. He was ted, in 1466, by John, king of Aragon, his counsellor, and was also knighted. His nativity is uncertain, both Messina and Noto having been named as the place. B. 1400; D. 1479.

BARTOLOMEO, a Spanish sculptor of the 13th century, who executed the nine statues at the portal of the cathedral of Tarragona.

BARTOLOMEO DI CAPUA, an Italian jurist, created, in 1284, by Charles II. of Naples, protonotary of his kingdom; which situation he held till his death. He took his doctor's degree in 1278, and D. 1328.

BARTOLOMEO, Leonardo di, a native of Palermo, one of the most celebrated politicians of Sicily in the 15th century. In 1431 he gained great popularity among his countrymen for having obtained most important privileges for the city of Palermo from King Alfonso the Magnificent. He had a great part of the supreme government in 1436, when the viceroy went to Gaeta; and he conferred a great benefit on the state, by obtaining for it the statute called Ritus Magnæ Regiæ Curiæ et totius Regni Siciliæ Curiarum, a regular code of legal procedure known under the title of Rito del Re Alfonso. He was killed at Palermo, in a popular tumult regarding the administration of public alms, it is said by command of King Alfonso, to whom his popularity had become offensive. The murderer (Tommaso Crispo) was never punished. D. 1450.

BARTOLOMEO, Dionisio di, a Neapolitan architect, who built, in the years 1586 to 1597, the church and convent of the PP. Oratorii at Naples, a celebrated architectural work.

BARTOLOMEO, Maestro, an early Italian painter of the 13th century, who painted the picture of the "Annunciation" in the church of the Servi in Florence.

BARTOLOMEO IN GALDO, St., a town of Naples, in the province of Capitanata, 27 miles from Foggia. Pop. 5,500.

BARTOLOZZI, Francesco, bar-to-lot'-se, the eminent Florentine designer and engraver, was the son of a silversmith, and commenced engraving under Joseph Wagner, of Venice. When he had completed his engagement, he married a Venetian lady, and removed to Rome, whither Cardinal Bottari had invited him, and here he established his reputation by his plates from the "Life of St. Nilus," and his portraits for a new edition of Vasari. He shortly, however, returned to Venice, where he was engaged by Mr. Dalton, librarian to George III., to engrave a set of plates after Guercino, and afterwards was invited by him to England, on a stipend of £300 per annum. He was elected a member of the Royal Academy in 1769; and, for thirty years after, was incessantly occupied in his profession, especially in the new mode of stippling in imitation of chalk. His most numerous engravings are from the pictures of Angelica Kauffman and his fellow-pupil at the Florentine academy, Cipriani, who had also settled in England, and with whom he had ever continued a close intimacy. In 1802 he accepted an invitation from the prince regent of Portugal to superintend a school of engraving at Lisbon, with a handsome salary, to which was annexed an elegant residence and the profit of the engravings. B. 1725; D. 1815.—Bartolozzi was the father of the celebrated Madame Vestris.

BARTON, Elizabeth, bär'-ton, commonly called "the Holy Maid of Kent," first became known in 1525, when a servant at an inn at Aldington, in Kent, for her sanctity and miraculous endowments. About 1534, during the negotiations for Henry VIII.'s divorce from Catherine of Aragon, she, under the influence of a trance, spoke words which were taken by those about her for the effect of inspiration, and a priest, named Richard Masters, conveyed an account of her proceedings to Warham, archbishop of Canterbury, who encouraged him to note carefully all she should say. Masters, in conjunction with Dr. Bocking, a monk of Canterbury, took her under his direction, and put into her mouth pretended revelations against the doctrines of the Reformation and the king's divorce. Among other things, she predicted, that, should the king proceed with the divorce, "he should not be a king a month longer, and, in the reputation of Almighty God, not one hour longer; but should die a villain's death." This denunciation was followed by others still more menacing, spoken by the favourers of Queen Catherine, and at length moved the king to harsh measures. The Maid of Kent, with her principal accomplices, was cast into prison, and a most wretched series of impostures was elicited. The parliament adjudged the offence one of treason; and she, with five priests, was executed at Tyburn in 1534.

BARTON, a name common to a number of hamlets, townships, and parishes in England, of small populations.

BARTON-ON-HUMBER, a market-town and parish in Lincolnshire, on the south side of the Humber, 6 miles from Hull. Manf. Cordage, bricks, and tiles. Pop. about 4,000. It is a station on the Manchester and Lincoln Railway.

BARTON-ON-IRWELL, a township in Lancashire, 7 miles from Manchester, on the Irwell. Pop. about 10,000, chiefly engaged in collieries, flax-mills, &c.

BARUCH, bai'-ruk, the prophet, was of noble family, and attached himself to Jeremiah, whom he followed into Egypt. The book which bears his name is not received as canonical either by the Jews or Protestants. Lived about 600 B.C.

BARUFFALDI, ba'-roof-fall'-de, a Jesuit, who, after the suppression of his order, became librarian and secretary of the Ariostean Academy, and wrote several religious and literary works, the chief of which is the "Life of Ariosto." B. at Ferrara, 1740; D. 1817.

BARWICK, John, bar'-wik, an English divine, who exerted himself with singular dexterity in behalf of the royal cause during the civil war, for which he was committed by the parliamentarians to the Tower, where he remained a long time. At the Restoration, in producing which he had a considerable share, he obtained the deanery of Durham, which he afterwards exchanged for that of St. Paul's. B. at Witnerslack, Westmoreland, 1612; D. 1664.

BARWICK, Peter, brother of the above, also favoured the royal cause; and, on the Restoration, was appointed physician to Charles II., and was assiduous in his duties at the time of the plague, being one of the few who did not desert his post. Of his writings, which are numerous, the most celebrated are those in defence of Dr. Harvey's discovery of the circulation of the blood; works which were received with considerable favour. B. 1619; D. 1694.

BARZILLAI, bar-zil'-ai-i, 'son of iron,' a wealthy Gileadite.

BARZIZA, Gasparino, bart-seed'-sa, an Italian writer, who was one of the principal revivers of classical literature in Italy. Owing to his diligent research, three books of Cicero's "De Oratore," the treatise on Rhetoric, and Quintilian's Orations, were rescued from oblivion. B. about 1370; D. 1431.

BAS. (See LE BAS.)

BASAITI, Marco del Friuli, ba'-sa-e-te, an Italian painter, the rival of Bellini, whom he surpassed in composition, but not in colouring. His principal pictures are, the "Descent from the Cross," in the monastery of Sesto, at Friuli; "Christ Praying in the Garden," in the church of St. Giobie; and the "Calling of St. Peter and St. Andrew," in the church of the Artosa, which is considered one of the most beautiful pictures of that age. Lived about 1510.

BASAN, Peter Francis, ba'-sa, a French engraver and printseller. He compiled many catalogues of prints, and a dictionary of ancient and modern engravers, which, notwithstanding its faults, is the best yet published. An edition of this reappeared in two volumes 8vo, in 1809. B. at Paris, 1723; D. 1797.

BASCHENIS, bas-ke'-nis, an Italian priest and painter, who is famed for his representations of every kind of musical instrument, which he interspersed with inkstands and other objects with a truthfulness which has not yet been equalled: his productions are still highly esteemed. B. at Bergamo, 1617; D. 1677.

BASCHENOW, Wassili, bas-ke-nov, a Russian architect, who studied at the academy of Moscow. He designed a model for the rebuilding of the Kremlin, and built the palace of Zarizin in the Gothic style, but this palace was destroyed soon afterwards by order of the empress Catherine II. B. at the commencemen of the 18th century; D. 1798.

BASCHI, Matthew, bas'-ke, founder of the Capuchin Friars, was admitted at an early age into the order of St. Francis at Montefalconi, when, shocked at the abuses which had crept into this order, he set himself to restore the primitive discipline in all its original severity. For this purpose he gave out that St. Francis had appeared to him, clothed in a particular habit, which was surmounted by a hood, terminating in a peak called capuccio, and hence the designation of "Capuchins." Assuming this dress, he repaired to Rome, and obtained from Pope Clement VIII. permission to adopt the habit, and to observe literally the rule of St. Francis. This reform raised him many enemies, especially amongst those monks he had left, who succeeded in getting him sent to prison, from which he was liberated by the interest of the duchess of Camerino, niece of Clement, and in 1529 was appointed vicar-general of the order. Two years after he resigned the appointment, and went about preaching for nearly twenty years. B. about the end of the 15th century. D. at Venice, 1552.

BASCHKIRS, or BASHKIRS, bash'-kirs, a Tartar tribe of Russia, where they occupy a portion of the government of Orenburg, Perm, and Viatka. These people are in Asia generally called Ischtiaks, and they live principally in tents, and on the produce of the chase, troubling themselves but little with agriculture, except in the winter, which they pass in their villages. It is in their territory that the rich gold and platina mines exist. They are Mahometans, and pay no taxes, but are all held under military service to guard the frontier. Their number is about 200,000, of whom 70,000 are enrolled on the same footing as the Don Cossacks.

BASEDOW, John Bernard, bas'-e-dou, a German writer and philosopher, who made great efforts to reform education, and entered with zeal into the disputes concerning the truths of Christianity, he avowing himself a sceptic. In 1774, under the patronage of Prince Francis of Anhalt-Dessau, he established the "Philanthropinum," a school which became the model of many others which afterwards arose, and produced a number of excellent teachers. At Magdeburg he also busied himself with the reform of the system of instruction, and with some success. B. at Hamburg, 1723; D. at Magdeburg, 1790.—The principal of his works are "Philalethia; or, New Views into the Truths of Religion and Reason;" and an elementary work of education, illustrated by 100 engravings, the text of which was printed in German, French, and Latin. This latter was an enlargement of the educational plan of J.-J. Rousseau and Comenius.

BASEILHAC, John, ba-sail-hak, a celebrated French lithotomist, who studied surgery under his uncle at Lyons, after which he was admitted a student at the Hôtel-Dieu at Paris. Attracted by his talents, the archbishop of Bayeux appointed him his surgeon in ordinary, and built an hospital, which he confided to his care. In 1728 the archbishop died, leaving Baseilhac a collection of surgical instruments, and a sufficient sum of money to enable him to be received as a master in surgery. He was, however, so grieved at the loss of his patron, that he repaired to Paris, and was admitted, in 1729, by the Feuillars, or Begging Friars, under the name of Frère Jean de St. Côme, continuing still to follow the exercise of his profession, and soon became celebrated in Paris. He took no recompense from the poor, and devoted the sums received from the rich to the support of an hospital near the Rue St. Honoré, which he established in 1753. Although Baseilhac was eminent in every branch of his profession, he was particularly celebrated for his success in operations of the stone, and in the extraction of the cataract; in the former of which he used an instrument, which he had invented in 1743, known as "lithotome caché," and is said to have performed more than one thousand operations, and upwards of five hundred for cataract. Simple in his habits, sober in life, generous to the poor, and truly religious, Baseilhac ranks amongst the most celebrated men of his time. B. at Poyestruc, near Tarbes, 1703; D. at Paris, 1781.

BASHAN, bai'-shan, 'in the teeth,' or 'in slumbering,' a rich district of country east of the Jordan.

BASHEE, or BASHI ISLANDS, bash'-e, a group of the Philippines, between Luzon and Formosa. Lat. between 20° and 21° N. Lon. 122° E.—In 1687, these islands were discovered by Dampier, and a Spanish colony was founded upon them in 1783.

BASHKIN, Mattei Semenof, bash'-kin, the leader of an heretical sect at Moscow, which not only opposed the ordinances and ceremonies of the Greek church, but also the divinity of Christ. He was imprisoned by Ivan the Terrible, but recanted and gave up the names of his followers among the clergy and religious orders. Lived about the middle of the 16th century.

BASIDOH, or BASSADORE, bas'-a-dor, a village in the island of Kisham, in the Persian Gulf, in which it is used as the principal station for British ships. Lat. 26° 39′ N. Lon. 55° 22′ E.

BASIL, bās-il, a physician, the founder of a sect who asserted that God had another son besides Jesus Christ, called Sathanael, who, having revolted against his father, was, with his companions, cast down from heaven to earth; and that Jesus Christ being sent to destroy his power, shut him up in hell, and altered his name by cutting off the last syllable. His followers were allowed to have everything, even their wives, in common. By order of the emperor Alexius Comenus, he was burnt alive in 1118.

BASIL, first bishop of Ancyra, was ordained to that office by the bishops of the Eusebians, in place of Marcellus, but was himself excommunicated, and his ordination annulled in the council of Sardica, in 347, though he still retained the see. In 351 he attended the second council of Sirmium, where he disputed successfully against Photinus. He was one of the greatest enemies to the Arians, but considered the head of the Semi-Arians; and procured their opinions to be established by a council held at Ancyra in 358. He was deposed in 360. D. 362.

BASIL, ST., surnamed THE GREAT, bishop of Cæsarea, was ordained by Eusebius, whom he succeeded in 370. He was persecuted by the emperor Valens, because he would not embrace Arianism. The best edition of his works was published by the Benedictines of St. Maur, 3 vols. folio, Paris, 1721-30. B. 326; D. 379.

BASIL, archbishop of Thessalonica, generally known as Ascholius or Acholius. He baptized Theodosius on the occasion of a fit of illness, 300, and was the beloved friend of St. Ambrose. D. 384.

BASIL. (See BALE.)

BASILICATA, or BASILICATE, bas'-il-e-kat'-ta, a territory of Naples, bounded on the N. by the provinces Principato Ultra and Capitano, N.E. by Bari, E. by Otranto and the Gulf of Taranto, S. by Calabria Citra and the Mediterranean, and W. by Principato Citra. Ext. 95 miles from N. to S., by a breadth of 65 from E. to W. Area, about 3,000 square miles. Desc. Mountainous in general, and watered by several streams and rivers, in the valleys of which the fertility is considerable. Pro. Corn, maize, hemp, flax, liquorice, and tobacco. On the slopes of the mountains olives are planted, and the pasturage is excellent. Vast numbers of sheep, goats, and swine are reared. Pop. about 500,000. Lat. between 39° 56′ and 41° 8′ N. Lon. between 15° 22′ and 16° 49′ E.

BASILISCUS, bas-i-lis'-kus, emperor of the East, was brother to Verina, wife of the emperor Leo I., by whose means he was appointed to the command of a fleet sent against Genseric, king of the Vandals, who had conquered Africa; the greater part, however, of his fleet and army perished, and he fell into disgrace. At the death of Leo, he conspired against his successor Zeno, and succeeded in placing himself on the throne in 475; but subsequently Zeno defeated him and entered Constantinople, putting Basiliscus into confinement, where he died, 477.

BASILIUS I., or BASIL, ba-sil'-e-us, surnamed the Macedonian, rose to be emperor of the East, though originally a common soldier. His conduct recommended him to the emperor Michael III., who made him his equerry and chamberlain. He accused Bardas of conspiring against the emperor, and afterwards assassinated him in the emperor's tent, and was made by Michael his colleague in the empire, in 866. Basilius remonstrating with the emperor for his cruelty, Michael attempted to depose him; but he anticipated his design, and one evening, when he retired intoxicated, murdered him in his bed, 867. His conduct on the throne was wise and equitable. He reformed the abuses in the state, defeated the Saracens in Asia, and carried the arms of the empire beyond the Euphrates in 872. He entered into a treaty with the Russians of Kiew, and sent them an archbishop; from which time the Russians acknowledged the authority of the Greek Church. D. at Adrianople, 813; D. from a blow by a stag while hunting, 886.

BASILIUS II. succeeded John Zimisces in 976. He was the son of Romanus the younger, and was associated in the government with his brother Constantine. He turned his arms against the Bulgarians, over whom he obtained a great victory in 1014; but treated his prisoners with horrid barbarity, dividing them into hundreds, and then putting out the eyes of ninety-nine, left the hundredth with one eye for a leader. In this condition they were sent to their king, Samuel, who was so horrified that he died two days after. D. 1025, after a reign of 50 years.

BASILOWITZ, John, emperor of Russia. (See IVAN.)

BASILUZZO, bă'-se-loot'-so, anciently Insula Herculis, one of the Lipari Islands, in Italy. It is uninhabited.

BASIN, bā'-sin, a geographical term applied to a collection of water, as a river, a sea, or a lake, and, in every instance, comprehending the countries which are drained by the waters that run into these.

BASING, bā'-zing, a parish in the county of Hants, 2 miles from Basingstoke. Area, 4,970 acres. Pop. 1,330.—During the civil war, the castle of this place was, for two years, defended against the parliamentary forces by the fifth marquis of Winchester. In 1645 Cromwell took it, and burned it to the ground.

BASINGSTOKE, bā'-zing-stoke, a populous town of Hampshire, 46 miles from London. Pop. 4,263.—Lancaster, the navigator, and the brothers John and Joseph Warton, were born in this town.—It is a station on the South-Western Railway.

BASKERVILLE, John, băs'-ker-oil, a celebrated printer, who, in 1726, kept a writing-school in Birmingham. He subsequently engaged in the japanning business, and became possessed of considerable property. In 1750 he turned printer and letter-founder, in which he was most successful. His types were purchased by a society at Paris, in 1779, who made use of them in printing an edition of Voltaire's works. B. at Wolverley, Worcestershire, 1706; D. 1775.—His works now possess a high value, especially his editions of some of the classics, which are greatly esteemed both in this country and on the continent.

BASQUE PROVINCES, bask (Span. VASCONGADAS PROVINCIAS), a territory of Spain, divided into three provinces,—Biscay, Guipuzcoa, and Alava. United Area, about 4,863 square miles. Desc. Mountainous and picturesque, the hills being generally covered to their summits with beeches, oaks, chestnuts, and other trees. The pastures are rich, and agriculture is well understood. Pro. Wheat, barley, pulse, flax, and numerous flocks are reared. Minerals. Iron, tin, and copper; marble, jasper, and porphyry. Towns. The principal are Bilbao, San Sebastian, and Vittoria. Pop. about 400,000. Lat. between 42° 25′ and 43° 28′ N. Lon. 1° 44′ and 3° 25′ W.—The Basques are a brave and primitive race, much attached to music and dancing, and eminently fitted for that kind of guerilla warfare by which they have so long preserved their independence. Humboldt thinks them the descendants of the ancient Iberi; and they are supposed to have, at different periods, held the whole of Spain under their sway. The language which they speak has no analogy with any other living tongue, and is supposed to have been, in remote ages, in use over the whole of the Spanish peninsula. There is also in France a territory which was anciently called the "Basque country," but which is now comprised in the department of the Low Pyrenees; its principal towns being Bayonne and St. Jean de Luz.

BASQUE, Michael le, bask, a famous buccaneer, who, in connection with L'Olonnais, took, about 1660, the towns of Maracaibo and Gibraltar, in the Gulf of Venezuela; the plunder amounting to upwards of 400,000 crowns.

BASNAGE, bas-naj, the name of a family of French Protestants of the 17th century, distinguished for their literary attainments.

BASS, George, băs, the discoverer of Bass's Straits, between Australia and Tasmania, was a surgeon on board H.M.S. Reliance. With Captain Flinders in a small boat, called the Tom Thumb, with only one boy, Bass doubled the heads of Botany Bay, and explored George's River, and afterwards Port Hacking River. In 1797, being furnished with greater resources, he made further explorations, and in 1798 he determined the existence of the strait which now goes by his name. He died, it is said, somewhere in S. America, and received, for his discoveries, carried out with so few advantages, neither distinction nor reward.

BASS, a small island in the mouth of the Frith of Forth, in Scotland, about a mile from the south shore of E. Lothian, much frequented by Solan geese. Lat. 56° 3′ N. Lon. 2° 35′ W.—After the Revolution a desperate crew got possession of it; and having a boat, which they hoisted up on the rock or let down at pleasure, took a great many coasting vessels, and held out the longest of any place in Britain for King James II.; but their boat being either seized or lost, and for want of the usual supplies from France, they were obliged to surrender.

BASS'S STRAIT, a strait between Australia and Van Diemen's Land, or Tasmania, about 150 miles wide. It was explored by Bass, a surgeon in the British navy, in 1798.

BASSAIN, or BASSEIN, bas'-sain, a seaport-town of Pegu, 100 miles from Rangoon. Pop. about 3,000. Lat. 16° 45′ N. Lon. 94° 50′ E.—This port came into the possession of the British in 1852.

BASSANI, John Baptist, bas-sa'-ne, a musical composer of the 17th century, and master of the famous Corelli. His compositions, consisting of six operas and thirty-one other pieces, range from 1680 to 1703, and are characterized as pure and pathetic. B. at Padua, about 1657.

BASSANO, James, bas-sa'-no, called THE OLD, an Italian painter, who excelled in landscape, and whose works are held in high estimation. Three of his sons were eminent artists. Francis put an end to himself in 1597; Leander was knighted; John Baptist imitated the manner of his father; Jerome, another son, was educated for a physician, but became a painter also. B. at Bassano, 1510; D. at Venice, 1592.

BASSANO, a town of Austrian Italy, in the government of Venice, 15 miles from Vicenza. It is surrounded by walls, is well built, and well paved with marble footpaths. The river Brenta winds past it, and the neighbouring country produces excellent wine and fruits. Manf. Woollens, straw hats, and copper utensils. There is a very large printing-establishment, to which paper-mills are attached; and there is a school of engraving, in which Bartolozzi, Volpato, and other distinguished engravers, were greatly improved. Pop. 10,000.—This is the birthplace of Francesco, Giacomo, and Leonardo da Ponte, the fathers of the Venetian school of painting. On September 9, 1796, Napoleon I. here defeated the Austrians under Wurmser.

BASSANTIN, James, băs'-an-tin, a Scotch astronomer, who was educated first at Glasgow, and afterwards at Paris, where he became teacher of mathematics. B. about 1504; D. 1568.—On his return to Scotland in 1562, he had an interview with Robert Melvill, so chivalrously attached to Mary Stuart. It was universally believed that Bassantin had unveiled the future to Melvill, and he became celebrated as one who was thoroughly conversant with the occult sciences.

BASSET, Peter, băs'-et, an English historian. He was chamberlain to King Henry V., whose history he wrote, which is still extant in MS. in the College of Heralds. Lived in the 15th century.

BASSETERRE, bas'-tair, a town of St. Christopher's, in the W. Indies, on the S. side of the island. It is situate at the mouth of a river which opens into a bay called Basseterre Road. Pop. 7,000. Lat. 17° 17′ 30″ N. Lon. 62° 42′ W.

BASSETERRE, a seaport, and the capital of the French island of Guadaloupe, in the W. Indies. It has no harbour, and the roadstead is open. It is the seat of a royal court and courts of assize, and the residence of the governor. Pop. of the district, 12,500, of whom nearly two-thirds are slaves; of the town, 5,500.

BASSI, Laura, bas-se, a learned Italian lady, was famed for her knowledge in philosophy, mathematics, and literature. Her singular attainments procured her, when twenty-one years of age, the title of doctor of philosophy. In 1745 she read lectures upon experimental philosophy, and continued to do so till her death. In 1738 she married Dr. Verati, and preserved an excellent character by the practice of every virtue. B. at Bologna, 1711; D. 1778.

BASSOMPIERRE, Francis, bas'-som-pe'-air, a marshal of France, celebrated for his gallantry, wit, and courage, during the reigns of Henry IV. and Louis XIII. In 1622 he was made marshal of France, and sent as ambassador to Spain; and in 1625 was ambassador, first in Switzerland, and then in England. He was afterwards present at the siege of Rochelle, which surrendered Oct. 28, 1628. Taking part with the aristocracy against Cardinal Richelieu, he incurred that minister's displeasure, and was imprisoned in the Bastille ten years. While there he wrote his memoirs, which are full of anecdotes of his time, and a narrative of his embassy. B. in Lorraine, 1597; D. 1646.

BASSORA, BUSSORAH, or BUSRAH, bus'-o-ra, a town in the pashalic of Bagdad, situate on the western bank of the Shat-el-Arab, about 70 miles from the mouth of that river, which is formed by the junction of the Tigris and Euphrates. The walls, which are washed by the river, are at least 7 miles in circumference, within which space are extensive date-tree plantations and cornfields. They are entered by five gates, and surrounded by a broad and deep ditch. The city is indifferently built, the houses being mostly constructed of sun-dried clay, faced with burnt bricks; the streets are irregular, and, notwithstanding their being intersected by numerous canals, they are kept in a very filthy state. The English factory is esteemed the finest building in the city, although there is a governor's residence being built, and several mosques. COMMERCE. Bassora being the great emporium of the Turkish empire for eastern produce, this is extensive. Its imports comprise silk, muslin, linen, white and blue cloth for the clothing of the Arabians, gold and silver stuffs, various metals, sandal-wood, and indigo; pearls from Bahrein, and coffee from Mocha; shawls, fruit, and the precious metals, from Persia; spices from Java; and European commodities from different ports. Exp. The precious metals, copper, dates, gall-nuts, raw silk, gold fringe, and horses to Bombay. Mode of Transit. The trade with the interior is conducted by means of caravans to Aleppo and Bagdad, whence the goods are conveyed to Constantinople. Pop. about 60,000. Lat. 30° 30′ N. Lon. 47° 3′ 15″ E. Bassora was founded in the year 656, and was in 1668 taken by the Turks; by the Persians in 1777, and evacuated in 1778, when the Turks again took possession of it. They were once more, in 1787, expelled by the Arabs, but afterwards they recaptured the city.

BASTA, George, bas'-ta, a soldier and military writer of the 16th century, served under the duke of Parma, and distinguished himself in 1596, by provisioning the town of La Fère, which was besieged by Henry IV. Afterwards he was engaged by the emperor, to whom he rendered signal services in Hungary and Transylvania, and was made a count. B. at Rocca; D. 1697.—He wrote two works on military discipline.

BASTAN, bas'-tan, a valley of Spain, in the province of Pamplona, in Navarre, containing fourteen villages, and yielding excellent pasturage to numerous flocks.

BASTARNÆ and BASTERNÆ, bas-tar'-ne, a people who first inhabited that part of European Sarmatia which corresponds with a part of Poland and Prussia, and who are considered to have been the founders of the Russians and Sclavonians.

BASTIA, bas'-te-a, the former capital of the island of Corsica, built on a hill, in the form of an amphitheatre, 70 miles from Ajaccio. It is defended by a strong citadel, and has a safe harbour. Manf. Liqueurs and soup, and it has a trade in wine, oil, figs, pulse, and skins, in all of which the surrounding country is very productive. The stilettoes made here are much valued by the Italians. Pop. 26,000. Lat. 42° 41′ 48″ N. Lon. 9° 27′ E. Bastia is the seat of the Royal Court for the island.

BASTWICK, John, bast-wik, an English physician, who attacked the Church of England in several publications, for which he lost his ears in the pillory, and was sentenced to perpetual imprisonment in the isles of Scilly. In 1640 he was released by the Parliament, and had a reward of £5,000 allowed him out of the archbishop of Canterbury's estates. B. at Writtle, Essex, 1593; D. about 1650.

BATAVI, bă-tai'-vi, or băt'-a-vi, a people of Germany, who inhabited that part of the continent known now as Holland, and called by the ancients Batavorum insula.

BATAVIA, bă-tai'-ve-a, the capital not only of the island of Java, but of all the Dutch possessions in the East, lies embosomed in a beautiful bay studded with islands, nearly at the N.E. end of Java. It stands on a marshy flat, and is cut into two sections by the Tjiliwong, or Great River, whence, in various directions, diverge several canals. The old town being extremely unhealthy, the Europeans chiefly reside in the new or suburban parts, which run for several miles over the high grounds into the country; and as each house stands apart and alone from its neighbour, and is encompassed by cocoa, banana, and other tropical trees, its inhabitants enjoy all that delightful coolness and freshness of atmosphere which belong to the shadiness of groves. It is in the old part of the city, however, that all business is done: from ten till four the warehouses, offices, banks, and Exchange, present a busy scene. After that hour, when the merchants have retired to their homes, the place seems quite deserted. The principal buildings are a stadthouse, exchange, an hospital, and it has several churches, some Chinese temples, a mosque, two orphan asylums, and a club-house. Being the seat of the supreme commission of public instruction for the Dutch East Indies, it has a school of art and science, besides a newspaper. The streets are paved with footpaths on either side, for the use of Chinese or free natives, upon which, however, slaves must not walk, and Europeans never walk, unless followed by a carriage. As Batavia is the commercial emporium of the Asiatic archipelago, its trade is extensive. Exp. The principal are sugar, coffee, rice, pepper, mace, spice, and arrack. Of the three articles most in demand for European consumption, coffee, pepper, and sugar, the two former are entirely monopolized by the Dutch government. Imp. Cotton and linen goods, woollen stuffs, wines, provisions, and metallic wares, and all kinds of American and European manufactures. It receives spices from the Moluccas, diamonds and gold-dust from Borneo, tea, nankin, mother-of-pearl, paper, and tobacco, from China, and opium, drugs, patna, &c., from Bengal. Pop. 118,300, divided in the following proportions:—Dutch, English, Portuguese, 2,800; Chinese, 25,000; Javanese, 80,000; Moors and Arabs, 1,000, and slaves, 9,500. Lat. of the observatory, 6° 8′ S. Lon. 106° 50′ E.—In 1619, Batavia received from the Dutch its present name, and by 1723 it had risen to be a considerable town. In 1811 it was captured by the British, but was, by the treaty of 1815, restored to its former possessors.

BATE, George, bait, a writer and doctor, who became principal physician to Charles I. at Oxford. During the civil war he resided in London, where he was highly esteemed, and in 1651 attended Cromwell. At the Restoration he was made physician to the king, and elected a fellow of the Royal Society. Dr. Bate wrote a history of the civil wars in Latin, and some tracts on physical subjects. B. at Maids Morton, Buckinghamshire, 1608; D. in London, 1668.—Bate is reported to have administered some potion to Cromwell which accelerated his death, but the report has never been substantiated.

BATEMAN, William, bait'-man, bishop of Norwich, and a great master of civil and canon law. He founded Trinity Hall, Cambridge, in 1347, and was employed by Edward III. in many embassies in his long contention for the crown of France. B. at Norwich; D. at Avignon, 1355.

BATEMAN, Thomas, an English physician, distinguished for his great labours in the cause of medical science, principally connected with diseases of the skin. B. at Whitby, 1778; D. 1821.—He is the author of several medical works, some of which have been translated into French and German.

BATES, William, baits, an English nonconformist divine, who was one of the commissioners at the Savoy conference, for revising the liturgy, and was offered the deanery of Lichfield, which he refused. B. 1625; D. at Hackney, 1699. His theological works were collected and published in one volume folio, after his death. He published the "Lives of Learned and Pious Men," in one volume 4to, 1681, Latin.—Bates is considered the politest writer, if not the best scholar, of the whole body of ministers who, in 1622, on the passing of the Act of Uniformity, seceded from the church, and formed what is called the Dissenting interest.

BATH, bath, a city of Somersetshire, picturesquely situate on the river Avon, 100 miles from London, and long a fashionable resort for pleasure and the benefit of its mineral waters. It is well and regularly built of freestone, having many beautiful edifices, and presenting a fine appearance. Its principal buildings are the abbey church, St. James's and St. Michael's; the assembly and concert rooms; a guildhall, a clubhouse, a theatre, a jail, and the buildings connected with its baths. It has a literary and philosophical institution, a mechanics' institute, and a public subscription-library. The hot springs, to which the city principally owes its celebrity, were in use among the Romans. There are five public baths, four of which are the property, and under the direction, of the corporation. The temperature of the different springs varies from 93 to 117 degrees of Fahrenheit. The Abbey baths are the property of Earl Manners, and are handsomely furnished. The city also enjoys the luxury of a park, which lies to the west, and it has other public places of recreation. Pop. 54,240; but this number is continually fluctuating by the arrival and departure of visitors.—Bath is of great antiquity, and was known to the Romans under the appellation of Aquæ Sulis Fontes Calidi. In the 16th century it is said to have been maintained chiefly by the manufacture of woollen cloths. In conjunction with Wells, it forms a bishopric, which embraces all the county of Somerset, with the exception of a part of Bristol. Both the cathedral and the palace of the bishop, however, are at Wells. It stands on the Great Western Railway, and communicates with Bristol and other towns by the Kennet and Avon Canal.

BATHEASTON, bath'-eest-on, a parish of Somerset, 3 miles from Bath. Pop. 1,795.—On Salisbury Hill here, there are traces of a supposed encampment of the SAXONS during the siege of Bath, in 577. It has a station near the Great Western Railway.

BATHGATE, a town and parish of Linlithgowshire, 25 miles from Glasgow. Pop. 4,500. The celebrated mineral called Torbanehill coal is worked here. It is a station on the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway.

BATHORI, Stephen, ba-to'-re, king of Poland, who was sovereign prince of Transylvania, and was elected to the throne of Poland in the place of Henry of Valois. He reformed many abuses, and defeated the Russians, who were forced to cede Courland and a part of Livonia to the Poles. D. at Grondo, 1586. Others of his family succeeded him.

BATHSHEBA, bith-she'-ba, 'daughter of an oath,' the wife of Uriah, afterwards of David, and mother of Solomon.

BATHURST, Allen Earl, bath'-urst, an eminent statesman, who was a zealous opposer of the measures of Sir Robert Walpole. In 1742 he was admitted of the privy council; in 1757 was appointed treasurer to the prince of Wales, obtaining, at the accession of George III., a pension of £2,000 a year; and in 1772 was created Earl Bathurst. B. in Westminster, 1684; D. near Cirencester, 1775. His son Henry was, in 1771, created Lord Apsley, and made lord chancellor, and afterwards president of the council under Lord North. B. 1714; D. 1794.

BATHURST, a flourishing British settlement in W. Africa, on the island of St. Mary's, at the mouth of the Gambia. It exports WAX, ivory, gum, gold, hides, tortoise-shell, rice, cotton, African teak, and palm-oil. Pop. about 3,000, chiefly blacks. Lat. 13° 28′ N. Lon. 16° 32′ W.

BATHURST, the principal town in the gold regions of New South Wales, situate on the Macquarrie river, 120 miles from Sydney. Pop. varying; perhaps 8,000.—Another town in New Brunswick, North America. Lat. 47° 37′ N. Lon. 65° 45′ W.—A cape of British North America, in the Arctic Ocean. Lat. 70° 30′ N. Lon. 12° 30′ W.—An island off North Australia, 30 miles long and 30 broad.—A lake in the centre of Newfoundland, 40 miles long by 6 wide.

BATIGNOLLES-MONCEAUX, ba'-teen-yol maw'-so, a suburb of Paris. In 1814 it was an open space, which the Prussians under Blucher used as a camp. It is now occupied by handsome buildings. Pop. about 20,000.

BATLEY, bät'-le, a town in the West Riding of Yorkshire, 2 miles from Dewsbury. Manf. Chiefly cloths and carpets. Pop. about 18,000.

BATON ROUGE, ba'-ton roozh, the name of several towns and parishes in the United States, with populations ranging between 4,000 and 12,000.

BATONI, Pompeo, ba-to'-ne, an Italian painter, whose pieces are celebrated for their truthfulness, character, and colouring, and of which the most admired is "Simon the Sorcerer contending with St. Peter." B. at Lucca, 1708; D. at Rome, 1786.

BATOUM, ba'-toom, a seaport of Asiatic Turkey, on the E. coast of the Black Sea, 15 miles from the Russian frontier, and 110 from Trebizond. The harbour is the best on that side of the Black Sea. In the vicinity are great quantities of cattle, and delicious fruits are produced. Pop. 3,000, many of whom engage in fisheries. Lat. 41° 40′ N. Lon. 41° 37′ E.

BATRACHOMYOMACHIA, bät'-tra-ko'-mi-o-mai'-ke-a, a mock-heroic poem, of disputed ancient authorship, describing the fight between frogs and mice.

BATTAGLINI, Mark, ba'-ta-gle'-ne, bishop of Cesena. Wrote a History of Councils, 1686, folio, and "Annales du Sacerdoce et de l'Empire du XVII. Siècle," 1701 to 1711, 4 vols. folio. B. 1645; D. at Cesena, 1717.

BATTALAH, ba-ta-la, a town of Hindostan, province of Lahore. Lat. 31° 31′ N. Lon. 75° 3′ E. Its climate is considered the most healthy in the Punjab.

BATTANTA, ba-tan'-ta, an island in the Asiatic archipelago, with an estimated area of 200 square miles. Lat. 0° 56′ S. Lon. 130° 25′ E.

BATTEL, or BATTLE, bät'-el, a market-town and parish of Sussex, noted for a manufacture of gunpowder, which goes by its name. Pop. of parish, about 4,000.—The name of this place is derived from the battle of Hastings, which, on the 14th Oct., 1066, was fought here between William the Conqueror and Harold, and established the Norman conquest of England.

BATTERSEA, bät'-er-se, a village and parish of Surrey, on the Thames, across which is a bridge to Chelsea, in Middlesex. Pop. 11,000.—In the church of this parish is a monument to Lord Bolingbroke.

BATTHYANI, bat'-te-a'-ne, the name of a noble Hungarian family, various members of which, as princes, counts, bans of Croatia, bishops, &c., have played a distinguished part in the history of their country, and in that of Austria.

BATTLE-FIELD, a parish of Salop, 3 miles from Shrewsbury. Pop. 50.—In 1403, a battle was fought here between Henry IV. and the earl of Northumberland, whose son Hotspur was slain in the action. From this conflict the place derives its name.

BATU, or BATTOE, ba'-too, an island of the Malay archipelago, lying on the W. coast of Sumatra. Area, estimated at 400 square miles. Desc. Thickly wooded, and volcanic. Lat. 0° 10′ N. Lon. 98° 40′ E.

BATURIN, ba'-too-rin, a town of Little Russia, about 60 miles from Tchernigov. Pop. 5,000.—The Hetman of the Ukraine Cossacks resided here from 1699 to 1708. Mazeppa was one of these. (See MAZEPPA.)

BATYLLUS, bä-til'-us, a beautiful youth of Samos, greatly beloved by Polycrates the tyrant, and by Anacreon.

BAUCIS, baw'-sis, an old and infirm woman of Phrygia, who with her husband lived in a small cottage, in a penurious manner, when Jupiter and Mercury travelled in disguise over Asia. The gods came to the cottage, and were so pleased with the hospitality they received, that Jupiter changed their dwelling into a magnificent temple, of which Baucis and her husband were made priests. After they had lived happily to an extreme old age, they died both at the same hour, according to their request to Jupiter, that one might not have the sorrow of following the other to the grave. Their bodies were changed into trees before the doors of the temple.

BAUDET, Stephen, bo'-dai, a French engraver, whose chief work is a print of Adam and Eve, from a painting by Dominichino. B. at Blois, 1643; D. 1716.

BAUER, Bruno, bow'-er, a modern German biblical critic and political writer, who, at an early age, commenced his theological disquisitions by reviewing Straus's "Life of Jesus," and other works. Many of his works contain very bold and speculative opinions, and one of them, "Christianity Unveiled," was destroyed in 1843 at Zurich, before its publication. In his "Review of the Epistles attributed to St. Paul," he argues that the four leading ones were not written by the apostle, but are the production of the 2nd century. B. at Eisenberg, 1809.

BAUG, bawg, a town of Hindostan, in the province of Malwah, 80 miles from Oojein, and where there are some remarkable cave temples. Pop. 5,000.

BAUGE', bo'-zhai, a town of France, department of the Maine and Loire, 20 miles from Angers. Pop. 3,500.—Here, in 1421, the English, under the duke of Clarence, were defeated.

BAULEAH, baw'-le-a, a large town of Bengal, to the N.E. of the Ganges, about 25 miles from Moorshedabad.

BAUMEHAN, or BAUMIAN. (See BAMIAN.)

BAUME LES NONES, BAUME LES DAMES, or BAUME LES MOINES, or MESSIEURS, bome, none, dam, mwo'-een, a town of France, department of the Doubs, 16 miles from Besançon. It has paper and iron works, and quarries of gypsum. Pop. nearly 3,000.

BAUMGARTEN, Alexander Theophilus, boum-gar'-ten, a German philosopher, who studied at Halle, and became professor of philosophy there, and afterwards at Frankfort on the Oder. B. at Berlin, 1714; D. at Frankfort on the Oder, 1762.—Baumgarten may be considered as the creator of the æsthetic, or of the philosophy of the beautiful. He wrote "Metaphysica," 8vo; "Ethica Philosophica," 8vo; "Æsthetica Initia Philosophiæ practicæ primæ." His brother Sigismund was a distinguished divine of the Lutheran church, and professor of theology at Halle. He died in 1757.

BAUNACH, bow'-nak, a town of Bavaria, 7 miles from Bamberg. Pop. 1,000.—The grotto of the Magdalene is in the neighbourhood of this locality, and is frequented as a place of pilgrimage.

BAUR, John William, bour, a painter and engraver of Strasburg, whose pictures of buildings and landscapes are very excellent. B. 1600; D. at Vienna, 1640.

BAUR, Frederick Wilhelm von, a Russian engineer-general, who engaged early in military life; and in 1755 was in the British service, as an officer in the Hessian Artillery. In 1757 he obtained the rank of general and engineer. Frederick II. of Prussia ennobled him. In 1769 he entered into the service of Catherine II., empress of Russia, and was employed against the Turks. The empress had a high notion of his talents, and employed him in making the aqueduct of Sarskoe-Selo, for supplying Moscow with water, and in deepening the canal near St. Petersburg, at the end of which he constructed a large harbour, and other important undertakings. B. at Bieber, 1731; D. at St. Petersburg, 1783.—Baur had for his secretary the celebrated Kotzebue, who directed in his name the German theatre at St. Petersburg.

BAUTRU, William, bo'-troo, member of the French Academy, and a celebrated wit. B. at Angers, 1588; D. at Paris, 1665.

BAUTZEN, bout'-sen, a town of Saxony, on the river Spree, 31 miles from Dresden. The town-hall, the academy, the orphan-house, and house of correction, are all worthy of attention, as well as some ingenious water-machines, and the public walks. Manf. Linen, woollen, leather, and paper; and it has a considerable general trade. Pop. about 9,000.—On May 21 and 22, 1813, a great battle took place here, in which Napoleon I. defeated the Russian and Prussian army. It is the birthplace of Meissner the poet, who died in 1805.

BAVARIA, THE CIRCLE OF, ba-vair'-e-a, is an old subdivision of the German empire, which was bounded on the W. by Suabia, N.W. by Franconia, N.E. by Bohemia, and E. and S. by Austria. It embraced the modern kingdom of Bavaria, to the E. and S. of the Rhine, with the archbishopric of Salzburg.

BAVARIA, a kingdom of Central Europe, composed of two separate masses, the larger being bounded E. and S. by the Austrian dominions, W. by Wurtemberg and Baden, and N. by several small German states. The smaller is named Rhenish Bavaria, or the Palatinate, and is situate on the W. of the Rhine, bounded N. by Rhenish Prussia and Hessen-Darmstadt, E. by Baden, S. by France, and W. by Rhenish Prussia and Hessen-Homberg. United Area, about 30,000 square miles. Divisions or Circles. This large territory is divided into eight circles, the names of which are Upper Bavaria, Lower Bavaria, the Palatinate, Upper Palatinate, Upper Franconia, Middle Franconia, Lower Franconia, and Suabia. Desc. Viewed as a whole, this country may be considered as hilly rather than mountainous, although in the S. the Alps, in the Zugspitz, attain an elevation of 10,150 feet; on the E., between Bavaria and Bohemia, the Arber and Rachelberg respectively attain to 4,613 and 4,501 feet. There are numerous other peaks scattered over the country, but none of them rising to more than 3,500 feet above the level of the sea. The principal plains are the valleys of the Lech and Isar, and the extensive elevated plateau on the S. of the Danube, called the Donau-moss. It is in these that the chief sources of Bavarian wealth are to be found, where the arts of agriculture are carried to the highest state of perfection. Rivers. The Danube, the Rhine, and the Main. The first on its right bank receives the Iller, Lech, and Isar; whilst on its left the Wornitz, Altmuhl, Naab, and Regen, with a great many more smaller streams, are taken into its course. The Rhine forms the eastern line of the Rhenish subdivision of the kingdom, and is merely a boundary river. The Main, which has its source in two small streams in Suabia, drains all the N. part of the principal territory, and during its course receives several affluents. The Danube, however, is the principal river in the kingdom, and in its course, through the Bavarian territory alone, is fed by no fewer than 38 streams. Lakes. These are neither numerous nor of great extent. The most remarkable are the Ammer, the Würm, and the Chien, which are all situate in the S. plateau. The largest is the Chien, which has a circuit of about 35 miles. There are some other lakes lying within the range of the Noric Alps, but they are of no great size. Climate. On the whole, temperate and healthy. Forests. Extensive, covering nearly a third of the entire surface of the country, and composed chiefly of pine and fir-trees. Pro. There are few countries so highly favoured for productiveness of soil. The principal crops are wheat, rye, oats, barley, and, in some districts, maize, rice, spelt, and buckwheat. Tobacco, fruit, and potatoes are extensively cultivated in the valleys of the Rhine and the Main. The hop-plant and the vine are also largely cultivated; and the wines of Franconia have attained a wide-spread celebrity. The famed Steinwein is produced in Steinberg; and the Leistenwein is produced in the same district. The choicest of all the Bavarian wines, however, are the produce of the vineyards near Forst, Deidesheim, and Wachenheim, on the declivities of the Hardt mountains. Cattle-rearing is carried on to a great extent, but the stock is generally of an inferior quality, notwithstanding the general excellence of the pastures; whilst swine, poultry, and wild fowl are abundant in all parts of the country. Minerals. The principal are salt, coal, and iron. The first is a government monopoly, and the second is found everywhere throughout the kingdom. Copper, manganese, mercury, and cobalt are also found; whilst there are numerous quarries of marble, alabaster, gypsum, and stone, distributed over various parts of the territory. Porcelain clay also abounds in various districts, and is usually of the finest quality. Manf. Unimportant, considering the state and position of the kingdom. They consist of linen, woollen, and cotton-weaving, paper-making, tanning, hardware, beetroot-sugar, porcelain, jewellery, toys, clocks, and optical instruments. The brewing of beer is the most important manufacture, there being nearly 6,000 taxed breweries, producing 100,000,000 gallons yearly. Their art manufactures are also very extensive, and are principally at the capital, Munich (which see). Exp. Grain, cattle, timber, wine, wool, hides, salt, hops, fruits, liquorice, madder, butter, cheese, jewellery, and glass. Imp. Principally coffee, sugar, cotton, silks, woollen fabrics, and colonial products. There is besides a transit trade with Austria, North Germany, Switzerland, and Italy. Towns. Munich, Passau, Speyer, Regensburg, Baireuth, Nurnberg, Wurzburg, Augsburg. Rel. The majority of the inhabitants are Roman Catholics; but no predominant national church is recognized by the government. Education. Pretty generally diffused, and under the immediate superintendence of a superior board of education and ecclesiastical affairs. Gov. Monarchical, with the legislative power vested in two chambers conjointly, with the king as head of the state. Pop. about 5,000,000. Lat. extending from 47° 19′ to 50° 41′ N. Lon. from 8° 51′ to 13° 41′ E.—In 1805, Bavaria was, by the treaty of Presburg, raised to the rank of a kingdom; and in 1814 and 1815 was, by various treaties, confirmed in the accessions of territory which it had made. In 1848, the discreditable conduct of Louis, king of Bavaria, who became infatuated with the notorious Lola Montez, caused his subjects to take arms, when, after a short conflict with the soldiery, in which they were successful, he was, on March 21st, forced to resign his sceptre in favour of his son, the crown prince Maximilian, the second of that name who has filled the Bavarian throne, and who is the present reigning sovereign. The lines of railway permeate a considerable portion of the country; whilst the routes of navigation are secured by the Danube, the Rhine, the Main, and numerous other of the smaller rivers.

Bavrno, ba-vai'-no, a village of Piedmont, on the Lake Maggiore, opposite the Borromean Islands. Pop. about 1,000.—Here are fine marble and granite quarries, and behind the village is Monte Monterone, 4,350 feet high.

Bavius and Mævius, bai'-ve-us, me'-ve-us, two stupid and malevolent poets, in the age of Augustus, who attacked the superior talents of the contemporary writers, and have therefore become immortalized by the satire and ridicule which they drew upon themselves.

Bawian, baw'-yan, an island in the Eastern seas, 700 miles to the S.E. of Singapore. Ext. 30 miles in circumference. Desc. Mountainous, and intersected with fine valleys. Pop. 30,000, principally agricultural.

Baxter, Richard, băx'-ter, a celebrated nonconformist divine, who in 1638 was ordained by Bishop Thornborough, and two years later was chosen vicar of Kidderminster; but, on the breaking out of the civil war, he took suspicion at the designs of the Parliament, and resolved to repair instantly to the army and use his utmost endeavours to bring back the soldiers to the principles of loyalty to the king and submission to the Church. There was a grand sense of duty abroad in the breasts of the men of the 17th century. The moral as well as military heroism which sprung from this high sense makes us overlook, yea, almost forget, much of the violence by which many of their actions were crimsoned. Baxter, however, belonged to the church; but, so strong was the sense of duty in him, that, when Cromwell was declared Protector, he bravely withstood him to the face, telling him that "the honest people of the land took their ancient monarchy to be a blessing and not an evil." His inclinations, however, being with the Parliament, he became chaplain to Colonel Whalley's regiment. Whilst officiating in this capacity, he wrote his "Saint's Rest;" and was present at the taking of Bridgewater, and the sieges of Exeter, Bristol, and Worcester. Ill-health compelling him to leave the army, he, in 1657, returned to Kidderminster. Before his appointment to Whalley's regiment, however, he had passed some time at Coventry, officiating in the ministry; and he had even preached within hearing of the sound of cannon, when the roll of battle was passing over Edgehill. At the Restoration it was expected that moderation would have pervaded the councils of the nation, and that a form of ecclesiastical government that should reconcile all parties would be established; but this was not the case, and the Act of Uniformity of 1662 drove Baxter from the church. He now occupied himself with literary composition, and his "Call to the Unconverted" was one of the delightful fruits of this retirement. In 1672, when the flames of religious persecution, which had run over the land, began to expire, he once more came forth from his retreat. He settled in London, and, as a lecturer, preached usually at Pinners' Hall and Fetter Lane. He now occupied himself principally with writing and preaching, but was frequently suspended by those rigorous enactments to which the Nonconformists were, during the last two reigns of the Stuarts, frequently subjected. In 1682 the myrmidons of the law burst into his house whilst he was suffering from indisposition, and he was only saved from being dragged to a prison by the accidental interposition of his physician. Two years later he became one of the victims of the inhuman Jeffreys. He was apprehended on a charge of sedition, and for being hostile to episcopacy. His trial took place in 1684-5. On this occasion Jeffreys displayed his usual ferocity. When Baxter asked for time, "I will not give him a moment's time more to save his life. Yonder stands Oates in the pillory with him. I would say two of the greatest rogues and rascals in the kingdom stood there." When Baxter made an attempt to speak, the lord chief justice (how the title was abused in such a man!) exclaimed, "Richard! Richard! dost thou think we'll hear thee poison the court? Richard, thou art an old fellow, an old knave; thou hast written books enough to load a cart. Hadst thou been whipped out of thy writing trade forty years ago, it had been happy." The result was a fine of 500 marks, imprisonment till paid, and bonds for good behaviour for seven years. Lord Powis, however, stepped in, got the fine remitted, and Baxter was liberated in eighteen months. He lived for five years after this, preaching the gospel without molestation. B. in Shropshire, 1615; D. in London, 1691, and was buried in Christ Church.—The fame of this persevering, brave-spirited, and long-enduring man rests principally upon his two popular treatises, "The Saint's Everlasting Rest," and "A Call to the Unconverted."

Baxter, William, nephew of the above, who was celebrated for his proficiency in the classics, and his antiquarian research, and was appointed master of the Mercers' School in London. He published a grammar of the Latin tongue in 1679; an edition of Anacreon in 1695; an edition of Horace in 1710; and a Dictionary of British Antiquities in 1719. His Glossary of Roman Antiquities was not printed till 1726. B. at Lanlugan, 1650; D. 1723.

Baxter, Andrew, a Scottish philosopher, and author of "An Inquiry into the Nature of the Human Soul." B. at Aberdeen, 1686; D. 1750.

Bay, bai, a portion of the sea which is wider at the part nearest the open sea, and narrower as it recedes inland.

Bay Islands, Colony of the, a group in the Bay of Honduras, consisting of Ruatan, Bonacca, Utilla, Barbarat, Helené, and Morat. Lat. between 16° 5′ and 16° 30′ N. Lon. between 85° 45′ and 87° W.—This group was, on the 17th July, 1852, proclaimed a British colony, and has been the subject of discussion between Great Britain and the United States, as it is considered by the American government that the formation of these islands into a colony is a violation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

Bay of Islands, the name of several bays. 1. In the Straits of Magellan. 2. On the W. coast of King George the Third's Archipelago. 3. On the W. coast of Newfoundland. 4. On the N.E. coast of New Holland, in lat. 10° 31′ S.

Bay of Islands, a bay on the east coast of New Zealand, where are the settlements of Kororarika and Russell. Lat. 35° 14′ S. Lon. 174° 11′ E.

Bayan, or Bain Khara Coola, bai'-yan, a lofty mountain-range in Asia, on the N.E. border of Tibet, between the sources of the Hoang-ho and the Yang-tse-kiang.

Bayard, Peter, Chevalier de, bai'-yar, the celebrated French warrior, and called "the Good Knight, without fear and without reproach" (le Bon Chevalier, sans peur et sans reproche), had an ancestry of warriors, most of whom fell on various continental battle-fields. His father fought in many of the battles of

Louis XI., his grandfather fell at Montlhery, his great-grandfather at Cressy, and his great-great-grandfather at Poictiers. As was the practice in the 15th century with those who were designed for the profession of arms, Bayard, at 13 years old, was placed as a page in the house of the duke of Savoy, where he remained for five years. On the completion of his eighteenth year he entered upon the actual duties of a soldier. The first battle at which he fought was that of Fornovo, in 1494, under the banner of Charles VIII.; and the chivalric spirit of his ancestors, it was evident, had found a fitting representative in the young hero. Two horses were killed under him in that field; and he himself performed feats that procured him the approbation of all who beheld him. Several years after this he was engaged in the Italian wars of Louis XII., when, on one occasion, it is said that he held a bridge over the Garigliano, single-handed, against 200 Spaniards, and enabled the main body of the French to make good their retreat. In 1513 he fought at the famous battle of Spurs, in Picardy, when his valour saved the disgrace of the whole French army. In this field, also, fought Henry VIII. of England, then a young man, but commanding in person the English force. On this occasion Bayard surrendered to an English knight, but was soon exchanged. In the battle of Marignano, fought September 13th, 1515, Bayard displayed his usual prowess; and in 1522 he defended Mezières, a frontier town of France, against the count of Nassau, with a force of 35,000 men, assisted by a powerful artillery. In 1524, whilst fighting against the Imperialists in Italy, he continued to discover his usual romantic valour, when he fell from his horse, wounded by a ball. In this condition he was pressed to withdraw from the field; but answering that he never turned his back upon an enemy, desired that he might be placed with his back against a tree, that he might watch the varying fortunes of the fight; and he there sunk under his wound. B. in Dauphiné, 1476; D. on the banks of the Sesia, 1524.—The duke of Pescara, who, on this occasion, commanded the Spanish troops, caused the body of Bayard to be embalmed and sent to his relations. When it drew near the country of his birth, people of all ranks came forth to meet it.

BAYAZID, or BAGAZID, baj'-a-zid, a fortified city of Turkish Armenia, in the pashalic of Erzeroum, surrounded by a wall and ramparts, 150 miles from Erzeroum. It contains two churches, three mosques, and a monastery, which latter is distinguished alike by the beauty of its architecture and the remoteness of its antiquity. Pop. 5,000. Lat. 39° 24′ N. Lon. 43° 45′ E.—Here, in August, 1854, the Turks were defeated by the Russians; Selim Pasha having, contrary to the directions of General Guyon (Kurshid Pasha), attacked the Muscovites, who killed, wounded, and took prisoners nearly 2,000 Turks.

BAYER, John, bai'-er, a German astronomer, who, in 1603, published an excellent work, entitled "Uranometria," being a celestial atlas, or folio charts of all the constellations. He was the first to distinguish the stars by the letters of the Greek alphabet, and according to the order of the magnitude of the stars in each constellation. This work was republished, with great improvements by the author, in 1627, under a new title; viz., "Cœlum stellatum Christianum." B. at Augsburg about the end of the sixteenth century; D. 1660.

BAYER, Theophilus Sigfred, grandson of the above, a learned philologist, who acquired a great knowledge of the eastern languages, particularly the Chinese. In 1717 he was appointed librarian at Königsberg; and in 1726 was invited to St. Petersburg, where he was made professor of Greek and Roman antiquities. His "Museum Sinicum," printed in 1730, in 2 vols. 8vo, is a very curious and learned work. B. at Königsberg, 1694; D. at St. Petersburg, 1738.

BAYEUX, George, bai'-yu(r), a French advocate, who obtained from the academy at Rouen the prize for a poem on filial piety. He translated the "Fasti" of Ovid, and wrote also "Reflections on the Reign of Trajan." He was sent to prison, and massacred by the rabble of Caen. B. at Caen, about 1752; D. 1792.

BAYEUX, a town of France, on the river Aure, in the department of the Calvados, and about 20 miles from Caen. It has a magnificent cathedral with three towers, besides churches, convents, and a castle. Manf. Lace, damask, calico, cotton yarn, serges, and porcelain. It has a considerable trade in cattle, horses, and butter. Pop. 10,000.—In the cathedral is preserved the celebrated tapestry of Bayeux, said to have been wrought by Matilda, the wife of William the Conqueror, or the Empress Matilda, wife of Henry I. of England, and which represents the deeds done by the Norman duke in effecting the conquest of England. Napoleon, during the excitement of his meditated invasion of England, caused this piece of tapestry to be carried from town to town and exhibited in the theatres between the acts, to rouse the spectators to the achievement of a second conquest. Bayeux is of great antiquity, having existed before the invasion of Gaul by the Romans.

BAYLE, Peter, bail, a celebrated French writer, author of the well-known "Historical and Critical Dictionary," was educated for the ministry among the Protestants; but, while attending the Jesuits' college, became a Roman Catholic. Shortly afterwards, however, returning to his former communion, he went to Geneva, where he formed an intimacy with Basnage. He was subsequently appointed to the chair of philosophy at Sedan; but when that academy was suppressed, in 1681, he removed to Rotterdam, and was chosen professor of philosophy and history there. In 1684 he began a literary journal entitled "Nouvelles de la République des Lettres," which obtained great celebrity. In 1693 he was deprived of his professorship; and, in two years afterwards, appeared the first volume of his greatest work, "The Historical and Critical Dictionary," which quickly reached a second edition. B. at Carla, in Foix, 1647; D. 1706.—Besides the works already mentioned, he wrote, "Thoughts on Comets," "A Criticism on Maimbourg's History of Calvinism," "A Philosophical Comment on the Words of Christ, 'Compel them to come in,'" &c. His writings, however, are generally allowed to betray no small portion of scepticism on religious subjects.

BAYLY, Lewis, bai'-le, an eminent prelate, educated at Oxford, who was ordained bishop of Bangor, 1616, and is celebrated for his well-known work entitled "The Practice of Piety." B. at Carmarthen, about 1565; D. 1632.

BAYONNE, bai-yon', a well-built, opulent, and commercial town of France, in the department of the Lower Pyrenees, situate at the confluence of the Nive and Adour, at a distance of three miles from the sea. These rivers here form a commodious harbour, three miles from the Bay of Biscay, and divide the town into three parts, called Great and Little Bayonne and St. Esprit. A citadel, constructed by Vauban, on the top of an eminence in the suburb, commands both the harbour and the town, which are further defended by small redoubts. The cathedral is a venerable structure, and the quay is much frequented as a promenade; but the most beautiful part of the city is the Place de Grammont. A wooden drawbridge, which allows vessels to pass, and where a small toll is levied, connects the suburbs with the town. Its public buildings are a mint, a theatre, a tribunal, and chamber of commerce; and naval and commercial docks. Manf. Glass, ropes, cordage, chocolate, and liqueurs. It has some sugar-refineries. Exp. Resins, woollen cloths, serges, linens, dyed silks, drugs, cream of tartar, and wines. Imp. Fine Spanish wool, liquorice-root and juice, iron, cocoa, olive-oil, millstones, &c. The principal objects of the maritime trade are the cod and whale fishery. The hams of Bayonne have long been famous, and its wines and chocolate are exported in great quantities to the north of Europe. Pop. 20,000. Lat. 43° 29′ N. Lon. 1° 24′ W.—The military weapon called the bayonet takes its name from this city. A Basque regiment in a fight with the Spaniards near here, in 1523, found their ammunition exhausted, and fixed their long knives to their musket-barrels, and so charged the enemy. Although the city itself has often been besieged, it has never been taken.

Baza, ba-tha, a town of Spain, in Andalusia, 50 miles from Grenada, and situate at the foot of a sierra of the same name. Pop. between 11,000 and 12,000, military inclusive.—In 1480 this place was taken from the Moors, by the assistance of nine iron cannons, which it still preserves as memorials of the event.

Bazas, ba'-za, a town of France, department of the Gironde, 30 miles from Bordeaux. Pop. about 5,000, many of whom are engaged in the manufacture of glass.

Beachy Head, be'-che, the highest promontory on the S. coast of England, in the county of Sussex, 27 miles from Dungeness. Lat. of lighthouse, 50° 44′ 24″ N. Lon. 0° 12′ 42″ E.—It was off here, on the 30th June, 1690, that the French defeated the English and Dutch fleets, commanded by the earl of Torrington. (See Bart, John.)

Beaconsfield, be'-kons-feeld, a market-town and parish of Buckinghamshire, 23 miles from London. It consists of four streets, arranged as a cross. Pop. 1,732.—Within the precincts of the church of this place lie the remains of Edmund Burke, the statesman, and Waller the poet.

Beale, Mary, beel, an English portrait-painter, who copied with great exactness the works of Sir Peter Lely and Vandyke. B. 1631; D. 1697.

Beaminster, be'-mins-ter, a town of Dorsetshire, 12 miles from Dorchester. The tower of the church is nearly 100 feet high. Manf. Sailcloth, iron, and copper goods. Pop. about 3,000.

Bear Island, bair, an island on the S.W. coast of Ireland, at the entrance of Bantry Bay, sheltering the harbour of Bearhaven, considered the finest in Ireland. Ext. 6 miles long, by 1½ broad.

Bear Lake, Great, a lake of British North America, lying near the Arctic circle. (See America, North.)

Beard, John, beerd, an English actor and singer, who was brought up in the king's chapel. His first appearance on the stage was in the character of Sir John Loverule, in the "Devil to Pay," in 1737, at Drury Lane. In 1739 he married Lady Henrietta Herbert, daughter of the earl of Waldegrave, and widow of Lord Edward Herbert, who brought him little fortune. After quitting the stage some years, he returned to it in 1744, and continued engaged at Covent Garden till 1758. B. 1694; D. 1768.

Be'arn, bai'-arn, an ancient province of France, now included in the department of the Basses-Pyrénées.

Be'arn, Cape, a promontory in the department Pyrénées Orientales. Lat. 42° 31′ N. Lon. 3° 7′ 30″ E. Height of lighthouse, 751 feet above the level of the sea.

Beas, be-as, one of the great rivers of the Punjab, rising near the Ritauka pass, in the Himalayas, 13,200 feet above the level of the sea, and joining the Sutlej at Endressa, 30 miles from Amritsir. Lat. 32° 34′ N. Lon. 77° 12′ E.

Beaton, David, be'-ton, a cardinal, and archbishop of St. Andrew's, in Scotland. In 1519 he was appointed resident at the court of France, and in 1523 he obtained the rich abbey of Arbroath. In 1528 he was made lord privy seal, and negotiated the marriage of James V. with Princess Magdalen of France, and afterwards with Princess Mary. Paul III. raised him to the cardinalate in 1538; about which time he was made primate of Scotland. On the death of the king, the lords of the council sent the cardinal to prison, whence he was released, not long after, by the regent, and made chancellor. He persecuted the Protestants with great fury; and, among others, caused the celebrated Wishart to be burnt before his own palace. B. 1494; fell by the hands of assassins, 1546.

Beattie, James, LL.D., be'-tie, a distinguished Scotch writer, was the son of a shopkeeper and farmer, who sent him to the University of Aberdeen, where he pursued his studies with so much success as to receive a bursary, which is equivalent to an exhibition of scholarship in the English universities. After following the profession of a schoolmaster for some time, and publishing a volume of poems, and other works, in 1771, he produced the first canto of his poem called "The Minstrel," which was received with great favour. He was now admitted into the friendship of Dr. Johnson, Garrick, Sir Joshua Reynolds, and other celebrities of the period. Previous to the appearance of this effusion, he had published an "Essay on Truth," designed to stem, if possible, the tide of infidelity, which the philosophic speculations of David Hume were then diffusing over the land. For this he received, in 1773, a substantial token of the royal favour in a pension of £200 a year. The second canto of "The Minstrel" appeared in 1774, and was as enthusiastically received as was the first. He had now been sixteen years professor of moral philosophy and logic in Mareschal College, Aberdeen, an appointment which he retained until a short period before his death. B. at Lawrence-kirk, Scotland, 1735; D. 1803.—Beattie wrote several other works, which were much thought of in his days; but his fame rests principally on his "Minstrel," which was designed to trace the progress of a poetical genius, from the first dawning of fancy and reason till that period at which he may be supposed capable of appearing in the world as a minstrel.

Beattie, James Hay, eldest son of the above, was a youth of great promise, being unusually pious and talented. He was a good musician, performing well on the organ and violin, and succeeded in building an organ for himself. B. at Aberdeen, 1768; D. Nov. 19, 1790.

Beatus Rhenanus, be-ai'-tus re-nai'-nus, a learned man, whose name was Bilde, which he altered to Rhenanus, from the place of his nativity, Rheinach. He was a profound scholar, and was the first who published the History of Velleius Paterculus. He also edited the works of Tertullian, to which he added valuable notes, which he also did to several classical works. D. at Strasburg, 1547.

Beau, Charles le, le(r) bo, a French writer, was professor in the Royal College, and secretary of the Academy of Inscriptions. B. 1701; D. at Paris, 1778.—He is the author of a "History of the Lower Empire," in 22 vols. 12mo, and also of "Opera Latina," 3 vols. 12mo. A brother, John Louis le Beau, was the editor of an edition of Homer, Greek and Latin.

Beaucaire de Peguillon, Francis, bo'-kair, archbishop of Metz, who, at the council of Trent, pleaded with great eloquence in favour of reformation. He afterwards resigned his bishopric, and went into retirement, and wrote his "Rerum Gallicarum Commentaria, ab anno 1461 ad annum 1562." D. 1591.

Beaucaire, a well-built town of France, on the right bank of the Rhone, in the department of the Gard, chiefly remarkable for its great annual fair held from the 22nd to the 28th of July. It has a trade in silk, wine, oil, almonds, spices, drugs, leather, wool, and cotton; and during the period of its fair is frequented by merchants from all parts of Europe and Asia, to the number of 100,000. Pop. about 12,000.—On the opposite side of the Rhone is Tarascon, with which Beaucaire is connected by a very fine iron suspension bridge, considered second only to that of Menai.

BEAUCOURT, bo'-koor, a town of France, in the department of Haut-Rhin, 10 miles from Belfort. Manf. Watch and clock movements in great quantities. Pop. 2,000.

BEAUFORT, Cardinal Henry, bo'-fort, was bishop of Winchester and cardinal of St. Eusebius, and a son of John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaster, the father of Henry IV., by Catherine Swynford. He became the guardian of Henry VI. in opposition to Humphry, duke of Gloucester, who was the nominal head of the council of regency, which assumed the reins of government on the death of Henry V. In 1429, after several years of determined rivalship, the cardinal succeeded in destroying the power of the duke, and had the young king crowned. Notwithstanding this circumstance, the hostility between them continued until the death of the duke of Gloucester, which took place on the 28th February, 1447. The cardinal survived him only six weeks, according to Shakspere's delineation, in an agony of despair.

> "Lord Cardinal, if thou think'st on heaven's bliss,
> Hold up thy hand, make signal of thy hope.—
> He dies, and makes no sign."

His last words to those by whom his deathbed was surrounded were, "I pray you all to pray for me." B. about 1370; D. 1447.—He was buried in the elegant chantry which bears his name in Winchester Cathedral.

BEAUFORT, Margaret, countess of Richmond and Derby, was the daughter and heiress of John, duke of Somerset, and married Edmund Tudor, earl of Richmond, by whom she had a son, afterwards Henry VII. Her first husband dying in 1456, she married Sir Henry Stafford, by whom she had no issue; and on his death she became the wife of Thomas, Lord Stanley, afterwards earl of Derby. B. 1441; D. 1509, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. She distinguished herself as an author, and founded the colleges of Christ and St. John, in Cambridge.

BEAUFORT, Francis de Vendôme, duke of, the son of Cæsar, duke of Vendôme, who was imprisoned on the charge of conspiring against Cardinal Mazarin, but, escaping, began a civil war, which soon ended. He was subsequently made admiral of France, and in 1665 defeated the Turkish fleet near Tunis. B. 1616; killed at the siege of Candia, 1669.

BEAUFORT, Louis de, a learned writer, who was chosen fellow of the Royal Society of London, and is the author of the "History of Germanicus," "Dissertation upon the Uncertainty of the First Five Ages of the Roman Republic," "History of the Roman Republic; or, Plan of the Ancient Government of Rome." D. at Maestricht, 1795.

BEAUFORT, a county of the United States, in North Carolina, on the Sound and river of Pamlico. Area, 670 square miles. Desc. In general level, and producing maize, cotton, tar, and turpentine. Pop. about 15,000, slaves inclusive.

BEAUFORT, a district of South Carolina, U.S., on the seacoast, between the Savannah and Combarree rivers. Area, 1,540 square miles. Desc. Of a light and sandy soil, but producing cotton, Indian corn, rice, and sweet potatoes. Pop. about 40,000, slaves inclusive.

BEAUFORT, an inland district of the W. division of Cape Colony, S. Africa. Area, 13,050 square miles. Pop. about 8,000.—Its capital town is of the same name, and is situate on the Gamka or Great Lyon River, on a southern slope of the Nieuwveld Mountains.

BEAUFORT, a district of W. Australia, lying between the counties of Lansdowne, Howick, and Minto.

BEAUFORT, a town of Savoy, 30 miles from Chamberry, and celebrated for its gruyères cheese. Pop. 3,000.

BEAUFORT BAY, a bay of Russian America, in the Arctic Ocean. Lat. 70° N. Lon. 142° W.—CAPE, a bold headland in a bay further W. Lat. 69° N. Lon. 163° W.

BEAUFORT EN VALLE'E, val'-ai, a town of France, department of the Maine and Loire, 16 miles from Angers. It carries on an active trade in grain, wine, and hemp, with manufactures of linen and woollen stuffs, and hats. Pop. about 5,500.—There is another small town of the same name in the department of Jura, 8 miles from Lons-le-Saunier. Pop. 1,200.

BEAUGENCY, bozh-en-se, a town of France, department of the Loiret, on the Loire, 15 miles from Orleans. It trades in wine and brandy. Pop. 5,300.—It is a station on the railway from Orleans to Tours.

BEAUHARNAIS, Eugène de, bo-har'-nai, was the son of Josephine, the first wife of Napoleon I., and of Viscount Alexander de Beauharnais, who, in his 34th year, suffered on the revolutionary scaffold of Paris. He entered the army, and under the eye of Napoleon, fought in the campaigns of Italy, and also went with him to Egypt, where he acted as his aide-de-camp. As a matter of course, he rose to rank with his years, and with the fortunes of Napoleon I., and fought in the Consular Guards at Marengo. When Napoleon assumed the emperorship, he was created a prince, and in 1805 was appointed viceroy of the kingdom of Italy. In the following year he was adopted by Napoleon, and married to the daughter of the king of Bavaria. When, in 1809, the war between Austria and France broke out, he was actively engaged, being placed in command of the French and Italian army, and displaying great knowledge of his profession. He was with the emperor in the Russian campaign of 1812; and during the retreat, after Napoleon and Murat had left the army, he took the chief command. At the battle of Lutzen he commanded the left of the new army which the emperor had raised. So long as the last rays of fortune shone upon Napoleon, he adhered to him; but when these were shed, he retired with his family to Bavaria. During the remainder of his life he lived principally at Munich, with the title of Prince of Leuchtenberg. B. at Paris, 1781; D. at Munich, 1824.

BEAUHARNAIS, a county of Lower Canada, lying to the S.W. of Montreal. Ext. 55 miles long and 22 broad. Area, 710 square miles. Desc. Fertile, and, from the extent of its frontage to the St. Lawrence, possessing considerable advantages. Pop. 15,000, chiefly Scotch, Irish, and Americans.

BEAUJEU, bozh-u(r), a parish and town of France, in the department of the Rhone, 30 miles from Lyons. Manf. Cotton goods, hats, and paper; and it is famous for its mines. Pop. about 4,000.

BEAULEY, bo'-le, a river of Scotland, county of Inverness, which flows into the Moray Frith, and forms its upper basin.

BEAULIEU, Sebastian Pontault de, bole-yu(r), a French engineer, and field-marshal under Louis XIV., and the author of "Views and Plans of the Sieges and Battles of Louis XIV." D. 1674.

BEAULIEU, John Peter, Baron de, an Austrian general, who was actively engaged as an artillery officer during the Seven Years' war, and in 1792 commanded the Austrians against the forces whom the French republic sent into the Netherlands, and gained several victories over them. In 1796 he was commander-in-chief in Italy, and his army was routed in several conflicts with General Bonaparte, whose fame was then beginning to dawn. B. 1725; D. 1820.

BEAULIEU, a town of France, department of the Corrèze, 20 miles from Tulle. Pop. 2,500.—Another in the department of the Indre and Loire, 2 miles from Loches. Pop. 2,000.—Another in the department of the Loiret, with a small population.—This name is common to several more small towns in France.

BEAULIEU, or EXE, bo'-lu, a parish at the mouth of the river Exe, 6 miles from Lymington, where Margaret of Anjou, and afterwards Perkin Warbeck, fled for refuge. Exemption from arrest for debt is still a privilege within its manorial bounds.

BEAUMARCHAIS, Peter Augustin Caron de, bo-mar'-shai, a celebrated French writer, was the son of a clockmaker at Paris, and applying himself to the same trade, was the inventor of a new escapement, which brought him into notice at the French court, where he became a great favourite with the daughters of Louis XVI., having great musical talent, and playing exceedingly well on the flute and harp, which latter instrument he much improved. He now became acquainted with Duverney, the rich farmer-general, and at his death was involved in lawsuits with his heir, gaining great notoriety from the wit, satire, and reasoning which distinguished his pleadings and memorials. He is best known to the world, however, by his being the author of several comedies, of which "The Barber of Seville" and "The Marriage of Figaro" are the best; the latter meeting with immense success. B. at Paris, 1732; D. in prison, 1799.

BEAUMARIS, bo-mar'-is, a seaport-town and borough of the isle of Anglesey, in a spacious bay in North Wales, near the entrance to the Menai Straits, and 3 miles from Bangor. It has a handsome church, with a lofty square tower, and an elegant town-hall, a custom-house, and a free school. There is little trade, but, as a sea-bathing place, it is much resorted to. Pop. about 3,000.—Beaumaris has steam-communication with Liverpool.

BEAUMONT, Francis, bo'-mont. Of the life of this distinguished dramatist very little is known. His grandfather was a master of the Rolls, and his father, Francis, one of the judges of the court of Common Pleas. He himself became a member of the Inner Temple, but from the shortness of his life, and the great number of his productions, it is to be presumed that he devoted very little of his time to the worship of Themis. He tells us himself, in an epistle, that he was intimate with rare Ben Jonson, whom, with other wits of the period, he would seem to have been in the habit of meeting at the Mermaid tavern. Here he would, no doubt, also see William Shakspere; but how or where he became acquainted with his friend Fletcher, who was ten years older than himself, we have no means of knowing. It is beautiful, in retrospect, to contemplate the friendships of these two celebrated dramatists. Their affection for each other appears, in every respect, to have been of the closest kind: they lived in the same house, and, it is affirmed, held their worldly goods in common; and although their geniuses would seem to have been cast in different moulds, yet how well and how sweetly do they amalgamate! "I have heard," says Aubrey, "Dr. John Earle (since bishop of Sarum), who knew them, say that Beaumont's main business was to correct the overflowings of Fletcher's wit." But be this as it may, the names of Francis Beaumont and John Fletcher will, as long as the language shall last, be associated as two of the brightest ornaments of our dramatic literature. B. in Leicestershire, 1586; D. in London, 1615, being not quite thirty.

BEAUMONT DE PEREFIX, Hardouin, bo'-mong, a French historian, tutor to Louis XIV., by whom he was made archbishop of Paris. He wrote a "History of Henry IV." D. 1670.

BEAUMONT, Elie de, a French advocate, who distinguished himself by his memoir in favour of the unfortunate family of Calas, which produced a powerful effect upon the nation. B. at Carentan, 1732; D. 1785. He was also the author of several other esteemed pieces; and his wife produced a novel, entitled "Letters of the Marquis de Roselle."

BEAUMONT, the name of various towns and villages in France, none of them with a population above 5,000.

BEAUNE, Floriment de, bone, a French mathematician, who discovered a method of determining the nature of curves by the properties of their triangles. D. 1652.

BEAUNE, James de, baron of Samblançai, was superintendent of the finances under Francis I., and lent to the queen-mother a sum of 300,000 crowns, which had been sent to Lautrec to pay his troops, and for want of which the expedition to relieve Milan failed. The queen-mother bribed his secretary, Gentil, to deliver to her the receipts she had given, which being the only testimonies poor Samblançai had, he was accused of having applied the money to his own use, and was hanged in 1527. The fraud was afterwards discovered, and his secretary, Gentil, hanged.

BEAUNE, a town of France, in the department of the Côte-d'Or, 23 miles from Dijon. It is tolerably well fortified, has a castle, a large library, and an hospital, and is celebrated for its wines. Pop. 11,000.—Here Gaspar Monge, the chief improver, if not the inventor, of descriptive geometry, was born.

BEAUHAIN, John de, bo'-rā, a celebrated geographer at the court of Louis XV., who constructed a number of charts, and published a topographical and military description of the campaigns of Luxembourg from 1690 to 1694. B. at Aix-en-Essart, 1696; D. at Paris, 1771.

BEAUREPAIRE, bawr'-pair, the names of several cantons and villages of France.

BEAURIEU, Gaspard-Guillard de, bo'-re-u(r), an ingenious French philosopher, the author of "L'Elève de la Nature" (the Pupil of Nature) and of many other works. To the eternal disgrace of the Revolution, he died in an hospital in 1795; B. in Artois, 1728.

BEAUSSET, LE, bose'-sai, a town of France, in the department of the Var, 7 miles from Toulon. Manf. Wine, brandy, and soap. Pop. 3,000.

BEAUVAIS, bo-vai, a well-built commercial town of France, in the department of the Oise, 40 miles from Paris. This place is distinguished for the manufacture of its carpets and tapestry, in which a great number of hands are employed. Before the Revolution it was the see of a bishop (who had under his inspection 598 parishes), a governor, and several royal offices. The cathedral of Beauvais is much admired, its choir being the loftiest in the world, being 153 feet from the pavement to the roof; which is 13 feet higher than that of Amiens. Pop. about 13,000.—This town is of great antiquity, and was in existence in the time of the Romans. In 1472 it successfully withstood a siege against an army of 80,000 Burgundians under Charles the Bold. On this occasion the women particularly distinguished themselves, especially Jeanne Hachette, who seeing a Burgundian planting his standard on the walls, hurled him to the earth, and bore away the banner in triumph. The raising of the siege is still commemorated in the procession of St. Angadrème, when the ladies, conformably to an order of Louis XI., lead the procession, carrying the trophy which Jeanne Hachette so valorously acquired. The original name of this heroine was Lainé; but from the battleaxe with which she accomplished the above feat, she was henceforth distinguished as Hachette.

BEAUVILLIERS, Francis de, bo-vil'-e-ai, Duke of St. Aignan, a member of the French Academy; he wrote several poems, and had the direction of the court fêtes of Louis XIV. B. 1607; D. 1687. There are other members of this family, whose names will be seen in French history.

BEAUVOIR SUR MER, bove'-waw soor mair, a town of France, in the department of La Vendée, 30 miles from Nantes, and 3 miles from the sea, with which it is connected by a canal. Pop. 2,690.—There are several villages of France of this name.

BEAUVOIS, Ambrose Maria Francis Joseph Palisot de, bo'-vraw, a French naturalist and traveller, whose enterprising disposition led him to pursue his investigations over a great portion of W. Africa and America. During his wanderings in the latter country, he discovered, on the banks of the Ohio, the jaws and molar teeth of the great mastadon, and from the west of Virginia brought the tooth of a megalonyx. He published various works in connection with his travels and pursuits. B. at Arras, 1752; D. at Paris, 1820.

BEAUZE'E, Nicholas, bo'-zai, a French writer and member of the academy, who wrote the articles on grammar in the Encyclopédie; and though allied with sceptics, was himself a sincere Christian. Beauzée once asked Diderot how they came to elect him a member of the academy, as he was a Christian? "Because," answered the other, "we had not a grammarian among us, and we knew you to be an honest man." He wrote a "Universal Grammar; or, an Exposition of the Elements of Languages;" an "Exposition of the Historical Proofs of Religion," and other works. B. at Verdun, 1717; D. 1789.

BEAVER, be'-ver, a county of Pennsylvania, U.S., on the Ohio and Beaver rivers. Area, 650 square miles. Desc. Undulating and fertile, producing wool, wheat, oats, butter, and pork. Timber is plentiful, and in minerals it produces coal and limestone. The county being well supplied with water, has many saw-mills on its different streams. Manf. Woollens and cottons; it has some iron-foundries, tanneries, breweries, and paper-manufactories. Pop. 30,000.—It is intersected by the Ohio and Pennsylvania Railway.

Beaver Islands, a chain of islands in Lake Michigan, 40 miles from Mackinaw. Area of the largest estimated at 40 square miles.—This name is common to several villages and creeks in America.

Bebington, beb'-ing-ton, a parish of Cheshire, on the Mersey, 5 miles from Great Neston. Area, 5,250 acres. Pop. about 11,000.

Bebryx, beb'-briks, a king of part of Spain. His daughter Pyrene is supposed to have given her name to the Pyrenean mountains, which formed part of her father's dominions.

Becan, or Bekan, be'-kan, a parish of Ireland, in the county of Mayo, in the barony of Costello. Area, 20,303 acres. Pop. nearly 5,000.

Beccadelli, Antonio, bek'-ka-del'-e, called Antony of Palermo, and also Panormita, was professor of belles-lettres and rhetoric at Pavia, where he, in 1432, received the poetic laurel from the emperor Sigismund. Alphonso, king of Naples, created him a nobleman, and gave him several honourable employments. He wrote a book on the sayings and actions of Alphonso, king of Aragon; and a collection of his epistles and other pieces was printed at Venice, in 1553. B. at Palermo, in 1374; D. at Naples, 1471.—This man is said to have sold a farm in order to buy a copy of Livy.

Beccafumi, Dominico, bek-ka-foo'-me, originally a shepherd, became an historical painter, and studied the works of Raphael and Michael Angelo Buonarotti. B. at Sienna, 1484; D. at Genoa, 1549.—His Saint Sebastian is one of the finest pictures in the Borghese palace.

Beccaria, John Baptist, bek-ka'-re-a, a Piedmontese philosopher, who was professor at Palermo and at Rome, whence he removed to Turin. He was greatly respected by the king of Sardinia, to whose sons he was tutor, and made several discoveries in electricity, publishing some valuable works on that and other philosophical subjects. B. at Mondori, 1716; D. 1781.

Beccles, bek'-kels, a market-town and parish of Suffolk, on the river Waveney, 33 miles from Ipswich. It has an elegant Gothic church, a town-hall, and a jail. Pop. about 4,500.—In its neighbourhood there are 940 acres of land, called Beccles Fen, upon which every householder in the parish has a right to pasture cattle.

Becerra, Gaspard, bai-ser'-ra, a celebrated Spanish sculptor, the pupil of Michael Angelo. His principal work is a statue of the Virgin, executed by order of Queen Isabella de Valois. He also painted well in fresco. B. at Bajesa, 1520; D. at Madrid, 1570.

Becher, John Joachim, bek'-er, an eminent German chemist, who was appointed first physician to the elector of Mentz and Bavaria. He was of a roving disposition, residing for some time at Vienna, and assisting in a variety of manufactures; then at Haarlem, where he invented a machine for throwing silk. In 1680 he went to England, and examined the mines in Cornwall and Scotland, and, returning to Germany, he there died. B. at Spires, 1625; D. 1682.—His principal works are "Physica Subterranea," "Institutiones Chymicæ," and "Epistolæ Chymicæ."

Bechstein, John Matthew, bek'-stine, a celebrated German ornithologist, who, intended for the church, relinquished theology for natural history; and, in 1785, was made professor of the Botanic Institute of Salzmann, at Schnepfenthal. In 1791 he proposed to the duke of Gotha to create a forest-school; but, not meeting with success, he resolved to establish one, at his own cost, at Kemnote, near Walterhausen. He afterwards published a journal devoted to forest science, called "Diana;" and in 1800 offered his services to the duke of Saxe-Meiningen, who gave him the direction of a botanic academy, newly founded at Dreissgacker. B. at Walterhausen, 1757; D. 1822.—Bechstein's whole life was spent in enriching natural history with most important observations. He published many valuable works, of which may be named "German Natural History," "Forest Entomology," "Complete Course of Forest Science," "Natural History of Cage-birds," which has been translated into English, and has passed through several editions.

Becker, bek'-er, the name of several Germans known as writers, poets, musicians, painters, &c.; but whose biographies do not call for any special notice.

Becket, Thomas à, bek'-et, archbishop of Canterbury, distinguished in English history by the haughty demeanour which he displayed in his quarrels with his sovereign, King Henry II. B. in London, 1119; assassinated before the altar of the cathedral of Canterbury, 1171.—It was an expression of momentary passion which caused the death of Becket, for which King Henry was afterwards obliged, by the Pope, to do penance before his tomb, by having his royal back scourged by the monks, and passing one whole day and night fasting upon the bare stones. Two years after his death, Becket was canonized; and his pretended miracles were so numerous that his shrine became the richest in Europe.

Beckford, William, bek'-ford, the only legitimate son of Alderman Beckford, who, in the time of George III., was twice mayor of London. He is known by his great wealth, which enabled him to erect the magnificent structure called Fonthill; and by his being the author of "Vathek," and several other works. This work is an Arabian tale, which was composed at one sitting. "It took me," said he, "three days and two nights of hard labour. I never took off my clothes the whole time." It is a work of great genius, and, according to Byron, for correctness of costume, beauty of description, and power of imagination, the most eastern and sublime tale of all European imitations. B. 1770; D. near Bath, 1844.

Beckingham, Charles, bek'-ing-ham, an English dramatic writer, who wrote two plays of merit, viz., "Henry IV. of France," and "Scipio Africanus." He also wrote some poems. B. in London, 1699; D. 1730.

Beckley, bek'-le, the name of two English parishes, one in Bucks and the other in Sussex, neither of which has a population above 1,500.

Beckmann, John, bek'-man, professor of philosophy at the university of Göttingen, known to the world by his remarkable work entitled "Contributions to the History of Inventions." This work has, in several different editions, appeared in England in a translated form. B. at Hoga, Hanover, 1739; D. at Göttingen, 1811.

Becksherick, bek'-she-rik, two towns of Hungary, the Great and the Little, standing on the river Theiss, the former 45 miles from Temesvar, and the latter 10. Pop. of the former, 15,317.

Becquerel, Antoine Cæsar, bek'-e-rel, a distinguished French physicist, to whom we are indebted for several discoveries in electro-chemistry, especially the method of electric coloration on gold, silver, and copper, now generally adopted in the arts. B. at Châtillon-sur-Loing, 1788.

Beda, or Bede, beed, the Venerable, an ancient English writer, whose fame for learning was so great, that Pope Sergius wrote to his abbot to send him to Rome; but Bede declined the honour. He devoted the whole of his life to the writing his "Ecclesiastical History" and other works, and in instructing the young monks. B. at Wearmouth, Durham, 672; D. 735.—An English council directed his works to be publicly read in churches.

Bedale, bed'-dail, a market-town and parish in Yorkshire, on a rivulet which runs into the Swale near Gatesby, 32 miles from York. Area, 7,070 acres. Pop. 3,000.—The church here is a large structure, containing some ancient monuments, and erected in the time of Edward III. During an inroad of the Scots, the inhabitants converted its tower into a fortress; and, from its great strength, were enabled successfully to defend themselves.

Bé'darieux, bai-dar'-e-u(r), a town of France, in the department of the Herault, 18 miles from Beziers. Manf. Silks, hosiery, woollens, and paper. Pop. 10,000.

Bedford, bed'-ford, an inland county of England, bounded on the N. and N.W. by Northamptonshire, on the E. by the counties of Huntingdon, Cambridge, and Hertford, and on the W. by the counties of Buckingham and Northampton. Ext. 36¼ miles from N. to S., by 22½ from E. to W. Area, 295,582 acres. It is the smallest county in England, with the exception of Middlesex, Huntingdon, and Rutland. Desc. Generally level, or slightly undulating, except on the S., where it is crossed by the Chiltern Hills. The western and eastern parts of the county are, in many parts, sandy; the centre is flat, and three fourths of the whole is judged to be alluvial soil. Limestone, coarse marble, and imperfect coal are obtained here; and a variety of petrifactions, particularly the Cornu Ammonis, and different shells, as also petrified wood. Rivers. The Ouse, Ivel, Lea, and Ouzel. Manf. Confined almost exclusively to the plaiting of straw and making thread lace, in which nearly three fourths of the female population are employed. Towns. Bedford, Leighton Buzzard, Dunstable, and Luton. Pop. 124,478.

BEDFORD, John, duke of, was the third son of Henry IV. of England, and one of the greatest commanders ever opposed to the French. By the will of Henry V. he became regent of France, and well sustained the glory of his country in the whole of the struggle which raged in that kingdom throughout his career. He laid siege to Orleans, which, on account of the supernatural awe which his troops entertained for Joan of Arc, he was compelled to raise; but was subsequently one of the principal instruments in bringing that extraordinary maid to the stake. D. at Rouen, 1435.

BEDFORD, NEW, a port of entry in the state of Massachusetts, United States, 55 miles from Boston. Its inhabitants are principally engaged in whale-fishing, ship-building, and candle-making. Pop. 16,500. —This town communicates with Boston by railway, and has a harbour which connects it with Fairhaven.

BEDFORD, the name of three counties in the United States. 1. In Pennsylvania, bordering on Maryland. Area, 1,000 square miles. Desc. Mountainous, intersected by fertile valleys, producing wheat, oats, and butter. Pop. 24,000—2. Another in the S. part of Virginia. Area, 504 square miles. Desc. Fertile, yielding abundance of Indian corn, wheat, oats, and tobacco. Pop. 25,000, of whom nearly one half are slaves.—3. In Tennessee. Area, 550 square miles. Desc. Fertile, producing corn, tobacco, and wool, and rearing a great number of cattle and swine. Pop. 22,000, of whom one fourth are slaves.

BEDFORD LEVEL, a tract of land in the counties of Norfolk, Suffolk, Huntingdon, Northampton, Lincoln, Cambridge, and the isle of Ely, consisting of about 400,000 acres, a large portion of it being marshy ground. At various periods, this immense tract was tried to be reclaimed; but it was not accomplished till the 17th century, when the duke of Bedford effected what had baffled all previous attempts. It produces fine crops of grain, flax, and cole-seed.

BEDLINGTON, bed'-ling-ton, a parish in the county of Northumberland, 5 miles from Morpeth. Area, 8,910 acres. Pop. 5,102, principally employed in iron-works.

BEDLOE, William, Captain, bed'-lo, an infamous informer, who gave evidence respecting the murder of Sir Edmundbury Godfrey, and for his perjury received a reward of £500. D. 1680.

BEDNORE, or NUGGUR, bed'-nor, a town of Hindostan, the capital of a district of the same name, 150 miles from Seringapatam. It is said that this was once a magnificent city, containing 100,000 inhabitants, fortified by natural and artificial defences; but it has been greatly reduced in the course of its successive captures, by Hyder Ali (who, in 1763, pillaged it of property value £12,000,000), Tippoo, and the British. Here, in 1783, General Matthews, being attacked by a vastly superior force under Tippoo Sahib, was obliged to surrender, and he and the principal officers were put to death, the remainder of his force being closely imprisoned.

BEDOUINS, bed'-oo-ins, a tribe of wandering Arabs, whose home is in the desert.

BEDOUS, bed'-oo, a village and parish of France, in the department of the Basses-Pyrénées, 12 miles from Oleron. Pop. about 1,400.—This is the last post-house in France on the route to Spain.

BEDWORTH, bed'-worth, a parish of Warwickshire, 4 miles from Nuneaton. Area, 2,240 acres. Pop. about 5,000, many of whom are engaged in silk-mills.

BEECHER, Lyman, D.D., be'-cher, studied divinity under President Dwight, in Yale College, United States, and in 1798 became pastor of a church at East Hampton. He subsequently became pastor of a church in Boston, and took an active part in the opposition to Dr. Channing and others, in the controversy which occurred among members of a number of the churches of New England, in 1826. In 1832 he became president of the Lane Theological Seminary at Cincinnati; but since 1842 he has resided principally at Boston. B. at N. Haven, Connecticut, 1775.—He is the author of many theological works, sermons, and treatises on temperance; and the father of Mrs. Beecher Stowe.

BEECHER, Henry Ward, son of the above, studied theology under his father at Lane Seminary, and in 1847 became pastor of the Plymouth church, in Brooklyn, New York. As a preacher, he is said to have the largest uniform congregation in the United States. B. at Lichfield, Connecticut, 1813.—He is the author of several works, which have for their object the promotion of the religious welfare of the community.

BEECHER, Harriet. (See STOWE.)

BEECHY, Sir William, R.A., be'-che, a celebrated English portrait-painter, who, although originally articled to a conveyancer, pursued his art with such ardour, that he became portrait-painter to the queen of George III. He painted the portraits of most of the celebrated characters of his time, became a Royal Academician, and received the honour of knighthood. B. at Burford, in Oxfordshire, 1753; D. at Hampstead, 1839.

BEECHY, Frederic William, son of the above, early entered the navy, and in 1818 accompanied Franklin as a lieutenant in his voyage in search of the north-west passage. Being possessed of considerable artistic talent, he made drawings of many of the natural objects which came under his observation in this expedition, and for which he was rewarded by a parliamentary grant of £200. In 1843 he published a narrative of the voyage. In the following year he accompanied Sir Edward Parry to the polar seas, and in 1821 was commissioned, with his brother, to examine the coasts of N. Africa to the east of Tripoli. On his return from this service, he received the command of the Blossom, with orders to penetrate the Polar Sea by the Pacific Ocean and Behring's Strait, while Franklin was to make the attempt over-land by North America. This expedition occupied two years and a half. In 1827 he received the rank of post-captain, and being afterwards unemployed for some time, he devoted himself to writing accounts of the various expeditions in which he had been engaged. Between 1829 and 1839, he was employed in surveying the coasts of S. America and Ireland, and in 1851 was created rear-admiral of the blue. B. in London, 1796.

BEEK, David, beke, a Dutch artist, a pupil of Vandyke. He was much esteemed by Charles I. of England, and subsequently was appointed portrait-painter to Queen Christina of Sweden, who commissioned him to paint the sovereigns of Europe for her gallery. B. at Delft, 1621; D. at the Hague, 1656.

BEEK, the name of several villages in Belgian Limburg.

BEELZEBUB. (See BAALZEBUB.)

BEER, be'-er, 'a well,' a place near Shechem.

BEER-LAHAI-ROI, be'-er-la-hai-roi, 'the well of the visions of life,' a place in the desert of Shur.

BEEROTH, be-e-roth, 'the wells,' or 'illuminations,' a city of the Gibeonites.

BEERSHEBA, be'-er-she'-ba, 'the well of an oath,' or 'the well of seven,' a city in the south of Canaan.

BEES, ST., bees, a parish of Cumberland, 3 miles from Egremont, on the coast. Area, 69,260 acres. It embraces the town and port of Whitehaven, and several other chapelries and townships. Pop. 23,496.

BEES HEAD, ST., a cape in the Irish Sea, forming the western extremity of the county of Cumberland. Lat. of lighthouse, 54° 30′ 50″ N. Lon. 3° 38′ 7″ W.

BEESKOW, bees'-kow, a town of Prussia, in the province of Brandenburg, 18 miles from Frankfort. Manf. Chiefly woollen and linen fabrics. Pop. upwards of 4,000.

BEESTON, the name of several small English parishes, none of whose populations exceed 3,000.

BEETHOVEN, Ludwig von, bait'-ho-ven, a celebrated musical composer, and the pupil of Haydn. In his thirteenth year he was capable of playing extemporaneous fantasias, which were the admiration of the most accomplished musicians of his time. About 1791 he composed his opera of "Leonore," better known in England by the name of "Fidelio," which, however, had not much success. He continued, however, to compose in every style of music, bequeathing to posterity a noble monument of his industry and genius in his many brilliant compositions. B. at Bonn, 1770; D. at Vienna, 1827.—In 1845 a statue was erected to his memory in his native town, in the presence of the queen of England.

BEETON, Samuel Orchart, be'-ton, the originator and one of the editors of this work, the "DICTIONARY OF UNIVERSAL INFORMATION." In 1852 he commenced business as a publisher, and was the first to introduce to this country Mrs. Beecher Stowe's celebrated novel of "Uncle Tom's Cabin." The success of this work was so satisfactory, that he undertook a voyage across the Atlantic to present the authoress with £500, which he increased on his return by a further sum of £250. He has, from that time, continued to devote himself to the dissemination of cheap and wholesome literature amongst the people; and his "Boy's Own Magazine" and "The Englishwoman's Domestic Magazine" are amongst the most popular and successful periodicals now in the hands of the public. B. in London, 1831.

BEFORT, or BELFORT, bel'-for, a town of France, in the department of the Upper Rhine, on the small river Savoureuse, 36 miles from Strasburg. It carries on an extensive trade with Switzerland and Germany. Pop. about 8,000. It is a strong place, and was fortified by Vauban.

BEGEYN, Abraham, be'-gine, a Dutch painter, who executed some fine landscapes for the royal palaces, and several good pictures, which are at the Hague. B. in Holland, 1650.

BE'GON, Michael, bai'-gawng, a magistrate of the French West-India islands, who collected a noble library, and a cabinet of antiques and curiosities. He also caused to be engraved portraits of the illustrious men of the 17th century, and collected memoirs of their lives. B. at Blois, 1638; D. at Rochefort, 1710. In his honour the order of plants Begonia was so named.

BEG-SHEHR, beg-sher, a river, lake, and town of Asia Minor, in the province of Karamania. The lake is about 20 miles long, and from 5 to 10 broad, containing many small islands. It is supposed to be the ancient Caralites.

BEHBEHAN, be'-be-han, a town of Persia, in the province of Fars. It stands in a fertile plain, at the distance of 130 miles from Shiraz. Pop. about 4,000.

BEHEM, Martin, be-hem, a German geographer and navigator, who is said to have discovered the isle of Fayal and the Brazils, and to have sailed as far as the Straits of Magellan; but this is doubtful. John II. of Portugal created him a chevalier. There is, at Nuremberg, a very curious globe made by him, on which are traced his discoveries. B. at Nuremberg, 1436; D. at Lisbon, 1506.

BEHEMOTH, be'-he-moth, a monstrous animal, or the hippopotamus of the Nile.

BEHN, Aphra, ben, an English authoress, who at Surinam became acquainted with Prince Oroonoko, whose story she afterwards published. In 1666 she was at Antwerp, where, it is said, she was employed as a spy by the English government, and discovered the design of the Dutch to ascend the Thames and burn the English fleet. This intelligence she communicated to the English court; but it was treated with contempt. She subsequently returned to London, and devoted herself to pleasure and the muses, writing several plays, histories, and novels, which evince a lively but licentious imagination. B. at Canterbury; D. in London, 1689.

BEHRING, Vitus, beer'-ing, a Dane, who, entering the naval service of Russia, was subsequently, by the empress Catharine, promoted to the command of various expeditions fitted out for the purposes of geographical discovery. Behring's Strait derives its name from him, although it is believed that he never reached it; and he was the founder of a settlement at Petropaulovski. Shipwrecked on Behring's Island, where he died, 1741.

BEHRING'S ISLAND, one of the Aleutian islands, in the N. Pacific. Area, 30 square miles. Pop. 2,500. Lat 55° 22′ N. Lon. 166° E.—Here, in 1741, Behring was shipwrecked and died.

BEHRING'S STRAIT, discovered in 1728 by Behring, and first explored by Cook in 1788. (See AMERICA and ASIA.)

BEICH, Joachim Francis, bike, a German painter and engraver, who excelled in painting landscapes and battles. B. at Ravensburg, 1665; D. at Munich, 1748.

BEILAN, bi'-lan, a town and pass of Syria, on the E. side of the Gulf of Iscanderoon. Pop. 5,000.—This pass is considered identical with the Amanian Gates of antiquity, as it is the only generally practicable route from Syria into Cilicia. In 1832 the Turks were here defeated by the Egyptians.

BEINASCHI, or BENASCHI, John Baptiste, be-nas'-ke, an historical painter, was a native of Piedmont, whose principal works are cupolas, ceilings, &c.; and are to be seen in the churches of Naples. B. at Turin, 1636; D. about 1690.—He was so little able to bear criticism, that he would assault, sword in hand, those who discovered faults in his works.

BEIRA, bai-e'-ra, a province of Portugal, bounded on the N. by the province of Tras-los-Montes and Entre Duero e Minho, on the E. by Spain, on the S. by Portuguese Estremadura and Alentejo, and on the W. by the Atlantic. Area, 5,817 square miles. Desc. Mountainous in general; and, where fertility exists, wheat, barley, and rye are extensively cultivated. Its honey is in great repute, and the valley of Mandego produces fine oranges, lemons, figs, and other fruits. The inhabitants, however, are mostly employed in agriculture, and immense numbers of cattle, sheep, and swine are pastured. Rivers. The Douro in the N., Tagus in the S., the Aguada in the N.E., and the Mandego in the centre. Towns. Coimbra, Ovar, Oveiro, and Lamego. Pop. about 650,000. Lat. between 39° 30′ and 41° 30′ N. Lon. between 6° 40′ and 9° 50′ W.

BEIT-EL-FAKIH, bite-el-fa-ke, 'house of a saint,' a maritime town of Arabia, 100 miles from Sana, on the Red Sea. Pop. about 8,000.—This place is the centre of the Yemen trade in coffee.

BEITHAR, or ABEN BEITHAR, Abdallah-ben-Ahmed, bi'-thar, an African botanist and physician, who wrote a work entitled "Recueil de Médicaments Simples," treating of all substances, animal, vegetable, and mineral, used in pharmacy. B. at Benana, near Malaga, at the end of the 12th century; D. at Damas, 1248.

BEJA, baizh-ah, a town of Portugal, surrounded by walls flanked by forty towers. It stands on a hill 36 miles from Evora, and has a castle, a cathedral, and a Latin school. Pop. 5,500.

BEJAPOOR, or VISIAPOUR, bej'-a-poor, an old province of Hindostan, bounded on the N. and E. by the provinces of Aurungabad and Beeder, on the S. by North Canara and the river Toombudra, and on the W. by the sea. It is now subdivided among the dominions of the Nizam, the state of Sattara, and the British.

BEJAPOOR, or VISIAPOUR, the capital of the above province, is situate in a fertile plain, 130 miles from Sattara. It has a citadel of great strength, besides several mosques and mausoleums, adorned with all the embellishments of Eastern architecture. Lat. 16° 48′ N. Lon. 75° 46 E.—Bejapoor was besieged by Aurungzebe, and surrendered by capitulation in 1689.

BEKKER, Balthasar, bek'-er, a Dutch divine, who published a book entitled, "The World Bewitched," in which he opposed the popular superstitions respecting witchcraft, incantations, &c.; and which was a great thing to attempt in those days. This work has been translated into French, English, and Italian. B. in Friesland, 1634; D. 1698.

BEL, Matthias, bel, an Hungarian divine, the author of "Apparatus ad Historiam Hungariæ, et Notitiæ Hungariæ novæ," for writing which the emperor Charles VI. appointed him imperial historiographer. B. at Orsova, 1684; D. 1749.—His son Charles Andrew was librarian and professor of philosophy and poetry to the Leipsic university.

BEL, 'old,' or 'lord,' a Chaldean idol.

BELBEYS, bel'-bez, a town of Lower Egypt, on the E. arm of the Nile, 28 miles from Cairo. Pop. 5,000.—It is a station on the route from Egypt to Syria.

BELEM, be'-lem, a town of Portugal, 2 miles from Lisbon. Pop. 5,000. Lat. 38° 40′ N. Lon. 9° 14′ W. —In 1807 this town was taken by the French, and in 1833 by the troops of Don Pedro.

BELESIS, bel'-e-sis, a Chaldean, who raised Arsaces to the throne of Media, for which he was rewarded with the government of Babylon, 770 B.C. When Sardanapalus, with his gold and silver, was burnt in his palace, Belesis was permitted to take away the ashes, and extracted immense treasures. Lived eight centuries B.C.

BELFAST, bel'-fast, a seaport-town of Ireland, in the county of Antrim, situate at the efflux of the river Lagan, at the head of Belfast Lough, 86 miles from Dublin. This town is well built, chiefly of brick, and the streets are broad, straight, well paved, and lighted. Its public edifices are numerous; amongst which may be noticed the Linen-hall and the Exchange, over which is a good assembly-room; and there are barracks for 800 men. Belfast is the principal depôt of the Irish linen trade, as well as the chief place of the cotton manufactures of Ireland. Its principal exports are linen, butter, beef, pork, and oatmeal; and a considerable trade is carried on with the West Indies, America, and other parts of the world. Convenient docks have been constructed. Belfast is a royal borough, and was incorporated by a charter of James II. Pop. 100,300. Lat. 54° 36′ 8″ N. Lon. 5° 57′ 53″ W.—This town is the head-quarters of the northern military district of Ireland, and the head of the custom, excise, and constabulary districts of Belfast. It is connected by railway with Armagh, Ballymena, Carrickfergus, and several other places.

BELGÆ, bel'-je, a people of ancient Gaul, who inhabited the country extending from the Rhenus or Rhine, to the Liger or Loire. They seem to have been originally Scythians or Goths, who, after defeating the Cimbri, took possession of the north-west part of Gaul. According to the testimony of Cæsar, they were the most warlike of the Gauls. Some of the Britons were also called Belgæ, as being no doubt descended from a Belgic colony.

BELGAUM, bel-gawm, a town of British India, in the presidency of Bombay, 41 miles from Darwar. It is situate in a district comprising an area of upwards of 5,000 square miles. Pop. 860,000.—In 1818 it was taken by the British, and is now the head-quarters of the S. division of the Bombay army.

BELGIUM, bel'-je-um, a kingdom of central Europe, bounded on the N. by the Netherlands, E. by the duchy of Luxembourg, Rhenish Prussia, and Dutch Limbourg, S. and S.W. by France, and W. by the North Sea. Area, 11,313 square miles. Political Divisions. These consist of nine provinces,—Antwerp, West Flanders, East Flanders, Hainault, Liège, Brabant, Limbourg, Luxembourg, and Namur. Desc. This country may be regarded as an inclined plane, interspersed with hills in the S.E., more or less gradually falling away in slopes, until they finally sink into plains, only a few feet above the level of the sea. It has, properly speaking, no mountains, and what hills it has, are connected with the Ardennes and the Vosges, which, stretching along the S. of Namur, occupy the greater part of Luxembourg, and attain their culminating point in the neighbourhood of Spa, where they rise to 2,000 feet above the level of the sea. Rivers. The Maas and the Scheldt, with the tributaries of the former, consisting of the Ourthe, Sambre, and Lesse. Forests. Extensive, covering one fifth of the entire country, and containing a great deal of oak, from which charcoal is made for the iron-foundries, and the bark is used for tanning. Wild Animals. The bear, the wild boar, and the wolf. Domestic Animals. The same as those of Britain, but, in general, of an inferior quality. Flanders, however, is noted for the largeness of its breed of horses. Climate. Wet and foggy, except in the S.E. Soil. Extremely fertile; but there are some extensive swamps and heaths. W. Flanders was once little better than a desert of sand, but the application of good manures has brought it into its high state of cultivation. The Campine, lying to the N.E. of Antwerp, is the largest waste in the country. Pro. There is no country in the world in which agriculture has been brought to a higher state of perfection. The chief objects of culture are flax, hemp, rape-seed, clover, hops, and potatoes, with the usual cerealia. Beet-root, chiccory, and tobacco are raised in the central provinces, and England is indebted to Belgium for the cabbage, lettuce, clover, the gooseberry-tree, the carnation, the tulip, and the wall-flower. It is estimated that little more than one eighth of the country is uncultivated; that one eighth of it lies in meadow, one fifth in forest, and one half is arable. Minerals. Considerable: coal, iron, lead, copper, zinc, marble, and building stones. Belgium, in coal, is the richest of any country known except England. Towns. Antwerp, Bruges, Ghent, Mons, Liège, Brussels, Hasselt, Arlon, and Namur. Manf. Important; carpets, woollen cloths, linens, lace, cotton, hardware, and cutlery; embroidery, ribbons, hats, hosiery, leather, oil-cloth, paper, glass, porcelain, nail-making, bronze-wares, chemicals, and scientific and musical instruments. Exp. Coal, corn, flax, hemp, oil, laces, woollen, linen, and cotton goods; arms and hardware. Imp. Colonial produce, and the raw material for woollen and cotton manufactures. Army, 100,000 men, and her navy is inconsiderable. Rel. Roman Catholic; but all are paid by the state. Gov. Limited monarchy. Pop. about 4,500,000. Lat. between 49° 30′ and 51° 30′ N. Lon. between 2° 33′ and 6° 5′ E. Belgium takes its name from the old inhabitants, the Belgæ, and at different times, from the 15th century, formed part of the dominions of Austria and Spain. In 1795 it was conquered by the French, and at the peace of 1814 was joined to Holland, when they together formed the kingdom of the Netherlands. It continued annexed to Holland till the autumn of 1830, when, after a revolution of a few days, it gained its independence. Belgium has been called the battle-field of Europe, from its having so frequently been the scene of the conflict of nations.—Its railway system is the most complete in Europe.

BELGRADE, bel'-graid, a town and fortress of Servia, near the conflux of the Save and Danube, 44 miles from Peterwardin. It consists of four parts. 1st. The fortress, standing on a steep eminence in the centre of the whole, inclosed with high walls, and commanding the Danube. 2nd. The water-side division. 3rd. The Rascian town, in the direction of the Save. 4th. The Palanka, which encircles the fortress on the south and east. The number of mosques in the town is considerable. Manf. Arms, cutlery, saddlery, carpets, and silk goods. Pop. 30,000. Lat. 44° 47′ 57″ N. Lon. 20° 28′ 14″ E.—This important fortress was taken by Solyman, the Turkish emperor, in 1522; retaken by the Imperialists, under the elector of Bavaria, in 1688; but again lost in 1690. It surrendered to Prince Eugene in 1717; but was taken by the Turks in 1739. The Imperialists retook it in the year 1789, but were forced to restore it at the peace of 1791. In the year 1806 it was taken by the Servian insurgents; and in 1813 was greatly injured by the Servian insurrection. Since that period the town has been considerably improved.

BELGRADO, James, bel-gra'-do, an Italian Jesuit, who was an eminent mathematician, antiquary, and poet. B. at Udina, 1704; D. 1789.—His works are principally in Latin, and in his eighty-first year he published a book filled with new views in Egyptian architecture.

BELIAL, be-le'-yal, 'wicked,' 'rebellious,' or 'worthless,' as a licentious person. The Jews applied this title to the devil.

BELIDOR, Bernard Forest de, bel'-e-dor, a continental engineer, professor of the French school of artillery at La Fère, well known by his "Dictionnaire Portatif de l'Ingénieur," and his "Course of Mathematics, Hydraulics, and Architecture," for engineer and artillery officers. This work rapidly passed through many editions, and Belidor's fame brought around him military men of all countries and high rank to gain instruction. B. in Catalonia, 1693; D. at Paris, 1761. —He made numerous experiments on, and entered deeply into, the powers of gunpowder; and discovered that it was erroneous to suppose that the greater the charge the further the bullet would be carried; and he proved that nearly one half of the powder used at that time was wasted.

BELING, Richard, be'-ling, an Irish writer, who was concerned in the rebellion of 1641, and was appointed ambassador from the council of Kilkenny to the pope in 1645. On his return, he went over to the marquis of Ormond, through whose intercession at the Restoration he recovered his estates. B. at Belingstown, Dublin, 1613; D. at Dublin, 1677.

BELISARIUS, bel'-i-sair'-re-us, a Roman general in the emperor Justinian's reign, who ended the war in which that prince was engaged with the Persians. In 533 he took Carthage, and made prisoner Gilimer, king of the Vandals. He was next sent against the Goths, in Italy; and, arriving on the coasts of Sicily, he took Catania, Syracuse, Palermo, and other places. He then proceeded to Naples, which he took, and marched to Rome. After this he conquered Vitiges, king of the Goths, and sent him to Constantinople, at the same time refusing the crown, which was offered him. For these great exploits he was selected sole consul in 535, and was regarded as the saviour of the empire; and medals are still extant which bear this inscription, Belisarius gloria Romanorum. He was soon obliged to go into the East against Chosroes I., king of Persia; and, having succeeded, he returned to Italy, whence he expelled the Huns in 558. In 563 Belisarius was accused of participating in a conspiracy against the emperor, who imprisoned him, and confiscated his estates, to which, however, he was shortly restored. The tradition that he was deprived of his eyes is not authentic. B. at Germania, in Illyria, about 505; D. 565.—Belisarius married, 527, Antonina, an actress of abandoned character, who exercised great influence over him, and doubtless was the cause of the worst passages of his life.

BELKNAP, bel'-nap, a county of the United States, in New Hampshire. Area, 387 square miles. Desc. Fertile and productive in the usual cerealia, with numerous saw-mills upon its streams and rivers, and several iron-foundries. Pop. about 20,000.

BELL, Henry, bel, the first person who applied steam successfully to the purposes of navigation in Europe. In 1812 he launched a small steam-vessel, which he called the Comet, on the river Clyde, to be propelled with a steam-engine of his own construction; and so successful was his experiment, that it encouraged others of greater means to undertake similar enterprises. B. in Linlithgowshire, Scotland, 1767; D. at Hellensburgh, on the Clyde, 1830.

BELL, John, an eminent modern sculptor, who has executed many beautiful and graceful figures; among which may be noticed his "Una and the Lion," his "Babes in the Wood," his "Dorothea," and his "Child's own Attitude," which is now the property of the queen. He has also sculptured some of the historical statues for the new Houses of Parliament; such as Falkland, Shakspere, and some others. B. in Norfolk, 1800.

BELL, Sir Charles, one of the most distinguished anatomists of modern times, and the discoverer of the arrangement and operation of the nervous system, which places him on an equality with Harvey, the discoverer of the circulation of the blood. B. at Edinburgh, 1774; D. at Hallow Park, the seat of Mrs. Holland, on his way to London, 1842.

BELL, Thomas, an eminent naturalist, who, conjointly with Kirby and McLeay, originated the Zoological Club of the Linnæan Society. B. at Poole, 1792.

BELLARMIN, Robert, bel'-ar-meen, a Roman cardinal, who, at the age of eighteen, entered in the society of Jesuits. In 1569 he was made a cardinal, and in 1601 archbishop of Capua. B. in Tuscany, 1542; D. at Rome, 1621.—His writings are numerous, but chiefly polemical, and have acquired a great reputation. He was one of the most virtuous members of the conclave, and was accustomed to say that "one ounce of peace was worth a pound of victory."

BELLARY, bel'-a-re, one of the Balaghaut ceded districts of British India, in the presidency of Madras, and occupying the W. section of Ballaghaut. Area, 13,056 square miles. Pop. 200,000.—The capital of this district is of the same name, and has military barracks and cantonments.

BELLAY, Joachim du, bel'-ai, a French poet, surnamed the French Ovid, was celebrated for his odes, both in French and Latin. B. at Liré, near Angers, 1524; D. at Paris, 1560.—Forty-seven sonnets of his on the "Antiquities of Rome" were, in 1611, translated into English verse.

BELLE, Alexis Simon, bel, a French portrait-painter, who was a disciple of Francis de Troy. B. 1674; D. 1734.

BELLE ALLIANCE, LA, la bel al-le'-anz, a hamlet of Belgium, 13 miles from Brussels, and memorable for being the nucleus of the operations in the field of Waterloo, and the locality where Napoleon I. commanded in this conflict, designated by the Prussians the battle of La Belle Alliance, fought on the 18th June, 1815. After the battle had been won, it was here that Wellington and Blucher met.

BELLEAU, Remi, bel'-lo, a French poet, one of the seven poets known as la Pléiade Française, and whose pastorals are held in great esteem. B. at Nogent le Rotrou, 1528; D. at Paris, 1577.

BELLEISLE, bel'-ile, an island of British North America, in the Atlantic Ocean, lying between Labrador and the N. extremity of Newfoundland. Area, 21 miles in circumference; and said to yield wheat, potatoes, and vegetables. Lat. 52° 1′ 16″ N. Lon. 55° 19′ 4″ W.

BELLEISLE-EN-MER, bel-eel-ŭ-mair, an island of France, in the Atlantic, 8 miles from Quiberon Point. Ext. 11 miles long, by 6 broad. It is noted for the excellence of its draught-horses and its wheat. Pop. about 10,000.—In 1761 it was captured by the British, and held by them till 1763. In 1765 an attempt was made to retake it, but it failed.

BELLEROPHON, bel-ler'-o-fon, son of Glaucus, king of Ephyre, by Eurymede, was at first called Hipponous. The murder of his brother, whom some call Alcimenus and Beller, procured him the name of Bellerophon, or murderer of Beller. After this murder, Bellerophon fled to the court of Prœtus, king of Argos, whose wife became enamoured of him; and because he slighted her passion, she sought to destroy him. He, however, escaped her machinations, was introduced to the court of Jobates, king of Lycia, and after a number of adventures, in one of which he conquered the Chimæra, he married the daughter of Jobates and succeeded to the throne of Lycia.

BELLIN, James Nicholas, bel'-lă, a French marine geographer, who was member of the Royal Society of London, and published the "Hydrographic Françoise," containing maps of all the coast-board in the world then known, and several other valuable geographical works. B. at Paris, 1703; D. at Versailles, 1772.

BELLIN, or BELLINI, Gentile, bel-le'-ne, a Venetian painter, who was employed by the republic in painting the pictures for the council-hall. It is said that, while at Constantinople, he was engaged by Mahomet II. to paint the Beheading of St. John the Baptist. The sultan, who was a connoisseur, pronounced the work inaccurate, and ordered a slave to be beheaded in his presence, to prove that the skin of the Baptist's neck was faultily painted. This sight so shocked the painter, that he took the earliest opportunity to return to his own country. B. 1421; D. 1501.

BELLINI, John, brother of the above, who, with his brother, is generally held to be the founder of the Venetian school of painting, which afterwards produced Giorgione and Titian. B. 1426; D. 1516.—In 1819, at Lebrun's sale, a half-length figure of the "Virgin holding the Infant Jesus" was sold for £4,000, and the "Virgin at her Throne," once in the Louvre, but restored to the church of St. Zacharias, in Naples, is estimated to be worth £8,000. James, the father of these two painters, was likewise an artist of merit.

BELLINI, Vincenzo, bel-le'-ne, a distinguished musical composer, who in his youth discovered so much genius as to induce the inhabitants of the town of Cattania to send him to Naples to study at their expense. In his twenty-third year, he produced his first opera, which was performed within the walls of the Conservatorio at Naples, and contained sufficient indications of the originality of his genius, to raise high expectations in those who heard it. In 1831 he produced, at Milan, "La Sonnambula" and "Norma," both of which were received with the utmost enthusiasm. In 1833 appeared his "Beatrice di Tenda," which was heavy; and, in 1834, came forth his "I Puritani," which is one of his most brilliant efforts, and shortly after this he was taken ill, and ended his short career in a few days.

B. at Catania, in Sicily, 1802; D. at Pateaux, near Paris, 1835, aged 32.

BELLONA, bel-lo'-na, the goddess of war, and, according to some, the sister of Mars, but according to others, his daughter or his wife. The Romans paid great adoration to her. In her temple at Rome, the senators gave audience to foreign ambassadors, and to generals returned from war. At the gate was a small column, called "the column of war," against which they threw a spear whenever war was declared against an enemy.

BELLOTTI, Peter, bel-lot'-e, an Italian artist, who painted portraits and caricatures with astonishing exactness and delicacy. B. at Volgano, 1625; D. at Gurignano, 1700.

BELLOY, Peter Lawrence Buyrette de, bel-loi', a French dramatist, who was for some time an advocate, but quitted the law for the stage, and went to Russia, where he acted as a comedian with considerable success. Returning to France in 1758, he brought out his tragedy of "Titus," which was followed by the "Siege of Calais," and other pieces. B. at St. Flour, 1727; D. 1775.—The inhabitants of Calais were so delighted with the tragedy of the "Siege of Calais," that they sent him the freedom of their town in a gold box.

BELL ROCK, bel' rok, a reef of rocks in the German Ocean, 12 miles S. of Arbroath. It has a lighthouse 90 feet high and 42 in diameter at its base. Lat. 56° 26′ 3″ N. Lon. 2° 23′ 6″ W.

BELLUCCI, Anthony, bel-loot-se, an Italian painter of the modern Venetian school, whose chef-d'œuvre is the ceiling at Buckingham House. B. at Pieve di Soligo, 1654; D. 1726.

BELLUNO, bel-loo'-no, a city of Italy, on the Paive, 50 miles from Venice. It is surrounded by walls, and has manufactures of silk, hats, leather, and earthenware. Pop. 10,000.—It gave the title of duke of Belluno to Marshal Victor, one of the generals of Napoleon I.

BELMONT, bel-mont', a county of the United States, in Ohio. Area, 520 square miles. Desc. Fertile, and producing wheat, oats, tobacco, and rearing cattle and horses. Pop. 35,000.—The Ohio Central Railway passes through this county.

BELON, Peter, bel'-awng, a distinguished French naturalist, who travelled into Palestine, Greece, and Arabia, and formed during his travels a valuable collection, and enriched natural history with a number of entirely original observations, and also examined the ruins and the antiquities of the countries he visited. The tribe of plants known as Bellonia are named after him. He was assassinated in the Bois de Boulogne. B. 1517; D. 1564.—The result of his travels he communicated to the world in his "Observations of many Singular and Memorable things found in Greece, Asia, Judæa, Egypt, Arabia, &c.," which has been translated into Latin and German.

BELOOCHISTAN, bel'-oo-kis-tan', a country of Asia, situate on the north-west coast of the Indian peninsula, and extending from Seistan and the country of the Afghans on the N., to the Indian Ocean; and from the provinces of Laristan and Kerman on the W., to that of Scinde on the E. Area, estimated at 160,000 square miles. Divisions. These comprise six provinces, —Jhalawan, Sarawan, Kelat, Mekran, Lus, and Cutch Gundava. Desc. Very diversified; the climate in the higher parts being extremely cold, while the heat, during the summer season, is scarcely supportable in the plains. There is a general scarcity of water. A large proportion of the country is mountainous, the eastern part especially being so. Pro. All sorts of grain and vegetables, and the finest fruits flourish abundantly. In the northern districts, madder, cotton, and indigo are produced, the latter of excellent quality. Asafœtida, which is a favourite kind of food among the Beloochees, grows among the hills. Trees of large size are seen, although Beloochistan does not seem generally to be a woody country. Minerals. Gold, silver, copper, lead, iron, limestone, marble, rocksalt, sulphur, and saltpetre. Zoology. The domestic animals are horses, mules, asses, camels, dromedaries, buffaloes, black-cattle, sheep, goats, dogs, and cats, besides fowls and pigeons. There are neither geese, turkeys, nor ducks. The wild animals are lions, tigers, leopards, hyænas, wolves, jackals, tiger-cats, wild dogs, foxes, hares, mongooses, mountain goats, antelopes, elks, red and moose deer, and wild asses, which inhabit both the mountains and the plains. Of birds there are almost every species to be met with either in Europe or India. Inhabitants. This country is occupied principally by two great classes of inhabitants, namely, the Beloochees and Brahooes, differing from each other in their outward appearance, as well as in their manners. These are divided into an infinite variety of tribes, which it is impossible to enumerate. In their domestic life, the Beloochees are almost all pastoral; they usually reside in ghedons or tents, made of black felt or coarse blankets, stretched over a frame of wicker-work. An assemblage of these constitutes a village, and the people a kheil or society. Though naturally indolent, they are fearless of danger, and in battle fight with great gallantry. They are a race of lawless robbers, however, and undertake distant excursions in quest of booty, or for the purpose of carrying off the inhabitants of other countries for slaves. Rel. All the Beloochees are Mahometans of the Soonee faith, and entertain a great antipathy to other sects. Polygamy is common among them. Pop. estimated at about 500,000. Lat. between 24° 50′ and 30° 20′ N. Lon. between 57° 40′ and 69° 18′ E.—The inhabitants of this country are supposed to be under the government of the khan of Kelat, which is the capital of the country, and which was taken by the British in 1839. In the following year it changed hands, but in 1841 it was again captured and held for some time.

BELPER, bel'-per, a market-town of Derbyshire, 8 miles from Derby. Manf. Cottons, silks, earthenware, and nails. Pop. about 10,000.—It is a station on the North Midland Railway.

BELSHAZZAR, bel-shăz'-ar, 'master of the treasure,' a profligate king of Babylon, son of Evilmerodach, and grandson of Nebuchadnezzar.

BELSUNCE, Henry Francis Xavier de, bel-soonz, a French prelate, who was made bishop of Marseilles in 1709. He showed his zeal and charity during the plague in 1720, and his devotion will always be worthy of admiration. He was offered, in 1723, the bishopric of Laon, but refused it, saying, "he would not leave a church to which he had devoted his life;" and he also refused the bishopric of Bordeaux, 1729. B. in Perigord, 1671; D. at Marseilles, 1755.—Belsunce is mentioned by Pope in his "Essay on Man."

BELT, GREAT and LITTLE, belt, two straits which unite the Baltic Sea and the Kattegat.

BELTESHAZZAR, bel-te-shăz'-ar, 'who lays up treasures in secret,' a title of honour given to Daniel in Babylon.

BELTON, bel'-ton, the name of several parishes of England, none of which has a population exceeding 2,000.

BELUS, be'-lus. Among those of this name mentioned by ancient writers, the most celebrated is one of the ancient kings of Babylon, who was worshipped with much ceremony by the Assyrians and Babylonians. He was supposed to be the son of the Osiris of the Egyptians.

BELZONI, Giovani, bel-zo'-ne, a distinguished traveller, whose Egyptian explorations have been of great value to those who are engaged in the study of antiquities. He caused to be transported from Egypt the colossal bust now in the British Museum, and was the first to open the great temple of Abousambul, which is cut in the side of an Egyptian mountain. In 1817 he commenced his excavations at Karnak, and opened the splendid tomb in the Beban-el-Molouk, or Valley of the Tombs of the Kings. He also opened numerous other sepulchres, and in all that he did, not only displayed great ingenuity, but much perseverance, under labours and difficulties of the most discouraging kind. In 1818 he visited the shores of the Red Sea, and discovered the ruins of the ancient Berenice, and visited the emerald-mines of Mount Zabarah. After an absence of five years, he returned to England, and published an account of his operations. In 1823 he set out for Africa, with the view of exploring part of that country. Arriving at the Bight of Benin, he was well received by the king of Benin, and prepared to set out on a journey to Houssa, when he was attacked by dysentery, which carried him off. B. at Padua; D. at Gato, in Benin, 1823.

BEM, Joseph, bem, a brave general, who first served in the army under Marshal Davoust, and subsequently under Macdonald, at the siege of Hamburg. In 1819 he was made a captain, and became professor of a school of artillery established at Warsaw. In 1830 he took part in the Polish insurrection, and after the defeat of the Polish army, fled into France. On the commencement of the revolution of 1848, he tried to organize an insurrection at Vienna, and afterwards attached himself to the Hungarian cause. In 1849 he fought at the battle of Temesvar, in which the Hungarians were defeated. Seeking refuge in Turkey, he subsequently became a Mussulman, and was raised by Abdul-Medjid to the dignity of a Pasha. B. in Galicia, 1795; D. at Aleppo, 1850.

BEMBO, Peter, baim'-bo, a cardinal and poet, who, in 1513, was appointed by Leo X. his secretary, and made bishop of Bergamo by Paul III. He was also a favourite of the celebrated Lucrezia Borgia when residing at Venice. His principal works are the "History of Venice;" "Letters," containing anecdotes of the age, and a "Treatise on the Nature of Love." B. at Venice, 1470; D. 1547.

BEN, ben, a Gaelic word, signifying an elevated summit, and applied with various affixes to a number of the highest of the Scotch mountains, which, in this work, will generally be found noticed in the shires in which they are.

BENAIAH, ben-ai-ya, 'son of the Lord,' or 'understanding of the Lord,' a captain of King David's guard, and chief general to Solomon. There was a famous king of Judah also of this name.

BENANOIR, ben'-a-noir, the 'mountain of gold,' one of the peaks or "paps" of the island of Jura, in Scotland. Height, 2,420 feet.

BENARES, be-nar'-es, a district of Hindostan, lying on both sides of the Ganges. Area, 19,834 square miles. Desc. Fertile, producing wheat, barley, pulse, opium, indigo, and sugar. Pop. 7,121,087. Lat. between 24° and 26° N. Lon. between 82° and 84° 30′ E.—This is one of the most flourishing provinces in India, and in 1775 was ceded to the East-India Company by the nabob of Oude.

BENARES, the capital of the above district, and the most celebrated seat of Hindoo learning, is situate on the Ganges, at a distance of 120 miles from Delhi, and BENARES.

390 from Calcutta. It is about four miles long, by two broad; but the streets are narrow, and many of the houses, which are built of stone, five or six stories high. During the religious festivals, the concourse of people which assembles here is immense, this city being considered "the most holy." The bank of the river is entirely lined with stone, formed into flights of steps, and adorned by numerous temples, in the midst of which rises the superb mosque erected by the emperor Aurungzebe, in the 17th century, and having two minarets each 232 feet above the Ganges. This city carries on a very extensive trade with all parts of India, and its bankers have been known to grant bills to the confines of Russia. It is the principal mart for the diamonds found in the mines of Bundelcund; and its manufactures of gold and silver lace, silks, and brocades, are carried to all parts of the East. Pop. about 200,000, which is immensely increased during the festival seasons. Lat. 25° 18′ 33″ N. Lon. 82° 55′ 52″ E. Benares is the residence of the British Court of Circuit. In 1017 it was taken by Sultan Mahmoud, and from 1190 till 1775 shared the fortunes of the sovereigns of Delhi. In that year it passed into the hands of the British. On the 4th of June, 1857, the 37th native infantry rebelled against their officers, and after a sharp action between them and the British, they were put to flight, leaving 100 slain and 200 wounded on the field.

BENBOW, John, a brave English admiral, who early entered the merchant service, and in 1680 commanded a ship in the Mediterranean trade, with which he beat off a Sallee rover. The gallantry of this action being reported to Charles II. of Spain, he invited the captain to court, and presented him with a letter of recommendation to King James II., who gave him an appointment in the navy. William III. dispatched him to the West Indies to protect the British colonies, and on his return he had great respect paid to him. After his return he was advanced to the rank of vice-admiral, and after a brief period, during which he was sent to blockade Dunkirk, he was once more, in 1701, dispatched to the West Indies. Shortly after his arrival there, he fell in with the French admiral Du Casse, near St. Martha, on the Spanish coast, when a skirmishing action commenced, which continued three or four days; in the last day the admiral was singly engaged with the French, his other ships having fallen astern. Though a chain-shot had shattered his leg, he would not be removed from the quarter-deck, but continued the fight till morning, when the French bore away. The admiral made signal for his ships to follow; but his orders were disobeyed. In consequence of this, he was obliged to return to Jamaica, and on his arrival, ordered those officers who had behaved so ill to be confined, and brought to a court-martial, when the most culpable of them suffered according to their deserts. B. 1650; D. from the effects of his wound, 1702.

BENCOOLEN, ben-koo'-len, a seaport-town and Dutch residency, situate on the W. coast of the island of Sumatra. The official name of the fort and town is Marlborough. The town is inhabited by a mixed population of natives of the country, Malays, Javanese, natives of Bengal, Malabar, and Coromandel, and a trifling proportion of Europeans and their descendants. Pop. of town, 12,000; of residency, 95,000. Lat. 3° 47′ 6″ S. Lon. 102° 19′ E.—The English settled here in 1685, after they were compelled to quit Batavia; and, in 1824, ceded it to the Dutch in exchange for Malacca.

BENDA, ben'-da, the name of a German family, distinguished for their abilities as musical composers and performers.

BENDER, ben'-der, a small but strong and regularly-fortified town of European Russia, in Bessarabia, on the Dniester, the capital of the territory of the same name, 58 miles from Odessa. Pop. 10,000.—This place was taken and stormed by the Russians in 1770 and in 1809. In its vicinity is Varnitza, a place celebrated as the retreat of Charles XII., king of Sweden, from 1709 to 1712, after the battle of Pultowa.

BENDISH, Bridget, ben'-dish, is worthy of notice here, as being the daughter of General Ireton, and granddaughter of Oliver Cromwell. Her husband's name was Thomas Bendish. D. about 1727.

BENEDICT, ben'-e-dikt, a famous English abbot, who made frequent tours to Rome, and took to England several artists, eminent in architecture, painting, and music. He founded the monastery at Wearmouth in 674, and that of Jarrow in 682. B. in Northumberland; D. 690.

BENEDICT, ST., founder of the religious order of the Benedictines, and who retired at an early age to Subiago, 40 miles from Rome. He was followed by a number of persons, who adopted the rules he established, and in a short time he had twelve monasteries under his direction. About 528 he withdrew to Mount Cassino, where he founded a monastery, which became the prototype of all the institutions of that kind in western Europe. B. at Nursia, 480; D. 542 or 543.

BENEDICT, ben'-e-dikt, a name adopted by a great number of the Roman pontiffs, among whom the most distinguished were:—

BENEDICT VIII., who obtained the tiara in 1012. He crowned the emperor Henry II. and his wife in the church of St. Peter, on which occasion the pope presented the emperor with an apple of gold, surrounded with two circles of precious stones crossed, and surmounted with a cross of gold. This pope united the warrior with the ecclesiastic, and defeated the Saracens and Greeks, who invaded his territories. D. 1024.

BENEVENTO.

BENEDICT XII. was the son of a baker, and became doctor of the university of Paris, and cardinal priest. In 1334 he was elected to the papal chair, on the death of John XXII. On this occasion he said to the cardinals, "You have chosen an ass." He corrected several abuses in the Church. D. at Avignon, 1342.

BENEDICT XIII. was born at Rome in 1649, of an illustrious family, and took the religious habit among the Dominicans at Venice. In 1672 he was made cardinal, and obtained also the archbishopric of Benevento, where, in 1688, his palace was shattered by an earthquake, and the cardinal narrowly escaped with his life. In 1724 he was chosen pope; and the year after he called a council at Rome, in which the bull Unigenitus was confirmed. D. 1730.

BENEDICT XIV. was born at Bologna in 1675, of the noble family of Lambertini. In 1728 he received a cardinal's hat; and in 1731 was nominated archbishop of Bologna. On the death of Clement XII., the cardinals were a long time deliberating on the choice of a successor. Lambertini, by way of quickening them, said, "Why do you waste your time in discussions? If you wish for a saint, elect Gotti; a politician, choose Aldrovandus; a good companion, take me." This sally pleased them so much, that they elected him at once. He reformed abuses, introduced good regulations, cultivated letters, encouraged men of learning, and was a patron of the fine arts. D. 1758. His works make 6 vols. folio. He was chosen pope in 1740.

BENEDICT, Jules, a modern German pianist and musical composer. He studied under Hummel and Weber, and in 1824, on the recommendation of the latter, was appointed musical director of the theatre of the Carthusians at Vienna. At the San Carlo of Naples he produced his first compositions, and was subsequently very favourably known as an admirable performer on the piano in most of the large cities of southern Europe, and finally settled in London. He was with Jenny Lind in the United States, during her remarkably successful engagement there under the auspices of Barnum. B. at Stuttgart, 1805. The principal of his works are, "I Portoghesi a Goa," "Un Anno ed un Giorno," "The Gipsy's Warning."

BENEVENTO, bai'-ne-vain'-to, a city of Italy, chief town of the duchy of the same name, consisting of the town of Benevento, and a small district around it, about 11 miles square, 30 miles from Naples. It is situate between two narrow valleys, and no place in Italy, with the exception of Rome, contains so many interesting remains of antiquity. Among others, the triumphal arch, which was erected in honour of the emperor Trajan, A.D. 114, is still in good preservation. The cathedral is a clumsy edifice in the Gothic style; and the church, dedicated to the Virgin Mary, is remarkable for nothing but its antiquity. Pop. 23,000.—This city is of great age, and is supposed to have been one of the principal towns of the Samnites. In a neighbouring plain, Charles of Anjou, king of Naples, defeated and slew his rival, Manfred, in 1266. Under the Lombards, Benevento was the capital of a duchy. In 1806, Napoleon I. gave it to Talleyrand, with the title of prince; but, in 1815, it was restored to the pope, and is now governed by a cardinal, with the title of legate.—The delegation of Benevento is inclosed by the province of Principato Ultra, and contains an area of 90 square miles, with a population of 21,000.

BENEZET, Antony, ben'-e-zet, an American philanthropist, who, at an early age, removed with his family from France to Philadelphia, where they became Quakers. He devoted his life to acts of charity, and the negroes were especially objects of his care. He published various tracts on Guinea and the slave-trade, an account of the Society of Friends, &c. B. at St. Quentin, Picardy, 1713; D. 1784.—A fine eulogium was pronounced over his remains by an American officer. "I would rather," says he, "be Antony Benezet in that coffin, than George Washington with all his fame."
